DEPARTMENTAL COMMITTEE ON THE TRUCK ACTS.

MINUTES OF APPOINTMENT.

I hereby appoint—

THE RIGHT HONOURABLE THOMAS SHAW, M.P., Lord Advocate for Scotland,

EDWARD A. BROTHERTON, ESQUIRE, M.P.,

FREDERICK CAWLEY, ESQUIRE, M.P.,

MALCOLM DELEVINGNE, ESQUIRE, of the Home Office,

JAMES RAMSAY MACDONALD, ESQUIRE, M.P.,

FREDERICK MADDISON, ESQUIRE, M.P.,

MRS. H. J. TENNANT, and

to be a Committee to inquire into the operation of the Truck Acts, and to consider and report what amendments, or extensions, of those Acts, or changes in their administration, are desirable; particularly whether fines and deductions from wages should be prohibited, and further to consider and report whether the practice of shop-assistants and certain classes of work-people being lodged and boarded by their employers gives rise to abuses needing remedy by an extension of the Truck Acts or by other action of the State.

And I further appoint the Right Honourable Thomas Shaw, M.P., to be Chairman, and Thomas Edward Bettany, Esquire, of the Home Office, to be Secretary of the said Committee.

(Signed) H. J. GLADSTONE,
One of His Majesty's Principal Secretaries of State.

5th April, 1906.

I hereby appoint Stephen Walsh, Esquire, M.P., to be a member of the Departmental Committee upon the Truck Acts, in the place of J. Ramsay Macdonald, Esquire, M.P., who has resigned.

(Signed) H. J. GLADSTONE.

4th August, 1906.

REPORT.

To the Right Honourable Herbert John Gladstone, M.P., His Majesty's Secretary of State for the Home Department.

Sir,

1. In accordance with the Minute of 5th April, 1906, appointing us as a Departmental Committee, we have conducted an inquiry into the subjects therein set forth.

In the month of August, 1906, we lost the valuable services of Mr. Ramsay Macdonald, M.P. In his room we have had the advantage of obtaining the services, under your appointment, of Mr. Walsh, M.P.

It very early became evident to us as a committee that the complexities of the subject and its ramifications among the various industries of the country would make the inquiry one which, to be in any sense thorough, would necessarily be of a prolonged character. Around it, as we also soon discovered, or at least around some portions of it, there were ranged certain conflicts of opinion, not only between employers on the one hand and employees on the other, but within each of those classes, as neither among employers as a class nor employees as a class did unanimity of view prevail. We realised, moreover, that there would be extreme difficulty in suppressing a certain exuberance of willingness upon the part of various sections of the industrial community for the hearing and expression of their views. And upon the whole we concluded that the safer and juster, although by far the more laborious, course would be to give a full although lengthy hearing to the numerous interests concerned. While we thus felt ourselves unable to sacrifice thoroughness to dispatch we trust that inquiry so conducted will form the ground for a safer induction for conclusions either of a legislative or administrative character.

Our inquiry has lasted for two years and eight months. We have held eighty-two meetings and have examined 118 witnesses.

2. In the appendix will be found a report of all the legal decisions* which have been pronounced by Courts of Law of authority upon the construction of the Truck Acts, since the passing of the last of the existing Acts, i.e., the Act of 1896. By these and previous decisions the administration of the law in the public departments had of course to be guided. It is well known that the provisions of the statutes have given rise to great difficulties of interpretation, and that Judges of great authority have taken different views as to their meaning. It became necessary for us, therefore, in the first place, to see what was the view held at official headquarters, the statutes and decisions standing as they are, as to the present state and administration of the law. Upon this subject we had the valuable assistance of Sir Henry Cunynghame of the Home Office and of the inspectorate whose operations are directed by that department of State.

The official evidence was followed by numerous representatives of employers and employed, and the trades with regard to which evidence was tendered were as follows, viz. :—the railway, mining and textile industries (including woollen weaving, cotton weaving, worsted, linen, damask weaving, &c.) the various branches of the clothing trade, the iron and steel trade, the engineering and shipbuilding trade, the pottery trade, the Sheffield cutlery and silver and electroplate trades, the laundry trade, the lace-making, lappet, and lino-cloth making trade, the bleaching industry, the catering trade, the gas-making industry, the cocoa and chocolate trade, the hand and machine knitting industry in Ireland and many other miscellaneous trades.

* A collection of some of the legal decisions prior to the Truck Act of 1896, will be found in the Memorandum presented to Parliament by the Home Office in 1896. [C–8048.] ; and a digest of decisions prior to 1871 in Appendix XV. of the Report of the Truck Commission of 1871.

411. 5,000—Wt. 2227. 12/08. Wy. & S. 4791*r*.

In addition to this, evidence was submitted to us by representatives from Government departments which are large employers of labour, viz :—the Post Office and the War Office ; by representatives of the medical profession on the subject of deductions from wages for medical attendance, and on behalf of societies, such as the Church Army, and also by private individuals who were interested in certain portions of the subject of our reference.

Finally, we received a large body of evidence from shopkeepers and shop assistants in regard to the "living in" system, and members of the committee also personally visited establishments both in the west and east of London where the system obtains. These visits were made without notice or on very short notice. We have to acknowledge the courtesy of the owners of these establishments in allowing us to make a thorough inspection of their arrangements. In no case except one, viz.—that of Messrs. Jeremiah Rotherham and Co., of Boundary Street, Shoreditch, E., was permission to view the premises refused.

3. Through the courtesy of the Home Office we obtained reports as to the laws of the Colonies and certain Foreign Countries on the subject of truck and fines and deductions from wages, and as to the industrial tribunals of France and Germany. Summaries of these reports prepared by our Secretary are printed in Appendices II. and III.

4. For practical purposes legislation on the subject of truck is generally treated as beginning with the Act of 1831 (1 & 2 William IV., chapter 37). There is, however, a record of legislative efforts* extending over many centuries, aimed at the practice of paying wages in goods.

The nature of the subject and the limits of the early legislation appear from the statute of 1464 in the fourth year of the reign of Edward IV. That Act applied to woollen clothworkers alone. It displays the minuteness of Parliamentary interference in those days, dealing with the length and breadth of broadcloths and cloths called "streits" and "kerseys," &c., and stipulating among other things—

"That every of the said cloths and half cloths shall perfectly and rightly pursue and follow one order of workmanship from one end to the other, without difference in the weaving, fulling, knotting or burling.'

Later on in the statute it is provided—

"That every carder, spinster, weaver, fuller, sheerman, and dyer, shall duly perform his duty in his occupation, upon pain to yield to the party grieved in this behalf his double damages."

And minute punitive sanctions are rigorously set to the performance of the labourer's duty. These attempts at specific regulation have in subsequent centuries disappeared with advancing doctrines as to the freer play of economic forces, but Sections 13 and 14 of the statute still stand as marking principles which have been gradually confirmed and extended. As has been remarked the statute was confined to woollen clothmaking and it narrates that—

"The labourers thereof have been driven to take a great part of their wages in pins, girdles, and other unprofitable wares, under such price that it did not extend to" :

and so it is ordained—

"That every man and woman being clothmakers, from the said Feast of St. Peter, shall pay to the carders, spinsters, and all such other labourers, in any part of the said trade, lawful money for all their lawful wages, and payment of the same."

Gradually the principle was extended to other industries. For instance in 1701 by the Act of 1 Anne, chapter 18, the narrative extends to woollen, linen, fustian, cotton, and iron manufacture, and it is enacted that all "payments and satisfactions . . . . shall be by the lawful coin of the realm, and not by any cloth, victuals, or commodities, in lieu thereof."

5. Whether the union of the Parliaments in 1707 had been the means of the introduction of the term truck, which has its Scotch equivalent in the word "trock," cannot be said with certainty ; but in 1725 by the Act 12 George I., chapter 34, the term appears upon the statute book. The Act itself reflects upon the social troubles of the period on account of "great numbers of weavers" having "lately formed themselves into unlawful clubs and societies, and have presumed, contrary to law, to enter into combinations, and to make by-laws or orders, by which they pretend to regulate the trade, and the prices of their goods, and to advance their wages unreasonably," and it makes severe provisions against such combinations, with strong punitive provisions against quitting service before the expiry of the hiring, against spoiling work, and the like. The counterpart, however (the Act dealing mainly with woollen manufactures), obliges and requires the employer to pay "the full wages or other price agreed on in good and lawful money of this Kingdom, and shall not pay the said wages or other price agreed on, or any part thereof, in goods or by way of truck, or in any other manner than in money as aforesaid," and it proceeds (much upon the line adopted in more recent legislation), "or make any deductions from such wages or price for or on account of any goods sold or delivered previous to such agreement." In 1749, by the Act, 22 George II., chapter 27, the category of employments was widely extended and the prohibition was repeated against paying "their wages or other price agreed on or any part thereof either in goods or by way of truck or in any other manner than in money." In 1817, after some intervening legislation, the category was still further extended by 57 George III., chapter 115, which deals with what it denominates "the pernicious practice of paying the wages of labourers . . . in goods" and it is narrated that the security given by previous legislation "for the receipt of their wages in money, is in neither of these Acts extended to labouring men employed in the manufacture of articles made of steel, or of steel and iron combined, and of plated articles, or of other articles of cutlery," and provisions are accordingly applied to these industries. By chapter 122 of the same year's legislation the provisions were extended to the coal trade in these words :—

"That the provisions of the aforesaid Act of the twelfth year of the reign of His late Majesty, King George the First, which prohibits the payment of the wages of persons employed in the woollen manufacture in goods, and to secure the payment of every part of their wages in good and lawful money of this Kingdom, be extended to labourers employed in working and getting coal in the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland."

6. The Act of 1831, 1 and 2 William IV., chapter 36, repealed a mass of legislation of this kind extending over three and a half centuries. It comprehended in its repeal so much of the said several recited Acts as regulates or relates to the payment of the wages of workmen in the several trades and occupations therein enumerated in goods or by way of truck. This repeal being effected, the operative statute of 1831, 1 and 2 William IV., chapter 37, was passed into law, and that Act still holds the field as containing the comprehensive statement of the general principles still held operative for the suppression of the practice of truck. The preamble of the Act may be quoted as showing the objects which Parliament had in view :

"Whereas it is necessary to prohibit the payment, in certain trades, of wages in goods or otherwise than in the current coin of the realm."

7. The Act of 1831, however, was far from accomplishing the extirpation of the practice of truck in the relations of employers and employed throughout the country. The enumeration of trades to which it was applied by Section 19 was large, but was specific, and so excluded masses of the population who were engaged in industries other than those set forth. To quote from an able memorandum on the law relating to truck issued by the Home Office in 1896 :—*

"Truck therefore still continued in other employments. It was, perhaps, at its worst among the labourers employed to make railways, who used hardly ever to receive money except at long intervals, when they celebrated an orgie.

"This evil was considered by a Select Committee in 1846, who recommended the extension of the Truck Acts to persons engaged in making railways. (Committee Reports. Vol. xiii., p. 430.) But no Parliamentary action followed this Report until 1887.

"In consequence of a fresh agitation among the working classes, a Royal Commission upon Truck was appointed, of which Charles Bowen, who afterwards became a Lord of Appeal, was chairman.

"This important commission went over the whole of the ground again, and presented a voluminous report.

"They endeavoured to form some estimate of the extent to which the Truck Act was then being broken and they came to the conclusion that, counting women and children, probably nearly half a million of people were dependent on works where either poundage (i.e., interest on money advances) is charged, or a shop kept by the employer. Truck was found chiefly to exist in the coal and iron mines in Wales : it was carried on by means of long-deferred wage payments, which forced the men to seek for advances, which they got as a grace, and as a condition of which they were bound to deal at the employer's shop. A man who, having received his advance, slipped away with it without expending it in the employer's shop, was called a 'sloper,' a term which has passed into vulgar language."

* [G 8048].

8. It is certainly very remarkable that the action of Parliament in extending the scope of the Truck Acts was so slow and that a period of fifty-six years should have elapsed before an amending Act reached the statute book. In 1887, however, two bills were introduced into the House of Commons, one by Mr. Bradlaugh and one by Mr. Donald Crawford, and the bill of the former, with drastic amendments, passed into law.

By the Act of 1887 the principle was extended to any "person who, being a labourer, servant in husbandry, journeyman, artificer, handicraftsman, miner or otherwise engaged in manual labour, whether under the age of 21 years or above that age, has entered into or works under a contract with an employer, whether the contract . . . . . be express or implied, oral or in writing, and be a contract of service or a contract personally to execute any work or labour." (In the course of attempting to define "manual labour" the Courts of Law have produced curious distinctions, to which we refer later). Provision was also made for a more effective enforcement of the Acts.

9. Nine years later still came the Act of 1896, which dealt, however, with a somewhat different subject matter, that of fines and charges of various kinds made against the worker by his employer, and did not further extend the application of the previous Acts.

10. The statutes then which bear the name of the Truck Acts are three in number, viz. :—

(1) The Truck Act, 1831 (1 & 2 William IV. Cap. 37).

(2) The Truck Act, 1887 (50 & 51 Victoria, Cap. 46), and

(3) The Truck Act, 1896 (59 & 60 Victoria, Cap. 44).

In addition to these statutes there are—

(4) The Hosiery Manufacture (Wages) Act, 1874 (37 & 38 Victoria, Cap. 48), and which have a direct bearing upon truck, and deductions, and generally upon the subjects of our reference.

The provisions of the Acts of 1831 and 1887 and the questions arising upon them are discussed at length in the Home Office Memorandum,[1] to which we have already referred, and as this is available as a Parliamentary Paper, we do not propose to go over the ground in detail. It will be necessary, however, for the purposes of our Report, to explain briefly the present state of the law.

11. As already stated the Act of 1831 remains the leading statute on the main subject of the Acts, viz. :—the actual prohibition of truck itself, that is to say, of the payment of wages in goods or otherwise than in current coin.

The Act commences by laying down the following general provisions :—

First, in the contract of service, wages are to be made payable in current coin of the realm only, and the entire amount of wages earned is to be so paid.

Secondly, no condition is to be imposed in the contract of service, directly or indirectly, as to where, how, or with whom, wages or any part of wages are to be expended.

To ensure the observance of these provisions, and to prevent any evasion, a number of safeguards are devised :—

(1) All contracts contravening these provisions, and all payments in goods or otherwise than in current coin (subject to certain exceptions), are declared illegal, null and void.

(2) The employer is made liable to penalties for any illegal contract or payment.

(3) The workman may recover by civil proceedings so much of his wages as shall not have been paid in current coin, and the employer is not in any such action to be entitled to any set-off in respect of any goods supplied to the worker on account of wages, or in respect of any goods purchased by the worker at a shop in which the employer is interested.

(4) The employer is not to be entitled to sue the worker for any goods supplied to him on account of wages, or supplied to him at any shop in which the employer is interested.

Certain exceptions are made to the general provisions, to allow of the employer supplying his workers with medical attendance, houses, meals, etc.

"Wages" are defined as meaning anything given as "a recompense, reward or remuneration for any labour done."

The application of the Act was limited to "artificers" in certain trades; this provision was superseded, as we have seen, by the Act of 1887.

It may be observed here that there is nothing in this Act to prevent the sale of goods by the employer to the workman, though the provisions (3) and (4) above may make him disinclined to do so except for cash.

So far as regards Truck proper, the provisions of the Act have not presented much difficulty, except as to the question what persons were comprised within its terms. The reasons why Truck continued to flourish for many years afterwards were that no system of inspection was established with a view to the enforcement of its provisions, a defect remedied (at any rate, to a very large extent) by the Act of 1887.

12. So far as regards deductions from wages other than in respect of the supply of goods or the like, difficult questions arose in consequence of the ambiguous nature of the language employed in the Act, but before proceeding to notice these, it will be convenient to refer to the provisions of the Act of 1887.

The two most important of these have been already mentioned, viz.:—the extension of the Act to fresh classes of workers, and the imposition on the Inspectors of Mines and Factories of the duty of enforcing the Acts in factories, workshops, and mines.

Apart from these, the matters dealt with in the statute of 1887 were chiefly matters of detail. No fresh principles of general importance were introduced and, in particular, the question of deductions was not dealt with.

Two provisions only need be noticed here. First—It is made an offence by Section 6 of the Act to dismiss a workman from his employment, on account of the place where, or the manner in which, or the persons with whom, he has expended his wages—an additional safeguard. Secondly—Where a dealer buys from a person working at his own home and without employing any person other than members of his family articles under the value of £5, made by such person, of wool, cotton, silk, cloth, fur, lace, etc., the Act is to apply as if the dealer were the employer, the maker of the articles the worker, and the price of the article was the wages—an interesting provision as to the working of which, however, we have unfortunately been able to obtain little or no information.

13. But though the effect of the Acts of 1831 and 1887 was clear, so far as the question of Truck proper (i.e., the payment of wages in goods, or otherwise than in current coin) was concerned, its effect was not so clear as regards the subject of deductions. The Act of 1831 provided that the "entire amount" of the wages earned was to be actually paid in the current coin of the realm, subject only to such stoppages or deductions as might be agreed upon between the employer and workman in respect of benefits or advantages supplied by the employer under the provisions of Section 23 of that Act

The Courts were called upon, in a series of cases extending over a considerable period of time, to decide the effect of the Act in regard to deductions of various kinds.

(1.) In a series of cases, of which Archer v. James[1] is the most important, the legality of deductions in respect of such matters as machine rent, standing room, gas, fire, etc., was considered. The effect of the decisions was that things supplied to the worker not as recompense for his work, but as means of doing his work, are not supplied as part of wages. The worker's wage, being only the recompense for his work, is what remains after deductions in respect of things so supplied have been made. In other words, as was explained by Lord Davey in the recent case of Williams v. North's Navigation Collieries,[2] the "deductions which had been made from his nominal wages were held not to be in the nature of payment at all, but the mode of calculating and ascertaining the actual amount of his wages."

(2.) The question of deductions in respect of fines was not raised until much later. In 1889, the Home Office took proceedings against an employer for deducting from wages fines for spoiled work, injury to the property of the employer, misconduct, and the like, and, the case being dismissed, appealed to the High Court. The Court held that the deduction was not a payment of wages otherwise than in coin of the realm, but a non-payment of wage, and that a non-payment of wages or of any part of wages was not an offence against the Truck Acts. (Redgrave v. Kelly.[3])

It may be noticed in passing that Section 11 of the Employers and Workmen Act of 1875 appears to have recognised the legality of fines when it uses the language as to forfeitures on the ground of absence or leaving work being deducted from or set off against a claim for wages.

(3.) A third important class of deductions, deductions for a worker's contributions to sick and benefit societies, came under review in 1892, in the case of Hewlett v. Allen.[4] The employer in that case made it a condition of employment that his workers should be members of the sick and accident club connected with his works, and deducted (with the acquiescence of the workers though without a formal agreement) the contributions from wages, paying them over to the club. A civil action was brought by one of the workers to recover the amounts so deducted from her wages, and was taken through all the Courts to the House of Lords. The final decision was that "a payment made by an employer, at the instance of a person employed, to discharge some obligation of the person employed, or to place the money in the hands of some person in whose hands the person employed desires it to be placed, is, in the sense and meaning of those Sections [3 and 4 of the Act of 1831] a payment to the person employed as much as if the current coin of the realm had been placed in his or her hands." (Herschell C.). Lord Herschell's comment on the scope and object of those sections is important, and is in agreement with the interpretation placed upon the Act by the decisions in Archer v. James[1] and Redgrave v. Kelly,[3] already quoted. He said: "I do not think it can be doubted that the object of this enactment was to strike at the practice which had grown up of employers making their payment in part by the supply of goods in the sale of which they were interested, which it was thought would place the person employed at an unfair disadvantage, and which it was thought was calculated to result in the person employed obtaining something less than the agreed remuneration for services. The contrast in these sections is between payment in current coin of the realm and payment in some other fashion."

(4.) The last question of importance raised on this subject was as to the employer's right to deduct from wages the amount of any debt owing to him by the worker, and was decided so recently as 1906 by the House of Lords in the case, Williams v. North's Navigation Collieries (1889), Ltd.[2] (see Report of case in Appendix IV.). The worker in that case had been ordered by a Court of Summary Jurisdiction to pay a fine to the employer. The employer on the next pay day deducted from the wages the instalment of the fine then due. The House of Lords held that this deduction was illegal under Section 3 of the Act of 1831, on the ground that this was a "payment in account," and, therefore, a payment otherwise than in current coin of the realm. Davey, L.J., said: "The learned counsel for the respondents argued that the employer was not bound by the Act to pay in full, and non-payment was not an offence under the Act. Be it so; but this was not a case of non-payment or repudiation by the master of his debt, but of retention of a part of the workman's admitted wages in payment of a debt to himself, and was intended to be payment or satisfaction pro tanto of the workman's wages."

14. Deductions of the kinds mentioned in 1 and 2 above, were dealt with by the Truck Act of 1896. That Act and the decisions noted in paragraphs 3 and 4 bring the matter up to date. The provisions and effect of the Act will be discussed by us at length later in our Report, and need not be described here. It is sufficient here to say that by that Act deductions in respect of fines, in respect of loss to the employer by bad or spoiled work or materials, etc., and in respect of supply of materials, tools and other conveniences to the worker were made subject to conditions intended to protect the worker against harsh or unfair charges on the part of the employer.

Other decisions of the Courts on other points in the Acts will be noticed in the course of the Report.

15. We now proceed to the question of the amendment of the Acts. But before doing so, we desire to place on record an expression of our opinion as to their enforcement. In the first place we beg to testify to the highly appreciative estimate which we have formed as to the services of the inspectors. In considerable numbers they have given evidence before us and we may say in a word that unless their services had been rendered with an unsparing interest far beyond the mere scope of regulation duty we do not think that the benefits of the Acts would have been so widely reaped. In the second place we have felt that what we may designate the social influence of tht Trades Unions of the country in checking abuses, making articulate the grievances of those who would otherwise have silently suffered contraventions of the law, has been productive of more thorough administration and, without either threats or undue espionage, has brought both employers and employed into a regular system of loyalty to the statutes.

16. We deal with the various matters which have engaged our attention during this inquiry, under the following heads:—

I. Workers outside the Acts.
II. Deductions from wages.
III. Miscellaneous.
IV. Shop Assistants.

I.—WORKERS OUTSIDE THE ACTS.

17. It will be convenient if, in the first place, we deal with the question of the classes of workers to whom the present Acts apply. As we have already pointed out, the Act of 1831 was limited in its application to certain specified industries. This limitation was removed by the Act of 1887, which applied the law to all persons engaged in manual labour who have entered into or work under a contract of service or a contract personally to execute any work or labour.

(1) Outworkers.

18. Our attention was called at an early stage of our inquiry to the difficulties caused by the expression "a contract personally to execute any work or labour" in its relation to the large classes of persons engaged, often for very slender remuneration, in toilsome occupations in their own homes. It had been already pointed out in the Report of the Truck Commission of 1871 that the effect of the decisions on the Act of 1831 in the cases of Sleeman v. Barrett,[1] Ingram v. Barnes,[2] and Riley v. Warden,[3] had been to establish that only those persons are protected by the Acts who contract for their own personal labour as distinguished from what has been called the result of labour. In Ingram v. Barnes[2], the plaintiff, a working brickmaker, contracted to make bricks out of the defendant's clay, at so much per 1,000 bricks, finding all labour. It was held on appeal that the case did not fall within the Act, which applies only to actual wages, and not to the profits of the contract. In Sleeman v. Barrett,[1] the plaintiff, a butty collier, agreed to get coal by the day or ton and make roads by the day or yard; he employed and paid men under him. In giving judgment, Pollock, C.B., said that "if the engagement is that certain persons are to work and be paid for their labour, and the contract is merely for labour, then whatever may be the form of that contract it is within the Act; but if the contract is not for the labour but for the result of the labour, then it is not within the Act." The Truck Commission over which C. Bowen, afterwards Lord Justice Bowen, presided, made the following recommendation on the subject.

[1] 2 H. & C. 934. [2] 7 E. & B. 115. [3] 18 L.J. Ex. 120

"We think that these classes of workmen need protection as well as other labourers ; that a definition may, if necessary, be so framed as to discriminate between contractors who engage to supply the result of other persons' labour on a large scale and the former classes of workmen ; and that it is vain to expect that the lowest classes of labourers can be effectually protected so long as the slightly superior class under whom they work and by whom they are immediately paid, are themselves subject to the evils of truck. The view of the law taken by Sir W. Erle (Bowers v. Lovekin ;[1] Ingram v. Barnes,[2])—that it should be sufficient if the labour is such as is intended by the Act, if it is consistent with the contract that the person should give his personal labour, and if he has in fact done so to a substantial extent—appears in this regard preferable to what has by later cases been established as the correct construction of the present Act."

It will be seen later that we agree with Lord Justice Bowen and are recommending accordingly.

19. Notwithstanding the opinion expressed by the Commission the point was not dealt with in the Act of 1887. Parliament while giving a wide extension to the application of the Act, left the necessity of a contract for personal labour untouched. Why this was so, is not apparent. In the same Act, a special provision was inserted for the protection of persons not working under any contract of service at all, or contract to execute any work or labour, but engaged in making in their own homes with members of their family articles from materials supplied by themselves and selling the result of their labour to shopkeepers or other dealers. The case of the person to whom work was let out or given out to be done was left untouched.

20. It would seem that in 1896 when legislating on the subject of Truck, Parliament intended that outworkers as a class should have the benefit of the protection of the Acts, as Section 10 of that Act extended the duties and powers of the inspectors for the enforcement of the provisions of the Acts to "any place where work is given out by the occupier of a factory or workshop, or by a contractor or sub-contractor." That intention, if it existed, was nullified by two cases to which we shall now refer and which declared the law to be the same as decided by the earlier cases under the Act of 1831. In the years 1897 to 1899, prolonged investigations were undertaken by the Home Office into the conditions existing in the home industries of Ireland. A widespread system of truck was discovered. The work, chiefly hosiery, shirt-making, and sprigging, was distributed to the home workers from the local shops, the shopkeepers receiving the work from the manufacturers in the large towns of Ireland and Scotland, for whom they acted as agents, or obtaining the materials themselves and afterwards selling the finished articles ; and many of these shopkeepers were in the habit of paying the workers in goods or by tickets entitling the workers to purchase goods at the shop. Successful prosecutions followed, but on appeal by one of the defendants against his conviction, it was held (Squire v. Sweeney)[3] by the Irish Court of Queen's Bench, following the decisions in Ingram v. Barnes[2] and Sleeman v. Barrett,[4] that the Truck Acts did not apply to the case of these outworkers :—

"By the contract as disclosed upon the evidence, she was not bound to perform the work of knitting personally, or any part of it. Her contract, so far as disclosed by the evidence, would have been performed had she had the work done either in whole or in part by others or wholly by herself."

Therefore because there had been no anterior contract to do work personally—although there might be no moral doubt that the work had in effect been personally done—the Truck Acts were held not to apply.

21. In 1905, the question came before an English Court, also on a Home Office prosecution, in the case of Squire v. Midland Lace Company.[5] Certain women, called clippers, were in the habit of receiving from firms of lace-makers finished lace after its removal from the lace-making machine for the purpose of removing loose threads, etc. The clippers were not exclusively employed by any one firm; the lacemakers had no control over them; and the clippers might and often did employ others to assist them in the work, or give it to others to execute for them. The English Court, also following the decision in Ingram v. Barnes,[2] held that as the clippers were not bound to execute the work, or any part of it, themselves, they were not within the Act.

22. We are not surprised that while these decisions were accepted as law the results thus countenanced by such an interpretation of the Acts produced wide-spread dissatisfaction, and the social effects of such a state of the law are such that we think it our duty as a Committee to call attention to them. It will be seen from the illustrations we are about to give that the practices to which we refer prevail most largely in remote parts of the United Kingdom where little publicity attends them and where the workers have no Trades Unions or organizations to voice their grievances or promote any attempt at legislative remedy.

23. Miss Squire, one of the inspectors who took part in the investigations in Ireland in 1897 to 1899, gave evidence as to the condition of things she found prevailing in Donegal during these years. We may give an illustration of those conditions from her evidence. In Donegal the worker, dwelling in one of the isolated one-storey cabins built on mountain land or on bog such as the witness describes, takes wool out from the agents' shops in the towns to her own cabin (sometimes at a distance of several miles) and knits it up into socks and stockings, and at week ends carries back to the towns the week's work, say two dozen of socks, or if some member of her family have assisted her, two and a half-dozen. The rate of remuneration for the shorter socks was 9d. or 10d. a dozen pairs—that is to say less than one penny a pair—and for the long golf stockings which "sell from 6s. or 7s. to 12s. a pair," "perhaps 2s. 6d. a dozen" (Q. 1717), that is 2½d. a pair. Instead however, of being paid by the truck master the 2s. 6d. or 3s. a week which is due to her, she is paid in goods, mostly in small packets of tea, which the witness stated was priced at a high figure which she put at 3s. 6d. per lb. They may also get some other article of diet, such as brown sugar or maize; many of the people seem to subsist chiefly upon maize and tea. For very lonely districts the truck master sends a cart at intervals and his man unpacks his tea and his wool, "giving out the wool and taking in the work and paying for it in tea" (Q. 1713). No money passes.

24. In view of the statements which reached us that the condition of things described by Miss Squire no longer existed, and as this was one of the cases brought to our notice in which the system of truck proper was alleged still to prevail, we thought it desirable, in addition to taking oral evidence, that a special investigation should be made, and on our suggestion Miss Martindale, one of the inspectors of factories, was detailed by the Home Office to undertake it. Her interesting report will be found printed in full in the evidence she subsequently gave before the Committee (Q. 16553). It deals with each of the three principal home industries of Donegal, viz.:—(1) Sprigging, or the embroidery of handkerchiefs, fancy and household linens; (2) hand and machine knitting; (3) machining and finishing shirts and collars. In some respects the conditions would seem to have improved in the ten years that have elapsed since the previous investigations, no doubt largely as a result of the attention that was then called to the matter. For instance, the reward for hand-knitting ordinary men's socks was from 1s. 6d. to 2s. per dozen pairs (fine ones 4s. per dozen pairs), and for fancy golf stockings from 8s. to 18s. a dozen pairs, according to the quality of the yarn. In many cases the price to be paid for the work is fixed by the manufacturer, and in some it is stamped on the article so that the worker may know what she ought to get, or the manufacturers, instead of employing a local agent, send down their own servants to distribute and collect the work.

25. As regards the question, however, which concerns this Committee, the existence of truck in these industries, no real change appears to have taken place. The prices charged for the tea and other articles may be less exorbitant, but the evil still exists. The actual prices paid for tea are stated in this report to be "2s., 2s. 4d. and 2s. 8d. per lb. (usually the two latter)" (Q. 16553). Again, the Truck Acts may be nominally observed by handing actual coin to the worker. But, as a general rule, no work is to be obtained, at any rate not the best work, unless the wages are left at the shop; or else the workers are allowed, or even induced, to get heavily into debt, to be wiped off subsequently by out work. Miss Martindale says that, though she received from the workers complaints as to the difficulty of obtaining coin, "it seems to be almost instinctive with them that it would be an ungenerous act to take their wages from the shop" (Q 16553). We think it right to note a subject upon which this witness gives valuable evidence:—

> "I am convinced that in Donegal the truck system and the credit system are working hand in hand with serious and far reaching results. In the course of an inquiry lasting only three weeks it was impossible to do more than touch on the fringe of such a large question as the credit system of Ireland. I gathered, however, sufficient evidence to realise the importance of the question, and to feel that an investigation into the shopping conditions is required, and great alterations needed, before a change for the better could be realised in the conditions of living amongst the Donegal peasantry. It appears to me that it will be impossible to stamp out the Truck system until the Credit system changes greatly for the better." (Q. 16553.)

26. Evidence was given with the view of rebutting the testimony of the Inspectors; but we do not doubt that the system had been described with substantial accuracy by them. We had the advantage of having also the evidence of the clerk to one of the unions and district councils of the county, who was also a justice of the peace. He admitted frankly that both merchants and people were at a disadvantage because the people had got into debt, and as a natural consequence things went from bad to worse, and that it might be possible that if anyone stood out for his money instead of taking goods, however much he wanted the money, he might find himself in a worse position than before. He suggested that the law was really not known in these remote districts, and in answer to the question, "Supposing the system was remedied, and people were paid in money instead of in goods, do you not think it would let the people hold up their heads and have a greater sense of independence than under the present system?" he said: "It would. It would be very much better for both parties." (Q. 15711.)

27. Evidence was also given as to the existence of similar practices in other parts of the country. In Cornwall, women in very humble circumstances and receiving poor relief eked out their parish allowance with knitting what are known as fishermen's guernseys. The truck masters' establishments are drapery shops. They supply the wool and on the delivery of the garment knitted therefrom the payment for the work is made not in cash but in drapery. "They could only obtain in payment for their work, drapery, and as these were very old women who had no use for blue silk sashes and lace and mantles that were given to them by the truck masters, they had to negotiate a sale with their friends in the village, and sometimes they were very hard put to it to find a purchaser" (Q. 1754). One case was mentioned which was brought into court. It was that of an old Cornish woman who had received in payment for knitting woollen guernseys, "three yards of wide blue ribbon. It was of absolutely no use to her. She took it to two or three people in the village and managed at last to find two children who were going to a school feast, and she sold it to their mother." (Q. 1761.)

Evidence was also given as to the existence of the system in the case of the corset-makers who live in villages near Bristol and of the glove-makers in Somerset.

28. We have already referred to the tenth section of the Act of 1887 which brought under the law against truck, the case where the finished article wrought from materials, say wool or the like, furnished by the worker is sold by him to the merchant. The section has had little application, so far as we have been able to ascertain, but there was one part of the country in which it might have been operative with very considerable effect. We refer to the Shetland Islands, in which the workers produce from wool, often of their own growing, articles of the finest quality and of exquisite design. These they sell to the shopkeepers, but the remarkable fact in the situation is that the habit of payment in goods has become so much one of the customs of the people that it has been extremely difficult to eradicate it, and for a very considerable time the law has been ignored or defied. On learning this the Committee directed the attention of the authorities in Shetland to the matter, and the Chief Constable of the Lerwick district gave valuable evidence upon the subject. His explanation, substantially, was that he knew of the state of matters but could not put the law into operation because he found himself unable to secure evidence as to the contraventions which he was perfectly aware were going on. He asked for additions to his staff and plain clothes assistance. His views and request were communicated to the sheriff of the county, who, with much courtesy and promptitude, placed himself in communication with the county authorities, and it is now hoped that the administration of the law will be put upon a more satisfactory footing in that county.

29. We may mention that from another remote part of the country, viz. :—the Island of Harris, we obtained evidence pointing to similar violations of the Truck Act on the part of the local merchants, including the agents of the Scottish Home Industries Association, in the supply of goods instead of coin to the makers of Harris tweed. So far as the Association was concerned, the state of matters there was explained to the Committee in the interesting narrative contained in the evidence of the Duchess of Sutherland, who is the President of the Association, and who attended as a witness and explained to us in detail the operations of the Society in Harris and other parts of the Hebrides. In describing the impoverished condition of the people, and the system of advancing the raw materials for their industry by the merchants in former times, her Grace said: "I think they advanced everything the people wanted, and the poor people got tied up in debt" (Q. 4265.) The Association, however, she said, had been anxious to conform scrupulously to the law. They had to provide the supplies of goods in these Islands, and so the materials for the operation of truck were convenient enough, but being well advised, they kept the payment of wages earned apart from the sale transactions, and, accordingly, "when the people bring in their manufactured tweed they are not only free to get money but do actually get money" (Q. 4313), and that what they buy is an ordinary mercantile transaction. The Duchess admitted this, but added with perfect candour, "but we will not supply them with further wool until they pay up their original debt" (Q. 4313). To a further question: "And so far as concerns the necessaries supplied to them by you, that is a totally separate account?" Her Grace replied: "Absolutely." "They are free to go where they like for these things, and are in no way bound to your Association?" To which she answered: "In no way, except by honour" (Q. 4317). We cannot accordingly say that in any of the operations of the Association the law appears to have been violated. As to the benevolence, both in design and in operation, of the work of the Association there can be no doubt.

30. For the reasons stated in Miss Martindale's report, it cannot be expected that the application of the Truck Acts to the case of the outworkers will immediately or entirely remedy the conditions prevailing in these remote districts. Moreover, the relation of persons so employed to the truck masters, who act as general merchants supplying from their shops to their workers most of their necessities, is such that the habits of the people, including chronic indebtedness as one of the conveniences of life, might be temporarily so disturbed by a sudden alteration of the present system that it would not be surprising if the change were for a short period distasteful both to employers and employed. The application, however, of the provisions of the Acts which require the payment of wages in coin, and prohibit the employer either from deducting from wages debts due to him from the worker or claiming to set off such debts will in itself be a substantial gain, and, we hope, the first step to the introduction of a better system.

31. We do not hesitate to recommend the inclusion of outworkers within the scope of the Acts.

The exact form which a statutory provision for this purpose should take will, no doubt, require careful consideration. Obviously it must not be so wide as to include any kind of contractor, large or small. The solution will, perhaps, be found along the lines indicated in the recommendations from the report of the Truck Commission of 1871, which we have quoted above, viz:—That if the labour contracted for is such as is intended by the Act, if it is consistent with the contract that the person should give his personal labour, and if he has in fact done so to a substantial extent, the contract should be regarded as one to which the provisions of the Acts apply.

In recommending that home workers should obtain the protection referred to, the Committee desire to record this interesting fact. They have had evidence with regard to the conditions and products of labour of a great variety of trades, but in none have there been such indications of high artistic excellence as that involved in this home labour. When it is performed in country districts, the products of the natives, say of Shetland in hosiery, or of Donegal in embroidery, afford constant proof of very high native and inherited skill.

(2) Inmates of Charitable Institutions.

32. Certain representations have been referred to us by the Home Office, or have been sent to us direct, on the question of the application of the Truck Acts to industrial work carried on in charitable institutions, such as firewood cutting, joinery work, laundry work, etc. Complaint is made that as inmates engaged in such work receive, in exchange for their labour, board and lodging only, or perhaps in addition a small money payment, the institutions are able to compete unfairly with the ordinary employer of labour. We are not concerned with the matters of controversy arising between these institutions and the trades with which they compete, but the question whether such institutions should come within the scope of the Acts, is one that falls within our terms of reference, and we decided to make inquiry into it. We invited information on the subject from the Church Army, as typical of such institutions, and Mr. W. F. Hamilton, K.C., attended to give evidence on their behalf, and also gave us the benefit of his opinion on the legal questions involved.

33. As regards the practice of the Church Army, he informed us that each man on entering the labour homes signs an agreement undertaking to live a good life, to be a total abstainer, to abstain from disobedience, idleness, insubordination, and so forth, and then to do his best after the first month to obtain work for himself. The men are employed chiefly at wood chopping, because it is the most economical way of carrying on the homes ; they are paid at piece-work rates ; 6s. is deducted every week from their earnings for their board and lodging, and 1s. a week pocket money is allowed, the rest being reserved for them till they leave the homes. The object of the homes is not only to give employment to honest respectable men who are temporarily out of work, but to reform wastrels, and Mr. Hamilton explained that if the Truck Acts applied to the homes in such a way as to render necessary the payment to the men of all that they earned in cash the result would be disastrous. He said :

"If you were to amend the Truck Acts so as to bring the labour homes within the scope of the Truck Acts, in our view the reformatory part of our work in those labour homes would be crippled, if not destroyed. My reasons for saying so are these : If the wages are paid in cash only, to wastrels, then the temptation at the end of the first week when you put 9s. into a man's hands would be to spend the money in drink or dissipation, instead of paying for his board and lodging 6s. and starting a reserve fund ; it would be almost irresistible." (Q. 12780.)

34. Upon the question whether these institutions are subject to the provisions of the Truck Acts, Mr. Hamilton said that in the first place he doubted whether there was any contract of service, having regard to the extraordinary nature of the contract, or whether the Church Army was an "employer," and the men who came into the labour homes "workmen" within the meaning of the Act. If, however, it was decided that the Acts did apply, he thought that the transaction might be held to come within Section 23 of the Act of 1831. Assuming, however, that it was held that the ordinary relation of employer and employed existed, and that Section 23 did not cover the case, he thought it would be very desirable that the Church Army labour homes and all similar organisations should be exempted from the Truck Acts on the ground that they did not come within the mischief aimed at by the Acts.

In the case of some institutions, clothing, and other benefits and advantages are given as well as food and lodging.

35. This question of the applicability of the Truck Acts to charitable institutions has never been determined in the Courts of Law, but the point was raised indirectly in the case of the Poplar Union v. Martin.[1] In that case the question came up incidentally whether the terms offered to a man in the Salvation Army Colony at Hadleigh, viz., board and lodging and 6d. a week involved an infringement of the Truck Acts and Mr. Justice Phillimore said "Finally, I should like to say (we have only heard the case out upon one side) that I have been utterly unable to see for myself how the terms offered to the respondent in this case could be said to be a violation of the Truck Acts."

36. Whether on a strict reading of the Acts, the relation of institutions of this character to their inmates is one which comes within the provisions of the Truck Acts, the case does not appear to us within the mischief aimed at by the Acts, and we do not think their provisions should apply. There is no question in the case of a bona fide charity of an employer attempting to take an unfair advantage of his workers, and making a profit out of the supply of articles and other advantages to them ; in the case of very few of these institutions are the profits of the industrial work carried on sufficient to cover the expenses of the institution. The application of the Acts would seriously interfere with the beneficent work which they do, and no abuse has been brought to our notice which requires the intervention of the law.

Where, however, under the guise of charity an institution is carried on really as a profit making concern and so becomes an employer of labour for the purpose of such profit making, then we think such an institution should be put under the same law as to truck which applies to its commercial rivals.

(3) Other Workers.

37. The only other class of workers not at present included in the Acts in respect of which representations have been made to us is the class of shop assistants (including in that term persons employed in restaurants and similar places). We deal with this class in a later section of our Report.

38. A number of decisions have been given by the Courts of Law as to the classes of workers included in the definition of 'workman' which is applied for the purposes of the Acts. An omnibus conductor, a tramcar driver, and a goods guard have been held not to be included, as not being engaged in manual labour; on the other hand, it has been held that a motor-omnibus driver is a "workman" within the definition. While it is obvious that whatever boundary line may be drawn by any definition attempted, there may be doubtful cases on the one side or the other, we submit for your consideration whether the time has not arrived when Parliament should undertake the duty of endeavouring, to the best of its power, to put an end to distinctions such as those which we have quoted – distinctions which cannot, it appears to us, be defended upon any grounds of practical good sense. In our view every one of these workers excluded by law should be included. That they were workers there was no doubt, and we do not think an industrial question of this kind should be hampered in its handling by the acquiescence of the Legislature in distinctions such as those referred to.

In the Irish case Squire v. Sweeney[1] to which we have already referred, the Court were apparently of opinion that the worker was outside the Acts, not only because there was no contract for personal service, but also because knitting socks was not manual labour within the meaning of the definition. This interpretation if correct would have very serious results. We cannot think the view however to be correct. Knitting was included in the trades to which the Act of 1831 applied; it is one of the industries included in section 10 of the Act of 1887; and the decision is inconsistent with decisions of the English courts as to meaning of the same phrase in the Factory Acts (compare Hoare v. Green[2]). The question has not been raised elsewhere, before or since the case in question.

II.—DEDUCTIONS FROM WAGES.

39. The most important part of our inquiry has been that which related to what are commonly known as deductions from wages, and to the working and sufficiency of the provisions of the Acts which deal with them.

This part of our inquiry we propose to divide into five heads, viz:

A—Deductions or payments made in respect of fines under Section 1 of the Truck Act of 1896.

B—Deductions or payments made in respect of damaged goods, spoilt work, &c., under Section 2 of that Act.

C—Deductions or payments made in respect of materials, &c., under Section 3 of that Act.

D—Deductions made under Sections 23 and 24 of the Truck Act of 1831.

E—Deductions for benefit societies, etc.

40. The phrase "deductions from wages," though we retain it for convenience as that in popular use is not the phrase used in the Act of 1896. Some of the deductions in question are, as we have already seen (p. 8) not deductions from wages, but a mode of ascertaining the actual amount of wages. Other deductions (i.e., in respect of contributions to benefit societies) are not deductions at all from wages, but actual payment of wages. The only deductions from wages, properly so-called, which are still recognised by the law, are those authorised by section 23 of the Act of 1831.

The Act of 1896, therefore, when it came to deal with deductions for fines damaged work, materials, etc., had to deal with them not as deductions from wages but as deductions from the sum contracted to be paid for the work. It is important to bear this in mind when considering the questions which arise under headings A, B, and C.

41. Another point which it is important to bear in mind in considering the questions under those headings is that in dealing with deductions from the sum contracted to be paid, we are not concerned with methods by which that sum is arrived at in the first instance. Thus, if an employer reduces the price of a piece of work in his factory by 2½%, the discount of 2½% off the original price is not a deduction from wages but a means of arriving at the wage. A case was laid before the Committee of an apprentice hollow-ware presser working for a firm in the Potteries whose wage was fixed at 33% off 16*s.* 8*d.*, which is the ordinary wage of a hollow-ware presser. It is obvious that there is no deduction here from the sum contracted to be paid. Again, a custom exists in some trades of paying a piece price less a fixed percentage in respect of waste that may be made by the worker, or alternatively of making say 13 or 14 articles for the nominal price per dozen. These are both methods of arriving at the rate of payment.

In order to make the matter clear, we will take another illustration. An employer introduces power, &c., into his works. The labour of the worker is facilitated: more articles can be made in the same time. He adopts one of two courses. (1) He reduces piece-work rates by, say, 10 per cent. all round. This is a reduction of the rate of payment, not a deduction from it. Mr. J. Bradbury, who represented the manufacturing silversmiths of Sheffield, gave us an instance of this. He said:—

> "In the case of buffers, when working in the factories the master supplies steam power, sand, oil, leather, etc., for the use of the men, and a deduction of 10 per cent. to 15 per cent. is made from the money earned. If these men had to find their own materials they would be paid without discount being deducted, but they prefer to have the materials supplied, as they find those supplied by the masters to be better than they could procure (buying them in small quantities as they would have to do), and have a regular supply to use instead of wasting their own time in purchasing what they require. Polishers are also supplied with steam power and materials, for instance, lime and cloth, which otherwise they would have to provide for themselves. . . . . In the event of these deductions being abolished the prices paid would be reduced by the amount of the discount now deducted, and net prices would be paid for the work. (Q. 12513.)

or (2) He charges 2*s.* a week, say, for the use of the power, and deducts the sum at the end of the week from the payments due to the worker for the work done. This is a deduction from the sum contracted to be paid.

The first course is one with which the Truck Acts cannot deal, but the Committee have felt strongly the desirability of a net wage being fixed, wherever possible, and they think that this question should engage the serious attention of employers.

The second course comes within the Act of 1896.

42. It should be noted here that the Act of 1896 regulated not only deductions in respect of fines, loss to the employer from damaged work, etc., but also payments to the employer by the worker in respect of these matters, on the ground, no doubt, that such payments would in many cases not be voluntary transactions on the part of the worker but forced upon him by the employer. Except in these cases, however, payments made by the worker to the employer are not regulated by the Truck Acts, and it will be seen later that, as regards some matters on which evidence was given before us on behalf of the workers, it was to deductions by the employer over which the worker had in practice little or no control, rather than to payments by the worker to the employer, in regard to which the worker would have some voice beforehand, that objection was chiefly taken.

(A) Deductions or Payments in respect of Fines.

43. The decision of the Divisional Court in 1889, in the case of Redgrave v. Kelly,[1] established the legality of fines under the Truck Acts. The result of that decision was that up to 1896 there was no control at all over fines. The Act of 1896 was an attempt for the first time to protect the worker from harsh and unreasonable fines.

To secure this object the Act imposed five conditions: first that there must be a formal agreement for the fine; second, that it must be for something which causes or is likely to cause damage or loss to the employer or interruption or hindrance to his business; thirdly, that it must be fair and reasonable having regard to all the circumstances of the case; fourthly, that written particulars must be given to the worker each time a fine is exacted; and fifthly, that there should be a register of fines open to the inspector. So far as regards factories, workshops, mines, and quarries, but not as regards other industries under the Act, these provisions were to be enforced by Government inspection.

Under this head our inquiry has been directed to two main points:—

(1) The working of the existing provisions of the Act of 1896, the extent to which they have been successful in coping with the evils they were intended to remedy, the difficulties met with in their enforcement, and the amendments which experience has shewn to be desirable if a system of fining is to be retained.

(2) The advantages and disadvantages of a system of fining, the alternative methods of maintaining discipline, and the possible and probable results that would follow from the abolition of the system.

We have taken a large body of evidence in regard to these two questions.

1. The Working of the Act of 1896.

44. We entertain no doubt, as a result of the evidence we have taken—and our remarks as to the working of the Act under this heading will apply also to the two following headings—that the provisions of the Act of 1896 have been productive of a large amount of good, notwithstanding the existence of certain defects and of certain points hereafter referred to. Our opinion is supported by those best able to take a wide view of the situation.

Thus Dr. Whitelegge, the Chief Inspector of Factories, gave the following evidence on this head:—

"Now, what has been the result of those Acts of Parliament, so worked?—A very great improvement indeed. I am confident that we have checked the worst abuses and more especially with the aid of the 1896 Act.

"What are the conditions of the 1896 Act that seem to have given effectiveness to your work?—Under each of the first three sections a very large quantity of extremely valuable work has been done by the inspectors, and now it is exceptional to find the unreasonable fines and deductions, or the long codes, or the frequency of fining, that was somewhat common at one time." (Qs. 245–6.)

And the Principal Lady Inspector of Factories, Miss Anderson, gave the following striking testimony to the value of the Act:—

"I did not quite gather from you what your general view of the value of the Act of 1896 was. In your annual report for 1901 you quote a passage from a report made to you by Miss Squire upon the working of that Act, in which she said: 'The Truck Act, 1896, has now been in force five years and in my experience it has by degrees produced in that time, in spite of limitations, a most marked effect upon fines and deductions in all parts of the country to the advantage of the workpeople.' Then she goes on to develop that. Do you think she went too far in saying that?—Not at all. It has brought out into public view ever so many abuses and evils that were utterly unknown before, and that we could not deal with. Certainly the Act of 1896 has been a great step forward.

"You say that it has remedied to a certain extent abuses of that kind?—It has remedied a great many abuses that were legal until that Act was passed.

"But as regards the three great abuses at which it was aimed, do you think it has remedied them?—It certainly has done a great deal of good towards remedying those.

"And you think its main defects of detail might be remedied by amendment. The faults are not so much faults in the structure of the Acts as faults of detail?—Certainly. I strongly believe in the principles of the Act being extended and strengthened. Abuses have come to light that never could have come to light otherwise." (Qs. 1593–6.)

45. In judging of the effect produced during the nine years which have intervened since the passing of the Act and the commencement of our inquiry, it should be borne in mind that the inspectors have had to deal for the first time with an entirely new set of questions, relating to customs and practices which had in many cases existed unchallenged for many years and involving exceedingly difficult and minute investigations and examinations as to details affecting wages, processes of manufacture, discipline in factories, the cost of tools, materials, and light, and other matters. Moreover, the sphere of their operations was enormously wide, covering all the factories and workshops in the United Kingdom. They had to enforce provisions which from the very nature of the subject-matter presented considerable difficulty; and they had also to deal with misunderstandings of the general effect of the Act which have not to this day been altogether removed.

46. At the time of the passing of the Act a great deal of misconception prevailed as to its real nature. The Act was widely supposed to be a measure for the legalisation of fines. This arose partly as a consequence of the provision in the Act which required the employer either to post up a notice or to make a written agreement with the individual worker; and which led, on the passing of the Act, to many employers posting up long lists of fines of which the workers had never before heard and which were in point of fact illegal. This was a state of things which was remedied as the Inspectors settled down to the new work, but we have found in the course of our inquiry traces still existing of hostility to the Act, and disinclination to make use of it on the part of the workers and their representatives. The attitude thus taken by the workers has undoubtedly diminished the usefulness of the Act and must be taken into account as an important item in judging of the effectiveness of its provisions. Thus the President of the General Union of Weavers and Textile Workers gave the following evidence:—

"With respect to the Act of 1896, I rather gather from your evidence that your union has not used it very much: am I right?—How do you mean?

"I mean to say they have not called the attention of the inspectors to the matter or insisted upon the employers conforming to its provisions?—That is quite true. We have not used it much.

"Why?—Because we did not like it at the time; we did not seem to take to it. Like the Lancashire people, we wanted to be exempt from it at the time, and did not succeed.

"You took part in the same agitation as the weavers?—Yes, as the cotton people.

"And although it became an Act of Parliament your union did not think it worth its while to try and use it?—No; we have gone on what is possibly the obstinate policy of saying we would not have anything to do with it if we could help it, as we did not agree with it at the time.

"Do you think that has been a wise policy?—I am not very certain that it has." (Qs. 6945–50.)

The Home Office took steps to bring the Act to the notice of the workers by publishing a Memorandum in popular form, which was put on sale at 1d., and by inserting a brief statement of its provisions in the Abstract of the Factory Act, which is required to be posted in every factory, workshop, etc.; but, notwithstanding this, we found in a number of cases that the workers were either ignorant of, or very imperfectly acquainted with, its provisions, and many cases which have been brought to our notice as cases of hardship turned out to be cases which could have been dealt with under the Act, but had never been brought to the notice of the local Inspector of Factories. The following extract from the evidence of the Secretary of the Amalgamated Society of Steel and Iron Workers of Great Britain is an example of this failure on the part of the workers in some industries to take advantage of the Act:—

"I refer you to Section 2, Sub-section 1, of the Truck Act, 1896: 'The deduction or payment to be made must not exceed the actual or estimated damage occasioned to the employer by the act or omission of the workman.' That is, the deduction must only correspond to the loss caused by the default of the workman. Now in these cases in which you say the loss is not caused by the default of the workman, are the employers nevertheless making deductions?—Yes; they make deductions if a tube is spoilt, whether from bad material, bad heating, bad rolling or bad sheeting.

"You see that provision in the Truck Act?—Yes.

"Have you never taken any action on that?—No; I have never taken the matter up.

"Have you ever called the attention of the Factory Inspector to it?—No.

By Mr. Maddison (Acting Chairman).

"It does not matter what Acts are passed if people will not use them. We shall be going on for ever. Mr. Delevingne has called your attention to that section?—I will put that into operation the first time I have an opportunity of doing so." (Qs. 17021–5.)

47. On the other hand, we must point out that the Factory Inspectors have testified to the valuable help which has often been given them by the labour organisations.

We quote the following passage from the evidence of Mr. Redgrave, the Superintending Inspector for the Midland Division, in regard to the Birmingham brass trade.

"There are certain unions the operation of which absolutely relieve us from a great deal of technical responsibility on the question of charges and deductions; such a case is that of the brass founders at Birmingham. The deductions in that trade are practically the subject of agreement between the masters and the men, represented by Mr. Timmins on one hand, and by Mr. W. J. Davis (who was formerly inspector of factories) on the other hand. Through the working of that arrangement and the attention of the union to the subject, we have had practically no complaints of deductions in the brass trade." (Q. 613.)

48. But though considerable improvement has been effected by the Act of 1896 in regard to fines, there is a general consensus of opinion that much still remains to be done. The evidence we have had shows that:—

(1) It has been found impossible under the provisions of the Act as interpreted by the High Court in the case of Squire v. Bayer[1] to deal satisfactorily with many cases in which fines have been imposed for the most trivial offences. In the case referred to some girls were fined for dancing in their dinner-hour, in pursuance of a contract under the provisions of section 1 which required that workers should observe "due order and decorum." The Court held that the contract for the fine was good, the employers alleging that injury was likely to be caused to the machinery and materials, and that though the rule did not specify the particular acts or omissions, there was a sufficient compliance with the requirements of the Act. This decision of the Courts has opened the door wide to abuses, for under such a general rule all kinds of petty offences against discipline may be made the subject of a fine.

Miss Squire gave us some idea of the trivial matters for which fines are some times imposed. She said:—

"I have had constant experience of fines for such things as sneezing, laughing, singing, 'cheeking the foreman'—put down simply as that—wearing hair curlers in the hair; that is a very frequent source of fines. . . . .

"It is a breach of discipline to go into the factory with a hair-curler in the hair. . . . .

"I found many cases of 6d. and 1s. fine for that. . . .

"There are a great many fines in one or two factories for sneezing, and I was unable to find that there was anything very special about it—I mean no uproar caused, or anything of that kind; but the foremen seemed to think it was the only way of enforcing their authority to inflict a fine of 6d. . . . .

"Just as an instance of the trivial kind of thing that is solemnly told to one even by the occupier as a reason for fining, I will mention this. One was put down as a breach of Rule 4, which was that the worker should 'observe due order and decorum in the factory.' A girl had been fined 6d., and there seemed great differences as to why this had been imposed, and I was told that it was because she picked a spider off the wall of the factory and put it down by another girl." (Qs. 1831–5).

Miss Black gave us other instances of fines for trivial offences, viz.:—

"In a paper factory—talking 1d; reading whilst working machine, 1s.; meddling with tools, 6d.; bad language, 1s.

"In a needle-case making works: laughing or noisiness, 1d. A girl who works riveting hair curlers said they were fined 3d. for gaming, or for throwing tea leaves down the drains." (Qs. 5060–1.)

There was one extraordinary fine which she mentioned. We give it in her own words:—

"I find amongst our papers one funny little fine which is not mentioned specifically in my précis, namely, that a certain West End dressmaker fines her girls if they come down stairs in couples. On what ground, I do not know at all. They must come down one by one; they are not to come down in twos." (Q. 5068.)

Miss Tuckwell supplied other instances of a similar kind (Qs. 5255–61). Among others she quoted the following cases; in a jam factory:—

"Burns frequently oblige workers to attend Guy's Hospital: in this case 2d. is deducted from wages for every hour worker is absent. A bad burn entails dismissal; wages from 8s. to 10s. per week. This firm dismisses workers for such trifles as the fetching of hot water from one floor to another." (Q. 5257.)

In a chromographic enamel factory:—

"Making tea, 1s. and 2s. fines; eating bread and butter, 6d." (Q. 5257.)

It is only right to point out that a large number of the cases quoted to us were not of recent date, many going back as far as the period just subsequent to the passing of the Act of 1896. But we were assured that these cases were typical of the system as it exists to-day.

It is difficult to see with regard to many of these offences, in what way loss or hindrance is caused to the employer's business. Squire v. Bayer[1] is not an authority for holding that anything which the employer chooses to make an offence, may be made the subject of a fine. Only those offences can be so dealt with which have some relation to the work carried on, and are liable to cause hindrance or injury. It is possible that some of the cases quoted would have been held to be illegal. However, this may be, it is evident that the decision has seriously impaired the value of the section.

(2) The provision that the fine should be "fair and reasonable" has given rise to serious difficulties. There is nothing in the Act itself to guide a Court of Law in coming to a conclusion in regard to this point, and different magistrates have often taken quite different views of what is fair and reasonable. The burden has rested on the Factory Inspectors when taking proceedings to prove the case negatively, viz., that a particular fine was in the circumstances of the case not fair or reasonable, and the result has been to render action on their part difficult.

Stress was laid upon this point by most of the official witnesses who appeared before us. For instance, Miss Squire said (Qs. 1800-2):—

"A large number coming within the 1896 Act were not taken into court?—No."

"Why was that?—Because the experience of other cases showed that most of these cases turned upon whether the deduction was fair and reasonable, and the magistrates in other cases had either dismissed the cases or shown a great reluctance to give a decision upon the point as to whether the deduction was in fact fair and reasonable. In cases where we had been defeated it was impossible to appeal, because the decision had been one of fact."

Miss Tuckwell, in giving evidence as to fines for unpunctuality, said:—

"The fines so far as I can make out are never proportioned to the loss in time. . . . The amount of fines seems extremely in excess of any disorganisation which could be caused by one girl being late." (Qs. 5268–9.)

She mentioned a case where an employer fined a worker 5d. for being five minutes late. The wages earned by the worker were 5s. a week. So that the fine was calculated at the rate of 5s. per hour, while the wages were calculated at the rate of 5s. per week. (Q. 5412.)

Mr. Withey also drew attention to what he called "the exorbitant fines" imposed on girls not earning more than 4s. or 5s. a week for going in late. He said:—

"We found that if girls were ten minutes late they were fined 1d.; if they went in at 8.30 they were fined 2d.; at 9 o'clock 3d. Now, that is entirely out of proportion to the small wage these girls are drawing. In the case of some of the firms, if a girl stops away even through sickness she is fined 6d., without opportunity of explanation.

"I have here a list* of fines in the case of one clothing factory in Leeds. I find from this that a poor girl may be fined a total of 6s. 4½d. in one week. . . . "There are twenty-one items, eighteen of which involve a fine. For instance, anyone leaving the factory without bonnet or hat and standing about in the doorway, fine 3d.; no baskets, mugs, plate, dishes, etc., allowed in the workroom, fine 2d; any workhand taking work away without it being entered when it should be, fine 6d.; no workhand to take any work out of the workroom, fine 1s.; any works hand leaving her place in the room without sufficient reason, fine 2d.; any workhand talking, singing, or behaving unseemly, fine 3d.; any workhand disobeying her foreman or using saucy or abusive-language, subject to instant dismissal or fined 6d.; any workhand absenting herself without leave, 6d. each day; any workhand changing from one machine to another without leave of the mechanic, fine 1s.; using the wrong sewing, such as cotton instead of linen thread, subject to instant dismissal or fined 1s.; losing or soiling garment tickets, for each ticket a fine of ½d.; losing or destroying file tickets, fine 2d.; bad work which cannot be altered, damages and loss of material to be paid for by the workhand, no workhand is allowed to touch the gas or electric light or the apparatus connected with it, fine 6d.; etc." (Qs 5448–9.)

49. We conclude as a result of the evidence we have taken that most of the bad cases have been eliminated by the Act of 1896, but that the system of fining is still very prevalent and that much hardship and injustice are caused. We may say, speaking generally, that in the organised trades we have not had any evidence of serious or widespread abuses, though occasionally even in these trades isolated instances of hardship or injustice have been brought to our notice. The President of the General Union of Weavers and Textile Workers told the Committee that the Trade Union often brought pressure to bear upon the employer and succeeded in rectifying abuses. He added, however, that unfortunately the worst cases occur where the workers are not in any union.

* The Committee understand that this list is not now in existence.

The representative of the Northern Counties Amalgamated Weavers' Association gave the following evidence :—

"Then there are fines?—Yes, in our work more or less, but not very great, but the operative has the choice of coming to us about it and in such cases we go to the mill. All of us are practical weavers and we know as much about the cloth as the employer or the weaver. After examining the cloth and hearing the evidence we decide who is to blame.

"Can you give us a concrete example?—Yes, take a piece of cloth which the employer says shows a fault; it may be a few ends woven down longer than he thinks reasonable. I should carefully examine the cloth, and should ask the weaver as to the reason for these ends. If she satisfies me that the material supplied was faulty and caused the odd threads I might come to the conclusion that the weaver had done her level best and that whilst the cloth was not perfect the fact that the material was faulty would be an excuse for her as she had to make a good job as possible out of the materials supplied. In such a case I might say that I thought she was not liable and should resist the fine." (Q. 6287–8.)

We conclude from this evidence, and that of other representatives of the organised trades, that the unions in these trades are able as a rule to protect their members against unreasonable fines.

50. But as might be expected, it is in the unorganised trades that abuses chiefly occur. From the evidence we have had, it is clear that in cases where trade organisation is weak and the workers are consequently unable to protect themselves, extortion in the shape of unreasonable fines is frequently practised. We think, therefore, that it is necessary that further steps for the protection of the workers should be devised. The question whether this protection should take the form of further regulation or of abolition, is one that we now propose to consider.

2. The Abolition of Fines.

The Evidence of the Workers.

51. There was a preponderance of opinion among the representatives of the workers that fines should be abolished. In support of this view it was represented :—

(1) That actual experience shews that fines are not a real deterrent.

(2) That the moral effect on the worker is bad: he feels that having paid the fine he has discharged his obligation to the employer. As Miss Tuckwell, the representative of the Women's Trades Union League, said, "fines . . . leave on the mind of a girl or a lad, whoever it may be, the feeling that they have really paid for what they have done" (Q. 5325).

(3) That fines are often unfairly imposed and the system consequently creates a sense of injustice and tends to irritation among the workers. In particular, stress was laid on the fact that the worker has no appeal against the decision of the employer. Many of the representatives of the workers dwelt upon this point (Turner, Q. 6952; Shackleton, Qs. 6414–6).

Some witnesses stated that the sub-officials who inflict fines are expected to produce a certain number during the week, or at any rate that it is no detriment to him in the eyes of his employer (Shackleton, Qs. 6293, 6351–2; Devine, Qs. 7381–2), and the allegation was made that some employers looked upon the system as a source of profit to themselves, and that this encourages petty fining. Frequently the operative is afraid to raise the question of the justice or injustice of a fine for fear of dismissal (Withey, Qs. 5503–4): his only remedy is either to accept the situation or leave his employment (R. Bell, Qs. 4771-2).

(4) That discipline can be maintained and in the best works is maintained by proper supervision and moral control with the alternative of dismissal in the background. This part of the case was thus put by Miss Tuckwell :—

"From personal experience as a teacher and organiser, and working among women, I find that discipline is maintained without punishment—that the discipline is, in fact, arrived at without punishment. . . .

"Do the instances of their successful abolition (i.e. of fines) justify you in your opinion?—Those I have heard of, certainly.

"Do you know of any cases in which they have been abolished and in which there has been a reversion to them ?—I have not heard of any case, but if I had it would not shake my opinion.

"I am not sure of that. You should not commit yourselt to that till you have investigated it ?—I ought, perhaps, to give my reason. I should only feel that my alternative had not been properly tried. When one has had considerable experience in dealing with people, and knows that one can deal with them without punishment, what one feels is that the alternative, which is proper management of the rules, is unassailable, if only trouble is taken to get it.

"I follow your opinion, which is very strong, in this sense, that you think that proper discipline would effect, for disciplinary purposes, all that fines at present effect ?—Yes." (Qs. 5320–4.)

52. On the other hand, the evidence given by Miss Black, on behalf of the Women's Industrial Council, was that while the Council felt very strongly that disciplinary fines are a bad way of maintaining discipline, they did not feel that they could ask the law to forbid them (Qs. 5128–9). They considered that employers must have a certain latitude in enforcing discipline. Miss Lawson, speaking for the Freedom of Labour Defence, stated that, in her experience, many workers prefer fines to the alternative of suspension or dismissal, and that the prohibition of fining might do more harm than good.

53. As we have stated, the labour representatives considered that the employer's power in the last resort to dismiss an unsatisfactory worker was sufficient to ensure the maintenance of discipline, in the belief that the more severe the penalty, the greater its deterrent value. But dismissal is not the only alternative that would be open to the employer, if the power to fine were abolished, and we had to put to them the possibility of other forms of punishment. Of these the most important is the power of suspension (and in suspension we include locking out for lateness). This is a form of punishment actually substituted for fines on the London and North Western Railway in consequence of the restrictive provisions of the Act of 1896, and in other employments. We examined the workers' representatives closely on this point, and we found that conflicting views were held. Mr. R. Bell, M.P., speaking on behalf of the railway workers, was strenuously opposed to suspension except in cases of serious accident, but he thought that if the power of suspending men for trivial offences on railways were taken away from subordinate officials, the question would right itself (Qs. 4822, 4859–60, 4973–6). Mr. Shackleton, M.P., said that the workers would set their faces against temporary suspension as a system (Q. 6322), but he did not like to give a definite opinion as to the prohibition of suspension by law (Qs. 6366–9).

Mr. Twist (Lancashire and Cheshire Miners Federation), speaking for the miners, said that suspensions and fines were equally cruel and injurious, and that there was nothing to choose between them (Qs. 8139–45). The President of the same Federation, Mr. Greenall, said that the practice is occasionally resorted to in mines, but that if a man is wrongly suspended, the trade union takes action. He did not think it was a method of punishment which would be established on a wholesale scale, because a man who is suspended is not earning profit for his employer (Qs. 7613–7). Mr. Smillie, the President of the Scottish Miners' Federation, said that suspension was better than fining, but he did not like it, and thought dismissal more effective (Qs. 16963–5).

Miss Tuckwell (giving evidence on behalf of the Women's Trade Union League) thought that the system was as bad as that of fines, and was only another form of fining. She thought it should be abolished (Qs. 5341, 5348, 5358, 5366–7, 5829–35).

On the other hand Mr. Turner, the President of the General Union of Weavers and Textile Workers, said that he would not object to it so far as disciplinary purposes were concerned (Q. 6877): he thought it would be more serious for both parties than a fine, and so would not be so often resorted to (Q. 6959). Mr. Drew (Secretary to the Bradford Trades Council and President of the Weavers and Textile Workers Association in Bradford), saw no difficulty in suspension, and said that he thought it would be an excellent remedy as against fining (Qs. 6123–5). He was careful to say that this was a point upon which he was giving his own opinion, as the point had never been considered by those whom he represented (Q. 6127).

Nearly all, however, of the workers' representatives seemed to regard it as a right of the employer which could hardly be interfered with, save through the channel of the trade organisation.

54. We gather from their evidence that most of the labour witnesses who have appeared before us have not had any practical experience of suspension as an organised system of punishment. Apart from the mild form known as locking out, it had come within their knowledge only as an occasional penalty inflicted on workers in isolated cases. We have therefore no materials on which to gauge what would be the general feeling of the workers as between a system of fines on the one hand and suspensions on the other, except the evidence given by Mr. R. Bell, M.P. It appears to us to be significant to find that Mr. Bell preferred fines to suspensions. In answer to the Chairman's question, putting the alternative, Mr. Bell said (Q. 4834):—

"Assuming that we must have one or the other, I should say that I prefer fines, as a suspension is never less than one day, whereas a fine may be less than a day's wage."

We are bound to attach great weight to this opinion, because Mr. Bell is the one witness who possesses an intimate knowledge of the practical working of both systems.

55. There remains the system of locking out for lateness, which is a form of suspension. The question of unpunctuality is one that has been brought very prominently before the Committee and it may be convenient to refer to it here. It is the offence for which fines are most commonly imposed, and where a system of fining is not in force the alternative of locking out is often adopted. It is a common practice in many factories for the gate to be shut at a certain time and for workers who arrive late to be shut out. The period of suspension may be for half an hour, an hour, or even half a day. The necessity of some form of punishment for unpunctuality is recognised by the majority of the workers. Mr. Withey (Secretary of the Leeds branch of the Amalgamated Union of Clothiers Operatives) said he did not object to a small fine for lateness: "If they will not come in time I should inflict a small fine, and if that did not cure them I would clear them off the premises" (Qs. 5541–2). Mr. Drew regarded it as quite fair to shut out a girl who was late till breakfast-time (Qs. 6175–6). Miss Galway, who represented the textile operatives of Ireland, said she was strongly of opinion that locking out was better than fines, but she said that some of the girls would rather "stand" a small fine than be locked out (Qs. 16713–4). Miss Tuckwell acknowledged that in cases where unpunctuality would disorganise work, the penalty of shutting out a worker seemed to be, on the face of it, a thing which must be (Qs. 5794–7). Mr. Turner did not object to suspension for occasional late comers, though for habitual late comers he thought dismissal was the remedy (Qs. 6875–7).

It must be admitted that unpunctuality may be a source of trouble, inconvenience and loss, not only to the employer but also to other workers. A worker who is constantly late may not only cause loss to the employer, because his machinery is running all the time, but he may disorganise the work of other persons, where he is one of three or four who work in a gang. An employer is therefore bound to protect himself in some way against it, and if he does not care to fine his employees he must have resort to some other method of maintaining discipline. If there are drawbacks to a system of fining, there are also objections to the alternative of locking-out from the point of view of the workers. It has been put to us that, if the morning is wet, men and women who are shut out may have to stand about in the rain for some time, and run the risk to health. Moreover, there is the danger that workers who are shut out and have to find some way of passing the time till the gate opens again, will spend the interval in the public-house and thus fall into the drinking habit. We think that these considerations should not be lost sight of in estimating the comparative merits of this system and the system of fining.

The Evidence of Employers.

56. There was to speak generally some divergence of view among employers as to the value of fines as a deterrent.

Very notable in this class of evidence stands the testimony of Mr. Cadbury and Mr. Ferens. In both of these cases—very large works (Cadbury's Cocoa and Reckitt's Blue and starch)—a system of fines had once existed, but it had been abandoned or dispensed with. This was done under conditions exhibiting the most scrupulous care for the interests of the workers. Every consideration was given by the firm not only to the points of supervision and discipline but to more general questions, such as provisions for the health, comfort and general welfare of those employed; these provisions being furnished as part of the general on-cost of the concern. Even these gentlemen, however, would not commit themselves to recommend total abolition of any form of punishment by way of discipline.

While, however, these witnesses did not consider that fines were much of a deterrent, most of the other employers who gave evidence before us testified to their value. Some employers, who said they rarely found it necessary to impose fines, declared that the power of fining was invaluable to discipline, the knowledge of the worker of his liability to a fine being sufficient to keep him up to the mark. (McNicol, Qs. 17377–9, Siemens, Qs. 17497–8.)

57. We questioned the employers as to the manner in which fines were imposed, particularly as to whether a caution usually preceded the fine and as to whether an appeal lay from the official imposing the fine to the head of the firm. While, of course, the practice differs with different firms, it seems to be usually the case that in the best works cautions precede fines, and that fining is only resorted to for the purpose of pulling up a worker who has continually offended against discipline. In many cases the fine seems to be held in terrorem over the workers and is rarely enforced in practice, and confirmation of this is to be found in the very small amounts imposed in a year in some large works. Those of the employers who were questioned on the second point, declared that the worker could always, if he chose, appeal to superior authority against the decision of the official imposing the fine. (Harrison Qs. 9531–3, 9538–40, Aspinall Qs. 9761–5, 9782–7, Butterworth Qs. 11508–12, 11621–4, Taylor Qs. 11082–86, J. Ward Qs. 17670–5). The allegation made by the workers that fines were treated as a source of profit was repudiated by almost all the employers and employers' associations that gave evidence before us. The usual practice is for disciplinary fines to go into some fund for the benefit of the workers.

58. As regards the firms who do not rely on fines for maintaining discipline, we found that some resort to the system of suspension. This is the system employed by Messrs. Cadbury Bros., by Messrs. Reckitt & Sons, and by the London and North-Western Railway, and in the mild form of locking out for lateness it is in force in many factories. By other employers of labour a mixed system of fines and suspensions is in force (London and Yorkshire Railway, Midland Railway and North Eastern Railway). The difficulty of suspension is that, as Mr. Donaldson (Chief Superintendent of Ordnance Factories), Mr. Burton (Chairman of the Joint Committee of Pottery Manufacturers of Great Britain), and Mr. Siemens (President of the Engineering and Shipbuilding Employers' Federation) pointed out, it would in some industries interfere with production and with the employment of other workers, and this is no doubt the reason why most employers prefer a system of fines. Thus Mr. Burton says:—

"In a business like ours which is split up into a great many departments there are many branches of the trade. Perhaps in works like those of Wedgwood's or Doulton's and many others, such as my own, there would be fifty, sixty, or a hundred different departments, and the work passes on from one department to another. In many of those departments the thing is simple; the person works alone. But in many other departments, especially in the making departments and in the firing of ovens and kilns and the placing of the articles into those ovens and kilns, the dipping of the ware, and so forth, men and boys and girls, or women and boys and girls, work together in small gangs. Take the case of plate-making. A plate-maker needs two assistants generally, and sometimes three, to bring clay, to carry moulds, to help in the work, and so forth. Now suppose you suspend one of his attendants for misconduct or carelessness, you paralyse that man and his gang, it may be for a whole day, or for the period of suspension, whatever it may be. You are not only punishing the person who has committed the fault, but you are punishing somebody who has done nothing at all." (Q. 17077.)

For the same reason dismissal except in the bad cases is not a form of punishment which commends itself to employers. Mr. Burton gave us the following example of the difficulties that might arise :—

"Suppose, for instance, I had to discharge my head slipmaker, the man who prepares the clay for the potter's use. I am thankful to say there is no particular likelihood of that, but I know that at a pottery that would be regarded as one of the most serious changes one would possibly have to make. For weeks after that everybody who worked on that works might suffer in their wages because the new man could not do the work like the old one, and he would not quite know the ropes. When you have a man in that position you do your best to keep him at his work, because so much depends upon him." (Q. 17163.)

Mr. Siemens also dwelt on the difficulties involved in a system either of suspensions or dismissals from the point of view of the employer. He said :—

"It must be remembered that if a man is sent away he does not do any work for us—whereas we want the work done. So it is not in the interest of the employers or of the work that men should be dismissed—especially skilled men, because we cannot go into the street and pick up the first man we see and put him to the work." (Q. 17494.)

"We don't want to dismiss our people ; and if men can be kept right by holding over their heads the threat of a fine, which is seldom imposed, it is all the better for both parties—because workmen do not, as a rule, look out for opportunities of injuring the firm by whom they are employed. (Q. 17497.)

Would not the threat of being dismissed have a much severer moral restraint ?—No, it would not, because the men are as well aware as I am that the employer would not send them away except from the direst necessity, because as I have explained to you just now the men are practically becoming specialists in each factory, and if you dismiss a specialist and take on a novice you lose much in bad work, and you also risk the work being done badly." (Q. 17499.)

Official Evidence.

59. The principal Home Office representatives, Sir Henry Cunynghame, Dr. Whitelegge, and Miss Anderson, concurred in thinking some form of penalty for offences short of suspension or dismissal to be necessary, and foresaw difficulties if fines were abolished. (Cunynghame Q. 112, Whitelegge Qs. 282–3, 534–9, Anderson Q. 1356.)

Conclusions.

60. We have carefully considered all the different views and suggestions that have been placed before us.

We cordially agree with much that has been said as to the part that supervision and moral influence should play in the maintenance of order in a large works. These must be the basis of any effective system of discipline, whatever the mode of punishment may be. But it is notorious that the power of maintaining discipline differs widely in different persons. Just as in the school, of two masters, or on board ship, of two officers, one is able to maintain perfect discipline by sheer moral influence without the resort to frequent punishment, while the other has constantly to have recourse to some punitive weapon to enforce his authority, so it is with foremen or forewomen in a factory.

Moreover, not only is it the case that these important moral qualities are not possessed by every one and that the supply of such persons is not equal to the demand, but also all classes of workers are not equally amenable to such moral influences.

61. Nor can we altogether accept the views expressed by some representatives of the workers that dismissal is a sufficient remedy and a more effective remedy than a system of fines.

First of all it is not entirely the severity, but the certainty of punishment that is a deterrent. Secondly, the harshness of dismissal as a punishment would be most seriously felt in the ranks of unskilled and unorganised labour where the supply of workers is plentiful and they are least able to protect themselves. Thirdly the value of dismissal as a deterrent will obviously depend to a great extent upon the circumstances. It will be a heavy or a light punishment according as work is difficult or easy to get elsewhere. It would be very severe in cases, for example, where the worker is a specialist trained to do a particular thing, say to use a special tool in a particular works. In such a case dismissal would practically mean ruin. We have no doubt that dismissal for other than offences of a serious character would be felt as a hardship by the workers generally, and would cause not less resentment and sense of injustice than the present system of fines. We may here quote what was said by the President of the Weavers and Textile Workers' Association in Bradford :—

"I am afraid I am bound to say that dismissal is a thing which the operatives themselves shrink from. When I say that I am expressing the opinion of members of our society, I have not the slightest doubt in saying that they only accept that theory because they are told, and I believe have been educated up to believe, that it is best for them. I mean the girls, left to themselves, would submit to the fines. The difficulty, or perhaps the dislike, of finding new work makes them put up with a great many things." (Q. 6114.)

We do not consider that it is either possible or desirable that dismissal should be the only punishment for offences, whether regarded from the point of view of employer or employed, and we are unable therefore to regard it as a practicable alternative to a system of fines.

62. As we have already stated, however, dismissal is not the only alternative which the employer would have at his command, if fining were prohibited by law, and it is no use taking away the power to fine, if the only result would be the adoption by the employer of some other method having the same or possibly even a severer effect. The chief alternatives are suspension, reduction of wages and the bonus system. We proceed to discuss these in the order named.

(1) Suspension. There seems good reason to believe that in many cases the method adopted would be suspension, which is already at the present time preferred by many employers. What would be the effect upon the workers of the substitution for fines of a regular system of suspension ? We think that there is no doubt that under such a system the operatives might be in a worse position than under a system of fines. A man who is suspended, say for a week, not only loses his wages for the week, but he is subject to all the temptations which beset a man who has nothing to do, and if he were the head of a household the punishment would usually fall with the greater severity on the wife and children. In dealing with the question of locking out for unpunctuality we have referred to the danger there is that a man may spend in the public house the time he is hanging about waiting for the gate to open. The same danger arises of course in a more intensified form with suspension. Miss Tuckwell called attention to the far more serious dangers which lie in wait for the girl who is suspended from work.

From the employers' point of view the system is not altogether satisfactory. An employer wishes to get his work done, and any system of punishment which interferes with production is against the employer's interest. In the Potteries (and there are other cases of the same kind) men often work in gangs, and the suspension of one worker would disorganise the work of the gang. The effect of suspension in such a case would be to interfere with the labour of other workers and to inflict hardships on others than the actual offender.

It has been suggested to the Committee that suspension should be regulated by law in the same way that fines have been regulated, but we have come to the conclusion that any legislative interference is impracticable. Suspension is simply dismissal for a period, and we do not see how it would be possible, even if it were desirable, to exercise any control over the employer's action in the matter. So far as our remit is concerned we have to deal with it only as an alternative to fining. We are of opinion that it is a harsher alternative.

(2) Reduction of Pay.—This is a form of penalty which is in use in the Postal Service, on some of the railways, and no doubt also in other employments. It may take the form, as in the Post Office, of a loss of good conduct stripe, involving the loss of extra pay which the good conduct stripe carried with it, or of withholding of increment ; or, as in the railway service, of disrating or degradation ; or of some other form of reduction of wages. The system, as practised by the Post Office or by the railway companies, is a legitimate method of maintaining discipline, with which it would be impossible to interfere ; but it is clear that if fines were abolished, reduction of pay could be used in such a way as practically to take their place, and with more serious results to the workers. For there would be no such control over this system as exists at present in regard to fines. In the organised trades, no doubt, the workers' associations would be powerful enough to prevent any abuse of such a system, but, as we have already pointed out, it is not in such trades that further protection is so necessary. It is on the workers in the unorganised trades, where abuses occur under the present system, that a practice such as this would press most hardly.

As regards temporary reduction of wages and piece-work rates, we cannot see how it would be possible by legislation to prevent an employer dismissing an employee and re-engaging him at a reduced wage or offering him fresh work at a lower rate than previously. In the result accordingly it would be found that fines had in effect been re-introduced although in a circuitous, cumbrous and harsh form which might cause in many cases undeserved suffering and loss.

(3) The Bonus System.—Evidence was submitted to us as to the existence, particularly in factories in the North of Ireland, of a system of bonuses for punctuality, good work, and the like, the bonus being withheld at the discretion of the employer. It was represented to us that in its actual operation the system was merely a system of fining in disguise, which had been adopted by the employer to evade the restrictions of the Truck Act of 1896; the bonus not being a real addition to the wage, but a part of the wage, and so regarded by the worker. Instances were given in which the bonus represented from 5 to 20 per cent. of the total wage. Thus, Miss Deane said :—

"They lose 2s. out of 10s. or 10s. 6d. I found that this bonus in its proportion to the wages varied in different mills. In one mill the wage would be 9s. 6d. and 6d. bonus, in another the wage would be 8s. 6d. and 1s. 6d. bonus. The general wage plus bonus in the district is pretty much the same, but the amount of bonus in proportion to the wage varies in different mills, so that it really proves that the fine varies in different mills, but the total plus bonus is pretty much the same." (Q. 2,379.)

The Home Office tested the legality of this system by proceedings under Section 1 of the Truck Act of 1896 in the case of Deane v. Wilson & Co.[1] (see report of case in Appendix IV.); it may be instructive to set out in some detail the facts of the case and the grounds for the decision at which the Court arrived. The complainant was Miss Deane, one of His Majesty's Lady Inspectors of Factories, and the respondent Abraham Wilson & Co.

The respondents, factory spinners in Newry, employed Theresa Dixon. Her wages were 1s. 4d. a day, and the respondents also gave a bonus of 2s. a week for a full attendance and for that alone. Full attendance meant fifty-five and a half hours per week, and absence for even a quarter of a day involved the loss of the whole 2s., in addition to a deduction from the daily wage proportionate to the period of absence. During the week ending February 10th, 1906, Theresa Dixon did not give full attendance, being absent for a quarter of a day. Fourpence, which represented the quarter day's wage, was not paid to her, and the 2s. bonus, which she would have been entitled to if she had made full attendance, was also not paid to her. She therefore received only 7s. 8d. The complainant contended that the 2s. was part of the sum contracted to be paid to the worker for a full week of fifty-five and a half hours' work, and that the deduction of the 2s. "bonus" was a deduction for or in respect of a fine for failure to make full attendance, and that, therefore, the employer had committed a breach of the Truck Act, 1896, in that the particulars in writing required by the Act had not been supplied to the worker on the occasion when the deduction was made. The justices dismissed the summons on the ground that the 2s. was a bonus prize, or special consideration for full attendance and could not be computed as wages, and that, therefore, there was no fine inflicted.

"The 2*s.* which the worker would have been entitled to, if she had given full attendance, but which she never became entitled to, was not paid to her, and the question is, did this non-payment constitute an offence under the Act? In my opinion it did not, and I think the magistrates' determination "that the charge be dismissed on the merits" was correct in point of law. I am unable to hold that the non-payment of the 2*s.* which was not earned and never became due was a deduction from the sum contracted to be paid to the worker. There was no contract to pay it unless it was earned. If she had not worked at all during the week, though the contract for service remained, she would not have been entitled to any payment, and could it be said that when being entitled to nothing, she was paid nothing, the non-payment was an offence under the Act? Further, even if this non-payment of the 2*s.* which she did not earn could be possibly held to be a deduction from the sum contracted to be paid to her, it could not, in my opinion, be held to be a deduction for or in respect of a fine. The non-payment took nothing from her to which in any view she had become entitled, or to which when the week ended she could ever have become entitled. It was simply withholding payment of what she had not earned, and never could earn. I do not think that the Act was ever intended to apply to such a case which, in my opinion, is not within its letter or spirit. I can see nothing unfair or unreasonable in a contract with a worker to pay him so much a day for each day he works, and if he works full time for a week to give him, at the end of the week, an additional sum, in consideration of his uninterrupted work. Such a contract is beneficial to both the employer and the employed. Under it the worker gets an additional payment to which he would not otherwise be entitled, and the employer gets, what may be very important for him, uninterrupted work. To hold that non-payment of such an addition, when not earned, was an offence under the Act, would, in my opinion, be to deprive the employer of a fair and reasonable means of securing uninterrupted work."

The system is obviously open to grave abuse, and from the evidence placed before us we believe it is abused. We have considered very carefully the possibility of placing it under some form of control, whether the power to fine is retained or not. We are faced, however, by the difficulty of differentiating between the true and the false bonus. Where the bonus is bona fide intended as a stimulus to good work and is a real addition to the wage, the system is one which is of advantage both to employers and employed, and is adopted by many of the best employers. A suggestion for a system of this kind was in fact made to us by Mr. R. Bell, M.P., who proposed that a system of rewards or bonuses to those who do well, recorded by the giving of marks, should take the place of fining.

It might, we think, be possible to afford some protection to the workers in this matter, by giving a Court power to decide after considering all the circumstances of the case whether or not the bonus was a bona fide addition to the current wage, and although a Court might have difficulty in deciding the point, we recommend that such a power should be given.

63. One other alternative suggestion for the maintenance of discipline was made, viz., that there should be a "black list," or record of offenders posted up at the works. We cannot say that any great enthusiasm was evoked by this suggestion. It was made sufficiently clear that the publication of a list of defaulters week by week would be strongly resented by the workpeople.

64. On a careful review of the whole question we feel that while the system of dealing with small offences by means of fines should not be totally abolished, the time has arrived for its being placed under such restrictions and conditions as will prevent it being a source of profit to the employer on the one hand or the cause of improper or harsh treatment to the worker on the other.

If this method of maintaining discipline is still left to the employer, he will be less likely to have recourse to those alternatives which press hardly upon the workers and which we have passed in review.

65. The suggestion has been made to us that women, young persons and children might be specially treated, as they are for other matters under the Factory Acts, and also in respect of fines under Section 11 of the Employers and Workmen Act, 1875, and that fines might be entirely prohibited in their case. The reasons which have led us not to recommend the abolition of fines apply with much more force in the case of women than in the case of men, and it also has to be borne in mind that any distinction made between men and women, which might be thought to increase the difficulty of women finding employment, would meet with great opposition in certain quarters. We have, therefore, felt unable to accept the suggestion, so far as women are concerned. In the case of children other considerations arise, and we make a recommendation in regard to them later.

Suggestions for Amendment of the Law.

66. While the Committee do not see their way to recommend the total abolition of fines, there are, as already indicated, certain amendments that might be made in the existing law which, in their opinion, would go a long way towards protecting the workers against harsh or unreasonable treatment on the part of the employer, without impairing the usefulness of the system as a means of maintaining discipline. We proceed to discuss these. In making these suggestions, however, we are not taking into consideration the case of mines and quarries, to which we shall refer separately later.

(1) The chief difficulty that has arisen under the Act of 1896 is the determination of the question, in any particular case, of whether a fine is "fair and reasonable, having regard to all the circumstances of the case." There is no appeal from the employer's decision, except to a Court of Law, and, as we have pointed out, the Act supplies no criterion for the guidance of Courts of Law in coming to a conclusion in regard to this point, and different magistrates have often taken quite different views of what is fair and reasonable.

It has been noticed above that in the case of the organised trades a worker can frequently get an unjust decision remedied by the action of his trade union without recourse to law.

We should have been glad if we could have seen our way to recommend some system by which any disputes as to the reasonableness of fines or deductions could have been referred to some committee representative of employers and employed for settlement. Such committees are in existence for other purposes and would form much the most satisfactory way of dealing with the matter. Tribunals of this character (Conseils de Prudhommes) exist in France, and also in Germany, and their working has on the whole, we are informed, given general satisfaction. (See Appendix III.—Industrial Tribunals).

The abuses, however, which have been brought to our notice prevail more in the unorganised than in the organised trades, and we are afraid that the establishment of such a tribunal in these trades would present almost insuperable difficulties. We have been compelled therefore, though with regret, to abandon the idea, and have had to consider what other remedies were open.

The evidence we have taken shows that wages small in themselves are often subject to heavy deductions for fines, no regard being had to the amount of wage the worker is earning. We think it should be laid down that the amount of the wage earned is one of the circumstances of the case which should be taken into consideration. Effect would be most directly given to this proposal by fixing in the statute the proportion between wage and fine, which should not be exceeded. This suggestion was put before us by Dr. Whitelegge and Miss Anderson (Whitelegge Qs. 267–274, 424–5, and 488, and Anderson Qs. 1362–1372), as well as by other witnesses, and in some cases the Factory Inspectors have already induced employers to adopt it. The question what that ratio should be is not an easy matter to decide. The ratio must not be so low as to reduce the efficiency of the fine as a deterrent. After the most careful consideration we have come to the conclusion that a 5 per cent. ratio would be fair, and we therefore recommend that the maximum fine or accumulation of fines in any one week permissible by law shall not exceed 5 per cent. of the wages of the worker.

It will be at once evident to those who have considered the question from a practical point of view how deep is the inroad, which we thus recommend, into the present system, and how, if our recommendations are adopted, they may be expected to render impossible all those not infrequent cases in which the disproportion of the fine imposed to the slender wages earned renders the former unreasonable and extortionate. We trust that it will in effect completely destroy the abuse under which many poorly paid and loosely organised workers suffer.

(2) Another point in connection with the existing system to which we attach great importance is the practice which seems to prevail to a considerable extent in the less highly paid trades of spreading the payment of a fine over a period of several or many weeks. Cases were mentioned to us in which fines of £2, £5, and even £10, were imposed and were paid off by instalments of 1s. a week, so that the worker could not possibly get out of debt to the employer for years. Miss Anderson suggested that instalments should not be carried over more than three weeks or a month, and that then the fine should lapse (Qs. 1622–1625). We would go even further than this. While we think the 5 per cent. limit proposed above will go a long way towards putting an end to this practice, we still think it would be in the best interests of the worker that deductions by instalments should be prohibited altogether. We therefore recommend that not more than one deduction shall be allowed to be made in respect of one and the same fine.

(3.) Many instances have been brought to our notice of young persons of sixteen and under being fined, no allowance being made for the fact that they were learning their trade. It seems to us that to fine learners for mistakes which are often due more to inexperience than carelessness is unjust. Moreover, there are other ways of maintaining discipline with boys and girls. We have therefore decided to recommend that fines shall be abolished in the case of young persons of sixteen and under.

There are one or two further points in which we think administration might be facilitated.

(4.) It will be observed that the Act provides for proceedings being taken either for making an illegal contract or for making a deduction not in pursuance of a legal contract. There is no means provided by which a particular instance of an unfair or unreasonable fine can be directly challenged. Miss Anderson says :—

"We bring the case into Court for fining in absence of a contract, and the defendant, if he has got a good lawyer to defend him, will not allow the prosecutor to say one word about the unreasonableness or unfairness of the fine in itself as an element in the case. . . . . The result is that we have to bring a great many cases into Court which appear as purely technical, that is, failure to make a contract when a fine has been deducted, when really what we mind is the fact that an unreasonable fine has been deducted from the worker's wage." (Q. 1425.)

We think that the Act should be amended so as to enable the question of the fairness of a particular fine to be raised directly in such cases.

(5) It appears that in at least one important industry the following system of fining has prevailed. No contract is made beforehand with the workers as to the acts or omissions which are to be punished by fine, or as to the amount of the fine to be imposed for these acts or omissions, but on a breach of discipline occurring, the man is asked whether he will submit to a fine in lieu of other punishment, and if he agrees a contract ad hoc is made. We are of opinion that whether this system is technically a compliance with the provisions of Section 1 of the Act of 1896 or not, the intention of the Act was obviously to require an antecedent contract and that the system is one which defeats the object of the section. We think that in any amendment of the Act the words to be employed should more clearly give effect to the intention and make it compulsory to have the employer and workmen in possession of the catalogue of specific offences and the amount of relative fines : all this we think was meant to be included in the word "particulars." The words in the section which, it is contended, justify the system, i.e. "or the contract is in writing signed by the workmen," might possibly be omitted. The more usual practice appears to be to post a placard containing the list of fines on the works, and we think a placard publicly posted should be made compulsory. The placard should not contain any other matter. A copy of the placard should be furnished without charge to every workman on his entering the employment and on any alteration being made therein.

(6.) It appears to us to be desirable that the Inspectors charged with the enforcement of the Act should be kept informed of the fine contracts at works within their jurisdiction, and we recommend the adoption of a suggestion made to us by Dr. Whitelegge that a copy of the notice or of any variation of it exhibited in factories and workshops under Section 1 of the Act of 1896, should be sent to the district inspector (Qs. 421--3). We also suggest that employers shall be required by law to furnish on demand by the district inspector a return of fines imposed on their employees.

(7) In the Abstracts of the Factory Act, Mines Acts and Quarries Act which are required by law to be exhibited in places coming under these Acts, a brief epitome has been inserted by the Home Office of the principal provisions of the Truck Acts. We think it desirable that this should be definitely required by statute.

"In the case of a child, young person, or woman subject to the provisions of the Factory Acts, any forfeiture on the ground of absence or leaving work, shall not be deducted from or set off against a claim for wages or other sum due for work done before such absence or leaving work, except to the amount of the damage (if any) which the employer may have sustained by reason of such absence or leaving work."

The provisions of this section have been superseded by the completer legislation of the Act of 1896 and have ceased in practice to be operative. We therefore recommend as a simplification of the law that the section should be repealed.

3. Fines in Mines.

67. We have received a considerable body of evidence from representatives of the miners, from the Secretary to the Mining Association of Great Britain, from the National Association of Colliery Managers, and from H.M. Inspectors of Mines on the subject of fines for disciplinary purposes. Among the matters for which fines are frequently imposed are :—

(1) Breaches of the rules in force at the mine under the Mines Regulation Acts.

(2) Improper filling of tubs, or sending up in the tubs an undue amount of dirt or substances other than coal.

68. The maintenance of discipline is a far more important matter in a mine than it is in a factory or workshop, as on it and on the strict observance of the rules depends the safety of the men employed, and we felt that the question of fines in mines accordingly stands on a somewhat different footing and could not be decided without a very careful consideration of this aspect of the matter. We were consequently of opinion that the subject came rather within the scope of the inquiry of the Royal Commission on Mines appointed to investigate, inter alia, the administration of the Mines Acts and the subject of discipline in mines, and we learned that the Commission were actually receiving evidence on this subject. We accordingly decided to communicate with the Royal Commission upon this subject and also the question of improper filling. We print the correspondence that passed in Appendix I.

It will be seen that the Royal Commission propose to deal with the maintenance of discipline in mines by fines. We do not propose therefore to make any recommendation on the subject of disciplinary fines in mines. We have caused a copy of the evidence which we have taken upon the subject to be sent to the Commission.

69. The other question, viz., that of fines for improper filling, the Royal Commission do not intend to investigate, and their decision has placed us in a difficulty. Parliament has established by the Coal Mines Act of 1887, Section 12, a system by which allowances can be made in respect of any dirt sent up in, or of any improper filling of, the tubs. We are of opinion that any imposition of fines in addition to the system of deductions in the statute so as to duplicate fines imposed on the workmen, is improper, but we understand that the whole subject of deductions for dirt and improper filling is one of great delicacy between employers and men and that it would need very careful investigation and consideration to arrive at a satisfactory settlement. Such an investigation would have led us very wide of our terms of reference, and we have not seen our way to undertake it. We therefore make no recommendation on this subject.

4. Fines in Shops.

70. The protection of the Act of 1896 in regard to fines was extended to shop-assistants by Section 1 of that Act.

The evidence we have had does not point to the existence of any serious abuses at the present time in shops in regard to deductions from wages in respect of fines. It was admitted by Miss Bondfield that the Act, though in her opinion not sufficiently drastic, had had a good effect, and would have been even more beneficial in its operation had any provision been made for its enforcement by inspection. Generally the tendency seems to be towards the abolition of the system. This was the evidence both of Miss Bondfield (Qs. 13400-1), and of Miss Oliver (Q. 18531). Mr. O'Lehane, giving evidence on behalf of the Irish assistants, said that fines were still in vogue in some cities in Ireland, but they had decreased very much and that there was not much to complain of (Qs. 14037, 14163-9). All the employers whom we questioned on the subject stated that they had no system of fining.

In some cases, however, long lists of fines are still posted up (see copies of some lists of rules and regulations, handed in by Miss Bondfield, in Appendix XI. to the evidence.)

71. The recommendations which we have made in regard to fines generally will afford additional protection in this matter to shop assistants: and we recommend further that the Inspectors of the local authority, who already enforce the provisions of the Shop Hours Act, should also be empowered to enforce the provisions of the Truck Act in regard to fines in shops.

(B) Deductions or Payments for Damage.

72. This subject divides itself into three parts:—

(1) Deductions or payments in respect of bad or negligent work.

(2) Deductions or payments in respect of injury to materials.

(3) Deductions or payments in respect of injury to other property of the employer.

Each of which is dealt with in Section 2 of the Truck Act of 1896.

That section requires: first, that there should be a contract for the deduction or payment; secondly, that the deduction or payment under the contract should not exceed the loss or damage to the employer occasioned by the act or omission of the workman; thirdly, that the deduction or payment should be fair and reasonable; and fourthly, that there should be particulars in writing of the act or omission and of the amount of the deduction or payment given to the worker on each occasion of deduction or payment.

We propose to deal with these three matters in the order in which they are given above.

1. Bad or negligent work.

73. This is a very wide phrase. It covers work that is valueless to the employer, work that is saleable as inferior goods, and work that is not saleable in the form in which the worker has left it, but can be put right. It seems clear that the employer cannot be called on to pay his employee for work which is valueless to him, nor can he be expected to pay him for inferior work at the same rate as for good work. As the author of the learned memorandum to which we have already referred says (Home Office Memorandum,[1] p. 7) "The employer may say, 'I will pay you for making carpets, but every false stitch you make diminishes the value of the carpet. I engaged you to do good work and not bad, and for every bad stitch you make you must lose a proportionate part of your wage.' It is easy to see that this provision clearly does not offend against the Truck Act, the wage is for good work, not for bad and if the amount deducted is based upon the loss of value occasioned by the bad work, the remainder is clearly the wage to which the workman is entitled. Nothing in the Act says that the man is to be paid wages whether he has earned them or no."

74. The arrangement between employer and worker may take one of several forms.

A.—If the work is of a kind which is rendered altogether valueless to the employer

(1) He may contract with the worker to pay only for good work. This arrangement is adopted for instance in the cocoa and chocolate industry by Mr. Cadbury (Qs. 8412–7), in the Sheffield cutlery trade (Dodgson, Qs. 1095–1100, Wardley, Qs. 12311–8), in the steel and iron trade (Gavin, Qs. 16972–4), and, no doubt, in other industries besides; or (2) he may cover himself in the contract with the worker by making an allowance for a certain amount of waste. We have already referred to this practice on page 16. Complaints have been made to us that in fixing the wage rates allowances are sometimes made for waste by other workers. Miss Paterson mentioned one rather curious case arising in the toy balloon trade (Qs. 2709–13):—

Then do you know cases of heavy deductions for waste?—Yes, one finds that in some of the piecework trades. I have mentioned the toy balloon trade. There the balloon goes through a great number of hands, chiefly little girls; there are six or seven processes. The work is counted or weighed, sometimes one, sometimes the other. The only process in which there is any waste made is the last process, when the balloons, after being finished, are blown up with little bellows fixed on them; a very large proportion of them burst. There is no suggestion that it is the worker's fault that they burst; they do burst to as much as half the number, especially in some conditions of weather. But the workers who have made the balloons, the workers who have worked the beating machine, the workers who have vulcanised them in bi-sulphate of carbon, are mostly little girls, and the deductions come out at the end, not for what they have done, but in consequence of the bursting of the balloons; so that they all suffer for this unavoidable waste at the end.

You say they suffer; that is to say that the mode of computation of the wages is the finished product?—The finished product all through.

That is a curious kind of piecework?—Yes.

Do you mean that atmospheric changes might, for instance, alter these girls wages?—Not the rate of wages, but in certain conditions of the weather the amount, at least so I am told.

I admit not the rate, but the atmospheric changes to which you have referred might result in giving them a smaller or a larger wage?—Yes, the proportion of good balloons at the end of the blowing-up process is smaller or larger according to the weather.

We understood her to mean that the wages of each class of worker were proportioned to the number of successful balloons turned out. This does not seem to be a case of deductions from wages, but simply a method of calculating wages, and no doubt if the worker in the different processes was paid, not for each successful balloon, but for each balloon she made, there would have to be an alteration of the piecework rates which presumably are at present fixed on the understanding that there will be a great deal of waste.

B.—If the work is still saleable, though not of the same value as if it had been properly made, the employer may:— or (4) he may pay for the work at a lower rate. There is nothing to prevent him agreeing with his workmen to pay different prices for different qualities of work turned out; or (5) if the case is one in which it not easy to fix a scale of prices for different qualities beforehand, the employer may make a deduction from the agreed price for the work or require a payment to be made to him by the worker.

The last case is the only one which we have to consider; the other arrangements are outside the scope of the Truck Acts.

75. As regards deductions, it has been represented to us on the one hand by the workers:—

(1) That harsh and unreasonable deductions are made. Instances of such deductions were brought to our notice.

(2) That deductions are made for defects due to faults in the machinery or materials. We have had a considerable body of evidence from the workers to this effect. Provision is already made by the Act of 1896 against a worker being penalised for defects in work not due to his own default, as deductions may only be made or payments required in respect of loss occasioned by the act or omission of the worker. We questioned many of the witnesses as to whether any attempt had been made to obtain the protection of the provision by representations to the Inspectors or proceedings in the Courts under Section 5 of the Act for recovery of deductions illegally made. It appeared that in many cases no such attempt had been made. The President of the General Union of Weavers and Textile Workers (Mr. Turner), who said that the deductions for damage in the woollen-weaving trade in Yorkshire were made irrespective of whether the damage was or was not due to the act or omission of the worker, admitted that this matter had never been tested by the union in the Courts at all. This failure to take advantage of the provisions of the Act makes it difficult for us to form an opinion as to how far they are inadequate to prevent hardship. We are satisfied, however, from the evidence given that in many cases the circumstances are such as to make it extremely difficult to decide whether the defect is due to the fault of the worker or of the machinery or material, and that as the tendency of many employers and officials would be to decide the point in their own favour, cases of hardship must occur against which the worker would practically have no remedy.

(3) That as in the case of fines, the worker has no appeal against the decision of the employer.

76. On the other hand, in strictness it does not seem unfair that the worker should be required to make good defects caused by his negligence or carelessness. Mr. Shackleton, M.P., representing the Northern Counties Amalgamated Weavers Association admitted that there were cases of this kind. He said (Q. 6346) :—

"There are others [faults] which are caused by carelessness. Take a case like this. We are paid by the piece and there is a system of averages, driving the workers up to a certain perfection of quantity. In order not to get below the average in the mill a weaver would leave the whole four looms on while he went into the warehouse to take some weft. These looms would be going in his absence, and when he came back very serious damage might be done. The weaver might consider, 'It would take me an hour to make that right ; I will stand a 3d. fine rather than make it right' He will call the attention of the overseer to that and ask him whether he will allow that. That is a damage which the weaver, in a sense, is responsible for, because he left the looms going ; but his motive was that he might not go below the average in order that he might not lose five minutes, which loss might mean that he did not keep up his average at the week end. If a man goes out twice a day for that purpose, as he is required to do, in addition to doing so for purposes of nature, all those periods would make a serious difference in the fifty-five and a half hours. Therefore the looms are kept going and there are frequently faults. But the employer does not complain ; in fact he expects it."

Miss Tuckwell (of the Womens Trade Union League) also gave us an instance of a deduction of this kind. A firm of blouse makers who paid 3s. per dozen pairs for making blouses, deducted 2s. 4d. from the wage for 1½ dozen (4s. 6d.) because the strapping was omitted (owing to the worker's illness) (Q. 5287). Clearly this firm could not be expected to pay the worker the full price if there was this defect in the work, and prima facie some deduction in such a case does not seem to be unfair, though as to whether or not this particular deduction was reasonable we do not offer an opinion.

77. If deductions are prohibited the employer will resort where practicable to one of the other methods. There is nothing, for instance, to prevent the employer declining to pay anything at all for the defective work, leaving it to the worker to sue, and making a counter claim in respect of the damage. This would probably entail much hardship to the worker. The worker either gets nothing, or he is placed in the invidious position, as well as put to the expense, of taking proceedings against his employer.

The question is closely connected with the second branch of the subject, deductions for damage to the materials themselves, and must be considered in connection with it.

2. Injury to Materials.

78. Careless work on the part of the worker frequently involves not only the loss to the employer of the worker's labour, but also damage to the material on which he has been engaged. When the material is valuable, the damage may amount to a considerable sum. A great deal of evidence has been given before us on this head which has called for very serious consideration on our part.

79. Some of the evidence relates again to matters already punishable under the existing law. For instance, we have had many cases (relating to a period some years ago) brought before us in which the worker was compelled to buy the damaged article, the price of the article being deducted from the wages. This practice is not only clearly contrary to the provisions of Section 2 of the Act of 1896, which limits the payment by the worker to the actual amount of the loss or damage actually caused (in many of the cases that have been brought to our notice, it was clear that the article in question was not rendered entirely valueless), but has been decided also by the High Court in the case of Smith v. Walton[1] to be illegal under the earlier Acts. Successful prosecutions have in fact been taken by the factory inspectors under the Act of 1896, when instances of the kind have been brought to their notice.

80. Apart from this, many cases have been brought to our notice of heavy deductions out of all proportion to the wages payable to the worker for the work.

These have not in many cases come from the organised trades.

We gather from the evidence of Mr. Turner and Mr. Shackleton that in any serious cases the man goes to his trade union and the union steps in and settles the matter with the employer. A further indication that these deductions are not a serious matter in these trades is afforded by the figures of fines imposed in relation to wages given to us by Mr. Taylor and Mr. Crowther. Thus Mr. Taylor said that he had got out all the figures for three months as to the number of workpeople, the wage paid and the total amount of fines, for twenty-four mills in the North and North-East Lancashire Cotton Spinners' and Manufacturers' Association (Q. 10985), and found that the total amount of the fines imposed in the period of three months was £18 13s. 10d. This total includes, of course, all fines; it is not confined to fines for bad work. This, he said, worked out to about one-third of 1d. per week per person. Mr. Crowther, of the West Riding of Yorkshire Woollen Manufacturers' Association, had returns from different manufacturers in the woollen trade, showing that the amount of the fines imposed by them ranged from $4\frac{3}{4}$d. to 9d. per £100 of wages. The proportion of fines in his own firm for damage in 1906 was $5\frac{1}{4}$d. per £100 of wages, and fines in three years, from 1904–6, amounted in all to £3 17s. 10d., on a wages bill of, in 1904, £4,471, in 1905, £5,496, and in 1906, £6,511 (Qs. 11837–46). We think that these figures afford some evidence that the matter is not a very serious one, but it does not, of course, preclude the possibility of heavy deductions being made in individual cases. One such case was given by the President of the Bradford Weavers and Textile Workers Association (Mr. Drew) in the worsted industry, where a weaver at Keighley working on short time was fined 4s. 6d. His wages that week were 3s. 6d., and the extra 1s. was taken off the next week's wages. (Qs. 6047–8.)

81. As in the case of fines, the evidence of abuses has come chiefly from the unorganised trades. Many instances of the kind in the miscellaneous low-paid industries in which women and girls are employed were given by Miss Squire (Qs. 1866–84), Miss Deane (Qs. 2330–50), Miss Paterson (Qs. 2664–71) Miss Black (Qs. 5091–5102), and Miss Tuckwell (Qs. 5278–93).

Miss Squire gives us an example from the pen trade. In that trade the work is skilled and is entirely hand work. The wages vary very much, but they would be from 1s. 9d. to 3s. 6d. per 100 gross. A worker might be charged 6d. for each gross of waste, so that "it is not uncommon to find a woman who would be earning 2s. 3d. for 90 gross, being fined 6s. or 7s. for waste." This would not be deducted in a lump sum; it would be impossible, because the wage would not allow it, but the employer "would take off 1s. a week until the whole amount had been deducted. Meanwhile, if the worker made any other waste it would be added to her general debt; so that the result is that in some factories the workers are many shillings, often pounds, in debt to the employer." Miss Squire told us that it would take a worker a day and a half or two days to do 100 gross and that many of the workers in the trade do not earn more than about 6s. to 10s. a week.

Instances of heavy deductions exacted for damaged work from the out-workers in the Donegal linen industry and in the Somerset glove trade were given by the same witness (Qs. 1721–33).

Miss Deane gave us instances of similar deductions from the wages of young girls in the clothing, dressmaking and china trades. She quoted an instance in which a girl employed in a clothing factory in Belfast earned 5s. 2¾d. in one week. For damage to the sleeves of a shirt she was stopped 1s. 6d., and 7½d. for other things, so that her wage that week was only 3s. 1¼d., 2s. 1½d. being taken off. The previous week her wages were 4s. 4½d. This girl and others of her class worked nine hours a day, without counting the dinner interval. This case occurred in 1899, but Miss Deane said that the system still prevailed in clothing factories in Belfast and all over the country.

Miss Paterson gave us instances of similar deductions in the linen and damask weaving trade and in the wearing apparel trade of Manchester. We quote in her own words one instance which she gave us as typical of many :—

> "There is a case—I cannot call it a heavy deduction in itself, but it was a deduction that pressed very heavily on a child. This was a case only last week in a skirt-making factory. A little girl of fourteen was engaged in doing machining for the upper parts of skirts; she got for doing this ½d. each ; the thing was in six seams, besides a seam round the top at the waist part ; she got ½d. each for doing these things, given out in threes. Some damage happened to half of one, that is to say a sixth part of the whole skirt, and she had 1½d. fine. It was a small fine in itself, but it represented what she was going to have for the whole work on three of them. She had only been two months at work, having worked one month without any wages at all.

Her wage for the day was 3d., and it was proposed to take 1½d. off that.

Miss Tuckwell also mentioned many cases of heavy deductions for damage occurring in industries where wages are low, varying from 8s. to 10s. a week, and sometimes descending in the case of home-workers as low as 3s.

In a jam factory to which Miss Tuckwell referred, 3d. was deducted for each empty glass jar broken and full value was charged if a jar containing jam was broken, although the jam was not wasted but was put into the "mixed fruit tub" to be sold at a reduced price. This, however, would seem to be an offence against the existing Act. In another jam factory a case was cited of 2s. 6d. being deducted for broken glasses from a wage of 10s. or 11s. a week.

82. Evidence was also given as to similar unreasonable deductions from the wages of male workers in the boot trade by Mr. Owner (H.M. Inspector of Factories), in the pottery trade by Mr. Lovatt (the General Secretary of the Pottery Workers Union), in the silver and electro-plate trade by Mr. Wardley (a member of the Sheffield United Cutlery Council), in the clothing trade by Mr. Withey, Mr. Drew and Mr. Sclaire, and in lace-making and lappet and lino cloth making by Mr. Stuart (of the Federal Union of Scottish Mill, Factory and Bleachfield Workers).

83. The representations made by the labour witnesses to which we have referred, under the heading of bad and negligent work, apply equally here. Workers, it is said, are often penalized for damage due to causes not within their control, and no appeal lies from the decision of the employer or his representative. Further, if the employer chooses to employ learners and unskilled workers on valuable material it is unjust that they should be called on to pay for damage due to their inexperience.

84. So far as the employers were concerned, most of the evidence received related to the large and organised industries. In many cases the deduction was treated as a disciplinary measure for the purpose of pulling up a careless or negligent worker, not as a means of recouping the employer for damage done: and was, in fact, rather of the nature of a fine and imposed as such.

With regard to the allegations by the representatives of the workers in the weaving trades, the representatives of the employers directly traversed the statements that weavers were charged for damage resulting from defective machinery or bad material.

They pointed out that faults are often the result of the mutual emulation of the workers, who try to outvie one another in the quantity of work done, and the amount of money earned. They denied that pressure was put upon the workers in connection with the running of their looms. Where damage was done, they said that it was fairly assessed, and they were firmly of opinion that the abolition of deductions for this purpose would lead to careless work: that cautions or a record of offences, with the threat of ultimate dismissal, would not be effective in bringing about an equally good standard of workmanship, and that the alternative of dismissal would be very hard both on the workers and their parents.

The majority of the employers took the view that it was only fair that workers should pay for damage caused by their carelessness, incompetence or indifference.

85. Important evidence with regard to the working of Section 2 was put before us by the official representatives from the Home Office. They called attention to the provisions in the section that (1) the deduction must not exceed the loss to the employer and (2) that the deduction must be fair and reasonable in amount, and expressed the opinion that there was a tendency on the part of the magistrates in deciding cases brought before them by the Inspectors to treat the loss to the employer as the test of the deduction that might properly be made without regard to the other consideration, i.e., whether in all the circumstances the deduction was a fair and reasonable one. In other words what was intended by the Legislature as a maximum limit only, has been treated as the standard to be ordinarily adopted. It has, in consequence, been found difficult under the present powers to deal effectively with deductions which seemed harsh and unreasonable, having regard to the wages earned by the worker or other circumstances of the case. As has already been described in regard to Section 1, no criterion has been furnished in the Act itself as to what is "fair and reasonable."

86. On a review of the evidence, we conclude that, though many abuses have been remedied under Section 2 of the Act of 1896, and more might have been done had full advantage been taken of its provisions, serious abuses still exist, chiefly in the unorganized trades, and that for the reasons indicated above, the present statutory powers are insufficient to deal with them.

It remains to be considered what further remedies should be provided. The workers urged the complete prohibition of all deductions for defective work or damage to materials. They contended that it is humanly impossible always to do perfect work: that however good a worker may be at his trade, faults will occur at times: that such faults are part of the manufacturers' risk and should be treated as such They expressed the belief that the abolition of these deductions would not affect the general quality of the work done: the employer would still have his remedy in dismissal, and in bad cases of damage he could, they suggested, take proceedings in the Courts against the worker.

We cannot but feel that there is much force in the contention that it is impossible to avoid mistakes. The best workers will have moments of forgetfulness or inattention—it does not seem either fair to the workman or necessary in the interests of the employer's business that lapses of this kind should be penalised. They are a risk of the trade and should be met as such. Again, where the defects arise from the inexperience of a worker, a learner say, or a new hand, there is in our opinion no justification for allowing the employer to recoup himself from the worker's wages. If the employer for his own purposes sets an inexperienced hand to work for which he is not fully competent, the risk should be the employer's, not the worker's.

We are also impressed by the point on which much stress was laid by the workers' representatives that in many cases defects or damage are attributed by the employer or his representative to acts or omissions on the part of the worker which are in reality due to causes outside the worker's control, possibly due even to defects in the machinery or materials supplied by the employer himself and that no appeal lies from the employer's decision except to a Court of Law. Here again it would no doubt be the most satisfactory settlement of the question if it could be arranged for all such disputed cases to be referred to some Works tribunal which, with full local knowledge, could investigate the circumstances. We regret that there seems no possibility of this.

87. We recommend the repeal of the existing provisions relating to these deductions.

We are aware that, so far at any rate as defective work is concerned, there are the other methods indicated above by which an employer can safeguard himself against loss by the carelessness or negligence of the worker, and that our recommendations if adopted may lead to employers substituting, where possible, one or other of these methods for the present system of deductions. It has also to be remembered that an employer has under the general law the right to recover damages from his servant for any tort committed by him, such as injury to the employer's property caused by the servant's negligence, and that in such cases he may leave the workman to sue for his wages and plead the loss sustained by him as a set off against the workman's claim. (See section 3 of the Employers & Workmen Act, 1875).

It seems, however, to us to be better that the employer should, for example, require the worker to make good the defects in the work, or should fix beforehand the price to be paid for inferior grades of work, or that the matter should be adjusted by a court of law, than that he should when the work is completed in his own discretion make a deduction the amount of which the worker has no means of forecasting and in the fixing of which he has no voice.

It will be seen that the effect of our recommendations is that the employer should be allowed to deal with cases of careless or negligent work in the same way and under the same conditions as he will be allowed to deal with breaches of discipline. The deductions will cease to be a method by which the employer recoups the loss he has sustained through the worker's act or default and become rather of the nature of a fine. This, as we have pointed out above, is the way many employers treat the matter already.

3. Injury to other property of employer.

88. We have had very little evidence as to this: but on the merits it seems to be not unfair that a worker should pay for damage to property caused by his carelessness or negligence. Mr. Burton (Qs. 17093–7) thought that the deduction of the exact cost should be allowed where damage was wilful or negligent, and gave us an instance of lads in his works playing football and breaking windows.

On the whole, however, we have come to the conclusion that no special provision on the point is required. An employer will be able to sue for or plead as a set off any damage caused by the negligence of an employee under the provisions of the general law. Wilful damage is, of course, punishable under the criminal law. We, therefore, recommend that the employer shall not be allowed to make deductions from wages for this purpose.

C.—Deductions or Payments for the Use or Supply of Materials, Tools, etc.

89. This part of our enquiry relates to charges for:—

1. Materials;
2. The use of tools, standing room, light, heat, power and machinery;
3. The supply of tools;
4. Services rendered by the employer.

As in the case of deductions under the two previous headings, the Truck Act of 1896 required that deductions or payments in respect of these matters should only be made in pursuance of an antecedent contract and that particulars should be given on each occasion on which the deduction or payment is made. In addition, it also provided that the deduction or payment should not exceed, in the case of materials or tools supplied to the worker, the cost to the employer, and in the case of machinery, light, heat, and other things, a fair and reasonable rent or charge, having regard to all the circumstances of the case.

1. Materials.

90. The practice of making charges in respect of materials (using materials to mean things which go into and become part of the article which is the subject of manufacture, e.g. cotton, buttons, etc., in the manufacture of articles of clothing, nails in the manufacture of boots, glue in the manufacture of boxes and the like) does not apparently prevail in many industries. It is common in the different branches of the clothing trade, and we received a good deal of evidence with regard to that trade, but we have heard very little about the practice in other trades.

91. The chief purpose of the Act of 1896 in bringing these charges under regulation was to protect the workers against attempts on the part of the employer to make a profit out of the supply of materials, but the evidence which has been submitted to us by the official representatives from the Home Office on this head shows that considerable difficulty has been experienced in enforcing its provisions.

Dr. Whitelegge said in his evidence, "It is impossible for the workman who has not access to the employer's books to find out what the real cost to their employer is, and it is very difficult for the inspector" (Q. 301). Miss Squire, one of the Lady Inspectors, said, "The difficulty is really to find it (the overcharge) out. The employer may or may not produce his invoices or any particulars. I have been refused these particulars and the retail price at which one can buy these materials is not always a guide." (Q. 1894.)

It is to be noted that under the Act the burden of proof lies not on the employer to show that his charges conform to the provisions of the Act, but on the worker or inspector to prove that they do not.

Even where the cost price paid by the employer for the materials can be ascertained, it may be difficult to prove to the satisfaction of a court of law that the price he charges the workers exceeds the actual or estimated cost to him, for he can, no doubt in many cases with justice, plead that he has to go to considerable expense in booking, weighing, packing, and general establishment charges. (Owner Qs. 3295–6.)

It is clear, we think, from the evidence we have received, that the Act of 1896, no doubt in consequence of this difficulty, has not resulted in the complete eradication of the abuses which it was intended to prevent.

92. We give a few examples of excessive charges, chiefly from the clothing trade, which have been brought to our notice. It was stated, for instance, by one factory inspector (Edwards Qs. 4637–9) that one firm probably made a profit of £100 to £200 a year out of sewings, and that he had known things supplied to the workpeople by their employers at from 14 per cent. to 75 per cent. profit. Miss Squire stated that cotton and stitching material was often charged above cost price (Q. 1893). Mr. Sclaire (of the Amalgamated Jewish Tailors, Machinists and Pressers Trades Union, Leeds), gave us an instance of a master tailor in Leeds who made deductions for cotton, charging the workers 3s. 6d. per dozen bobbins for cotton which could be got outside for 2s. 9d. After a dispute with the workpeople in which they were out on strike for a week he reduced the charge to 3s., so that even now his profit is still considerably above that of the ordinary retail dealer (Qs. 5917–8). Another factory inspector (Owner Q. 3060) gave us the following instance from the boot and shoe industry—he stated that certain boot manufacturers made a profit on the nails they supply to the out-workers in that trade, or at any rate were supplying the nails for the same price for which they could be obtained in local shops, which prima facie implies sale at a profit ; he also mentioned a case in which an employer charged the workers 5d. per reel for thread which he bought for 4¼d., thus making a profit of ¾d. on each reel. Miss Edith Lawson (of the Freedom of Labour Defence) also stated that workers very often have to pay more than the value of the materials (Qs. 16525–33).

93. The fact that in many cases excessive and unreasonable charges are made by the employer is not the only grievance of which the workers complain.

(1) It is alleged that sewings are supplied to the worker by the employer only by the reel, so that a girl may be left with surplus sewings on her hands, which are useless to her and constitute a serious loss in money.

Mr. H. Withey, of the Leeds branch of the Amalgamated Union of Clothiers' Operatives, said "The reason I object to these sewings being deducted is that a girl will sometimes get an extraordinary light costume to make which has to be sewn with silk—say light grey. She pays 1s. 9d. for the reel of silk and will probably only use one-tenth part of it, and the other 1s. 8d. worth is left on her hands probably for a twelvemonth. If the firm had to supply it and let the girl use what she wanted and then take it back, it would not be wasted at all. It is altogether wasted, because that silk is rotting away the whole time it is standing idle like that" (Q. 5470). The same complaint was made by Mr. Buckner, of the East London Branch of the Amalgamated Society of Tailors and Tailoresses. He said "A man may receive a garment for making which he is paid 1s., but all the different sewings must be bought by the reel, which may amount to 1s. 6d. or 2s., and thus he receives no payment for this garment and his expenses are only returned if he has many more similar garments to make, since he only uses a small amount of the sewings for each. Each firm has its own prices for the sewings used in the making of similar garments and forces its people to buy these from the firm. All sewings that are taken on account are deducted by the firm at the end of the week from the wages, irrespective of the amount left, and should the employee be dismissed or leave the place, the sewings which he has in hand are useless, since each firm refuses to permit the use of any but its own sewings." (Q. 9087.)

One result of the system to which Mr. Withey called attention and which it it may not be out of place to notice is that girls are driven by it to various practices for deceiving their employer. He gave us an illustration. "I have seen the girls dodge these people (foremen). Where they are charging 5¼d. in some shops (i.e., factories) for a reel, they can go outside and buy the same reel or what answers the same purpose for 3½d. I have seen it done thousands of times. They go back into the warehouse and watch till the foreman's back is turned, then they whip out the cotton which they have bought outside for 3½d., and put the bobbin into the spool and run one cotton into the other and you could not tell the difference. The system encourages these females to act deceitfully to their bosses. If the firm supplied the cotton there would be no need of that. There are thousands of bobbins bought weekly at a reduced price in the town." (Q. 5473.)

The workers' representatives urged that the cost of materials should be looked upon as part of the employer's working expenses and, as such, should be defrayed by him.

(2) Another important point made by the workers' representatives was that under a system of deductions the workers could never know exactly what the wages they were going to earn in any week would be. This uncertainty was felt to be a hardship.

94. On the other hand, from the employers' point of view, apart from any question of profit on the transaction, the system has a distinct value in the safeguard it affords against waste or theft by the worker, especially in cases where the work is done not on the employer's premises, but at the worker's home. Take the case of the tailoring trade: the employer gives out stuff to be worked up into a garment at the worker's home; sewings and other accessories are required for use in the work. The employer does not care to provide these in the same way as he provides the stuff, as he cannot exercise control over waste in regard to the sewings, or at any rate not to the same extent as he can in regard to the stuff itself. Neither does it do to leave the worker to buy his own sewings wherever he thinks fit, for the sewings then might be of inferior quality or unsuitable for the particular work. By requiring the worker to buy the sewings from him, the employer secures that the right sewings are used, and that he does not suffer from any waste or mis-application of the sewings on the part of the worker.

We may quote two cases as showing how the system works in the hands of fair employers. One witness stated that in his case the cost of the materials was simply added to the piece work prices: "supposing you are going to pay 5s. a dozen for certain garments and the cotton will cost 6d. you pay 5s. 6d. and charge 6d. for the cotton So that it is really immaterial what the price may be because it is added, in as near a proportion as possible, to the payment made to the girl" (Q. 7064). Again, in the weaving trade a certain kind of fabric is woven with gold thread, and deductions are made from the wages of the weaver for bobbins of this thread, and the cost of the thread is refunded to the worker by an addition to the price per foot of the cloth into which it is woven (Qs. 6309–10). Mr. Shackleton said :—

"The only deduction we have, which is by arrangement, is this. We have what is known as gold thread. It is rather a valuable material, and you can quite see that if there were no charge made for it there might be waste. So we have an arrangement by which the weaver pays 3d. for each bobbin of gold thread, or 6d., according to the value, and then for each foot put into the cloth, the weaver has an addition to the price; so we balance it. There are fifty yards on a bobbin, and we have so much per foot; I think it is ·02d. per foot put on to the weaver's wages for every foot he puts in the piece where the bobbins are 3d. each. It is only a deduction in form. The wages are no less as a result; they get it back. It is only done to prevent waste."

Mr. Shackleton explained that this arrangement is one which has been agreed on between the union and the employers.

Conclusions.

95. We feel that there is considerable force in both aspects of the case. On the one hand there is no doubt a substantial risk of waste or theft or the substitution of other material, if the employer provides the material free of cost. Efficient supervision may no doubt do much to prevent this, but it must always be difficult in large works, as the evidence referred to above shows, to detect practices of this kind and still more so, in the case of out-workers.

On the other hand there can be no doubt that advantage is taken of the system by the unscrupulous employer to make an unfair profit for himself at the workers' expense; and we do not think, in view of the official evidence, that it is practicable by any system of regulation entirely to prevent this. Even if, as has been suggested, the burden of proof were transferred from the worker to the employer, there would still be ways of evading the requirements of the statute.

On the whole we recommend the abolition of these charges, subject, however, to a power being reserved to the Secretary of State to allow by order an exemption in special cases, such as that of the gold thread referred to above.

96. It will be advisable, however, to point out, in order to prevent misconception by the workers as to the effect of this recommendation, that it does not mean that the workers will necessarily get their materials for nothing.

At the bottom of the objections of the workers to these charges is no doubt, in many cases, the impression that their wages are reduced by the charges, and that if the charges are abolished they would receive their wages undiminished. This is, of course, not the case. It will not even follow that, as some of the witnesses seemed to think, the employer will be required to supply the materials himself. It will be open to the employer to require the workers to find their own materials—and in some industries this will, no doubt, be the case—and there can be no question of any interference with the practice.

Or, if the employer decides to supply the materials himself, the piece work rates, which were fixed on the basis of the worker finding the materials, will be proportionately reduced.

It is possible that the adjustments consequent on a change of system may give rise to some temporary inconvenience and friction, but we consider that the advantage to the worker of having a fixed net wage will more than counterbalance the disadvantages.

2. Use of Tools, Machines, Standing room, Light and Heat.

97. The evidence we have had as to deductions of this nature has related to:—

(a) The Sheffield cutlery and other trades and the pottery trade;

(b) The clothing trade, hosiery trade, laundries and engineering trade;

(c) The mining industry.

We propose to deal with this matter under these heads and then state our general conclusions.

(a) Sheffield Trades and Pottery Trade.

98. The bulk of the evidence which we have had in this matter has been in regard to these old-established trades.

The deductions under this head in the Sheffield cutlery, silver and electro-plate trades and the Staffordshire pottery trade are those of the longest standing which we have come across. The origin and growth of these deductions in the cutlery and the pottery trades is an interesting chapter in industrial history. Originally these trades were handicraft trades, practised by the workers in their own homes or in separate tenements. They provided their own light, room to work in, assistants and materials; and the piece-work rates were fixed on the basis of their finding all these for themselves. But the conditions of labour gradually changed: first, the factory system began to grow up; the workers were brought into the factories; the assistance they required was frequently provided by the employer; machinery, the provision of which gave the worker increased power of production, was introduced to take the place of hand labour; gas was substituted for candles. As each fresh step was taken or process was introduced an adjustment in the remuneration of the worker had to be made. A revision of the piece rates would have been inconvenient. Many of the piece rates did not lend themselves readily to alteration, dealing as they did with small fractional sums: moreover, attempts to revise the rates might have involved serious disputes between master and man. The system of making fixed deductions accordingly sprang up as being the most convenient way by which to arrive at a fair equivalent for the facilities provided by the employer which the workman had previously to find for himself. Mr. Burton (Chairman of the Joint Committee of Pottery Manufacturers of Great Britain) gave us the following interesting account of the origin of these deductions in the pottery trade (Q. 17059):

"It is a very complicated trade, and an old trade, in which handicraft still survives, perhaps more than in any other organised trade in the country. Machinery for performing many of the operations attendant upon the production of pottery, the preparation of the clay, the manipulation of the clay, and so on, has been very slowly introduced into our trade, particularly in some branches of it, like the manufacture of china. The consequence is that the method of payment, which has remained unchanged for about a century and a half, has been adjusted in this way, that whenever a fresh method or a fresh process, even a fresh method of employment, has been introduced, instead of making it there and then a question of wages the manufacturers and operatives have agreed that the former should make a deduction for whatever new process or new method of work was introduced. When the trade was first organised as a settled industry you must remember that in the Staffordshire Potteries the trade was all in small families. It was a family trade, as it still is in some parts of Germany. Then some manufacturers hired these people for a year from Martinmas to Martinmas and they provided a room to work in and material to work upon. The person who took the work employed his own attendants; he might employ his own family. That is very often the case to this day. He provided his own light if he needed it, and all the rest of it. The old system went on, and then when gas came in as a general illuminant the master said, 'You have always paid for your own light, and now that I provide your gas you must allow me, say, 6d. a score dozen,' and that was agreed upon."

We give a typical list of deductions in the Pottery industry:—

Notice.

The following deductions from wages are in force on this factory, and all workpeople's prices are based on same:—

Marl.—Saggarmaker allows 6d. per ton, on account of it being prepared instead of in the rough state.

Sweeping.—Pressers, Dishmakers, Jiggerers, Handlers, Turners and Throwers, 2d. per week.

Pugging.—Pressers and Dishmakers pay 6d. per week for having the clay pugged for them.

Gas.—From 2d. to 6d. per week according to number of lights in use, and whether women, apprentice or journeymen.

North Staff. Infirmary.—Journeymen, 4d.; Apprentices and Women, 2d. per month.

Mixing.—Printers pay 5d. per score dozen to the mixer.

Size—Printers pay 2d. per week to the mixer.

Any workpeople who object to these stoppages must give notice in writing to the office.

Signed..... .....

The system in the Sheffield trades originated in much the same way. Mr. Hobson (Honorary Secretary, Sheffield Cutlery Manufacturers Association) says (Qs. 12390–1):—

"Upon the question of the history of deductions it should be remembered that the cutlery trade was a handicraft trade originally. It was originally practised by the workmen at their own houses or in separate workshops, and not in factories. The factory system has grown up gradually at a later date. As the factory conditions have grown up it has been found necessary to make adjustments in their wages as to the men who were found accommodation and the men who found their own accommodation: the trade union price has been arrived at by the haggling of the market as to both classes of workers, and the deduction represents the adjustment of the accommodation found to the inworker.

"Then all these deductions have been a matter of negotiation between the trade union and the masters?—Well I should rather put it that they were originally a matter of negotiation between the workman and the master. I think they date back prior to trade unions. I should think when trade unions were first formed or were in their very early infancy these deductions existed and were customs of the trade. I do not recollect, myself, that there has ever been much question between trade unions and the masters about these deductions; there may have been in cases where trade unions had reason to think that the deductions were excessive, but taking it all round I do not find any great variation of practice between the leading manufacturers."

99. These deductions remained unregulated until the Act of 1896.

That Act, while imposing the conditions to which we have already alluded, did not interfere with the system itself, and it has continued down to the present time so far as we have been able to ascertain with little or no alteration in substance. The Inspectors have in many cases successfully taken action to put a stop to unreasonable deductions which have been brought to their notice, and an attempt was made, to which we will allude presently, to induce the employers in the Pottery Trade to substitute a system of net wages for the existing system, though without much success. Otherwise the situation seems to have remained much as it was. Representatives of the workers appeared before us to give evidence of abuses existing under the present system. It is alleged, for example, that employers make a profit out of the charges for machinery and gas; that charges are made sometimes for gas in summer as well as in winter; that charges are made for light where it is not used; that men are charged more for gas than girls, although presumably they use it equally. Instances were given us in the Sheffield trade of workers paying over and over again in deductions from wages the cost of vices provided by the employer for their use; of rent for standing room being charged despite the worker's absence from illness, or shortness of work. These abuses in many cases would be remediable under the existing law, and we questioned the workers' representatives as to the action which they had taken to put in force the protective provisions of the Act of 1896. The evidence given is so instructive that we quote the following passages in extenso. Mr. Lovatt (General Secretary of the Pottery Workers' Union) gave the following evidence (Qs. 13042–7):—

"Now, in respect to these unreasonable deductions, as you make out; for instance, in the case of the printer and in the case of labourers, has it ever been brought to your notice that that is an illegality under the Truck Act of 1896, which says that the deductions must be 'fair and reasonable,' and they must only be the actual or estimated cost to the employer?—No, I did not know that they were illegal stoppages.

"Why I asked you that question is this: has your union ever tried to apply the Truck Act of 1896 to the employers; have you ever called the attention of the inspectors to it, for instance?—Yes. In regard to that place where they charge for hot water they used to charge 2d. for messroom.

"About the deduction for fixing colour, have you told the inspector about that?—No, I did not think that they came under the Truck Act.

"I am rather interested to know what view your union takes of the inspector's duties in this respect. That has evidently been a grievance with your men and I should have almost thought that you would have consulted the inspector about a thing like that?—No, we have not, with regard to the colour mixing, nor with regard to the labourers. The charge for labourers I always thought unjust, but it is very hard to get anyone to produce the evidence unless you can get the inspector on the work, because his or her situation is at stake.

"That was just my point—that by consulting the inspector himself you would be free from that risk; the inspector has his own way by which he makes inquiries, and so saves any risk to the workmen; that was my whole point; you have inspectors in your district employed by the State for that special purpose. One of the ideas, I take it, of the Factory Acts is that inquiries shall be made by the inspector rather than that the employees themselves should make the complaints?—Do you mean that the inspector could inquire in the office how much per man was stopped for this labour, and how much the employer paid?

"Certainly, and he could do it in his own way without involving any particular employee. Your union has never thought of using the inspector in that way?—Not on those two points."

and, again, Mr. Holmshaw (of the Sheffield United Cutlery Council) (Qs. 12207–12213):—

"Now, you knew, I presume, that it was necessary to display these truck notices?—Yes.

"You did know that?—I may say I have only known it quite recently—that is since I began to make inquiries with a view to giving evidence here.

"Have you known of any prosecutions at all under the Act?—No, except that I may say there was this case I have here. This is the report. (Handing same in).

"Have you ever brought any cases before Mr. Dodgson's notice at all?—No, not of that description.

"I mean under the Truck Act at all?—No, none.

"Then why has your union allowed a piece of legislation to be in existence without the slightest attempt to use it?—In regard to Mr. Dodgson we did not know what his authority or his power under the Truck Act was. In regard to the second question I can only explain as I explained to Sir Frederick Cawley, that it is really because it is spread over such a wide area that it has not struck anybody that it should be attended to. It is one of those things that has been allowed to go by.

"Then we may take it that so far as the Sheffield cutlery trade is concerned the Truck Act has been for them a dead letter?—Yes, absolutely a dead letter."

100. As regards the Potteries an attempt was made in 1902 by the Superintending Inspector of Factories for the Midland Division, Mr. Redgrave, to get employers and employed to agree to the abolition of these charges and to have a net wage fixed (Qs. 679–685). These negotiations were only very partially successful at the time: but they seem since to have borne fruit, for Mr. Burton, who gave evidence on behalf of the Joint Committee of Pottery Manufacturers, told us that a large number of employers had now abolished them, and both he and Mr. Lovatt, who gave evidence for the operatives, expressed themselves as strongly in favour of the abolition of the system and the introduction of a net wage. That this would be a great advantage to the workers, Mr. Redgrave, whose wide experience renders his views on this question of value, has no doubt. He says (Q. 674.):—

"In the first place the compilation of these various deductions must take up a great deal of clerical time in the office of the proprietor and waste his time. They are, to a certain extent, extremely confusing to the workmen, and in time the workmen get oblivious of what they should pay and what they should not pay. They have a stamp put on it, but they never look at it, do not know whether they get or do not get exactly what is due in individual cases. Thereby a hulking girl or boy of sixteen, without any great intelligence—indeed I have known grown-up people—never bother to look at the weekly note to see whether their payment ticket has been correctly filled up or not, or whether their items have been correctly filled up or not. I think the abolition of deductions would be a great advantage to the work-people, because a net price is a net price, and they know what it is.

We may say at once that we are in complete agreement with Mr. Redgrave's views.

101. In the Sheffield trades there is, however, not the same unanimity. The representatives of employers and employed who gave evidence before us were divided as to the advantage of abolition of the present system. In order to appreciate the difficulties that would be involved in any proposal to alter the present system and introduce a net wage system in the Sheffield cutlery trade, it will be necessary to explain in some detail the peculiar trade customs that exist there.

The custom is for the worker (the grinder or the cutler) to rent what is locally termed "a "trough" or "side-room" (i.e. a working place) in a factory or "wheel," and he may either:—

(1) Work solely for the owner of the factory.

(2) Work partly for the owner of the factory and partly for outside employers.

(3) Work only for outside employers.

In all the three cases the piece-work rates, and the charges for rent or rent and power are about the same; and there is little or no difference in the net wage each can earn; but in the first and second cases the charge for rent or rent and power is deducted from wages by the occupier, while in the third case the worker gets his gross wages and pays himself to the owner of the mill the charge for rent or rent and power.

This system is apparently congenial to the habits of the Sheffield worker. His traditions are not favourable to the ordinary factory system as it exists elsewhere.

As Mr. Holmshaw says (Q. 12051):—

"Originally the cutlery trade was carried on in works situated on the rivers which surround Sheffield and which afforded an abundant supply of water power. Here most of the workmen rented a little land which they farmed in their leisure and when the water ran dry in the summer. Working as they did in solitary grinding wheels on the banks of the streams, it was impossible for the rules and regulations which govern ordinary factory life to become traditional among them. On the other hand very informal habits were formed and a set of traditions handed down which it is easy to see arose entirely out of the peculiar circumstances under which they worked. To this cause we must attribute the freedom from restraint which is so characteristic a feature of the Sheffield cutlery worker of to-day. It is this love of freedom which makes him tolerate practices which are the despair of those who wish to see his lot improved."

This evidence was confirmed by Mr. Dodgson, late Inspector of Factories at Sheffield, who said "A man is his own master in the sense at least that he claims the privilege of coming to work and going away again exactly as suits his convenience" (Q. 989): and again by Mr. Hobson (Qs. 12403–5).

In the first class of case, which is the nearest to the ordinary factory system, the substitution of a system of net wages for the present system presents no difficulty in principle; and in the last class of case, the worker is in the position of an independent occupier, and therefore outside the scope of this inquiry.

The second class of case, however, presents difficulty, as the accommodation and other facilities provided by the occupier are used by the worker both for the occupier's work and for the work of other employers. The occupier will not provide these facilities gratis to the worker for the benefit of third parties. If the system continues, we think the worker will have to be regarded as an independent occupier.

Where practicable, however, we think it desirable that the system of deductions or payments should be abolished.

The interference with old standing customs and the adjustment of prices that abolition would entail would no doubt call for tact and delicate handling on both sides, but we cannot but think that it would be in the interest of both parties if the whole present complicated and archaic system were swept away. Mr. Holmshaw, who gave evidence on behalf of the workers, was in favour of the change and believed that when made the men would settle down to factory discipline. Mr. Hobson, though pessimistic as to the effects of immediate abolition, expressed to us the opinion that "the salvation of the trade was dependent on its getting on to machinery," which would certainly result in a net wage but could not be hurried (Q. 12426).

The complete change, which will mean the transformation of the independent occupier of the second and third classes of case into the ordinary factory hand, cannot be effected by legislation, but must wait the gradual evolution of the industry. But so far as the first class of case is concerned, we recommend the abolition of all deductions or payments for standing room, etc.

102. The deductions in the silver and electro-plate trades stand on a different footing. These 'deductions' are of the nature of discount and a method of arriving at the rate of wage. We have pointed out above that such deductions are outside the scope of the Act.

103. We have had evidence that the practice of charging for the use of tools, machines, etc., exists also in the clothing, hosiery, laundry and other trades.

Miss Squire stated that in her experience she had found charges made by employers in the clothing trade for parts of sewing machines and other machines and tools, and an instance was cited by Miss Black, of a machinist, earning 12s. a week, being charged 3d. a week for use of machine and 3d. for use of a button-holing machine (Qs. 5071–7). Cases have been submitted in evidence where the worker had in this way paid several times over for the machine of which he or she had the use, but this, of course, is already illegal under the provisions of the existing law.

In the hosiery trade it is said that needles for machines are charged for sometimes 40 per cent. above cost price.

In some laundries, charges are made for the use of irons, and instances were given to us in which 1d. a week, sometimes 6d. a week, is charged for the use of ironing boards.

In the engineering trade Mr. Siemens informed us that the employer supplies the tools without charge, but that deductions are made if the workman damages or loses them; and he expressed a strong hope that no change might be made in the law which would interfere with this practice. He explained that it would be a hardship on the workman, if the employer did not provide the tools, and that if a workman was not held responsible for handing them back to his employer there would be a risk of loss and theft. This risk was accentuated by the fact that most of the tools supplied were tools which could be used in any works, and it was very likely that if the power of making deductions for the purpose was taken away the practice of tools being supplied by the employer would have to be stopped (Qs. 17516–8, 17583–5).

We fully realise that in the case which Mr. Siemens put, it is proper that there should be some check on the worker, but we think the point can be met without the power to charge a rent for the use of tools, machines, etc., and we favour the abolition of such a power.

104. By long standing custom the miner provides himself with the tools, &c., he needs for his work, e.g., pick, drilling-gear, explosives, candles; and the wages have been fixed on this basis. He supplies himself with these either through some co-operative arrangement among the men, or by purchase at the village shop, or he may obtain them through the employer.

As a measure of safety, however, the legislature has required (Sec. 5 of the Coal Mines Regulation Act, 1896) that safety lamps shall be provided by the mine owners only—and in many mines where safety lamps are used charges are made to the men for the use of the lamps. A number of complaints have been made to us on behalf of the miners that the charges are often excessive and that the employers make a profit (Greenall Qs. 7539, 7595, Twist Qs. 7923, 7930–1, Smillie Qs. 16782). These are grievances, of course, which are remediable under the existing law, but it is stated that a difficulty exists in establishing in a Court of Law what is the cost or "the real and true value"; besides the cost of the actual materials, charges are included for storage, carriage, and clerical and management expenses (Greenall Qs. 7491–502), and sometimes for things not legitimately charges against the workers (Smillie Q. 16782).

105. Alternative suggestions were made by the workers' representatives for remedying the grievance.

1. That the workers should receive their wages in full, and that the payments to the employer should be made separately and not by way of deduction. This would give them a better chance of a fair bargain (Greenall Qs. 7491, 7501–2, 7542, 7592, 7594).

2. That no charge should be made by the employer, and that wages should be readjusted on this basis (Smillie Qs .16822–8).

Mr. Ratcliffe Ellis (Secretary to the Mining Association of Great Britain) pointed out that the difficulty of this latter suggestion was that it would cause an extensive disturbance of existing wage arrangements and might lead to trouble (Qs. 9285–6).

If the present system is to be continued, it was suggested that the men should have access to the employers' books (Twist Q. 7927); that there should be an audit (Twist Q. 7928) and that any surplus from the charges should be periodically distributed among the men (Twist Q. 7925–6).

The Mines Inspectors who gave evidence before us on this subject considered the charges made were generally reasonable (Hall Qs. 3787–8, 3790–1, 3807–8): cases of charges which seemed high had come to their notice from time to time, but the matter had been remedied on representation to the employer (Stokes Qs. 4032–6, 4125–7; Hall Qs. 3726–9, 3795–6).

Conclusions.

106. We have come to the conclusion that no serious difficulty or interference with the conduct of the employer's business will be caused if all charges of this character were abolished. As appears from the account we have given of the industries in which they chiefly prevail, they sprang out of a condition of things which has long ago passed away, and in most industries they either do not exist at all or exist only in a very minor degree. From the point of view of the worker the system is objectionable because of the possibility of overcharge, which no regulation, however strict, can altogether prevent. We may point out further that Parliament has already dealt with the question in the case of a particular industry by the Hosiery Manufacture (Wages) Act, 1874, and has done so in the way that we are now recommending for other industries. It may be useful to recall the circumstances of that case, and we quote the following passage from the Home Office Memorandum of 1896 * :—

"In 1855 a Select Committee of the House of Commons was appointed to consider their (i.e., the hosiery workers') grievances. The report is in Vol. 14 of the Parliamentary papers.

This report disclosed a state of affairs very discreditable to the industry, and hardly any other trade has been affected by the same evils.

The chief complaint was that they were made to pay exorbitant rents for knitting machines, out of all proportion to their value, and that these rents were exacted by middlemen or sub-contractors, who intervened between the employer and the workmen, and who paid the workman his wages, deducting large sums for the use of their frames.

It was shown that a machine which cost 14*l.* brought in, in rent, 5*l.* 4*s.* a year, and that, deducting cost of repairs and adding interest, during its life of 20 years, the employer made a clear 57*l.* out of it (see the Appendices to the Report, which are very interesting).

The committee, of which Mr. Packe was chairman, and Sir Henry Halford and Lord John Manners were members, reported unanimously against this practice.

The matter was again considered by the Truck Commission of 1871, which came to the same conclusion; and in 1874 Parliament by the Act of that year made all contracts for frame rents and charges between employer and workmen and any deductions from wages in respect of such charges illegal.

107. We recommend that charges for the use of standing room, power, machinery, lighting, heat, or anything else which may be considered to be part of the general equipment of the works should be made illegal. In making this recommendation we fully recognise that difficulty will arise in adjusting wages to correspond with the new order of things, but this is a temporary and not a permanent difficulty, and we believe that the advantage to all parties will more than counterbalance any temporary inconvenience that may be caused. Sufficient time should, of course, be allowed in which to effect the change.

We think, however, that the employer should be protected against misapplication of machines or tools entrusted by him to the worker, and against loss of tools by the worker.

In the Hosiery Act, a provision was inserted empowering the employer to recover in the County Court damages from the workman, if the latter used the machine entrusted to him by the employer without the latter's written consent in manufacturing articles for persons other than the employer. Some provision of the kind seems equitable, and it would also be equitable as a protection to the employer against carelessness or dishonesty on the part of the worker, that the latter, if he fails to restore the tools entrusted to him by the employer, should be liable to bear the loss. We suggest that the employer might be empowered to sue the workman for any loss occasioned to him by the misapplication or loss of tools and the like.

108. Our recommendations under this head will make it unnecessary, we think, to continue the Hosiery Act in force. That Act requires that "in all contracts for wages the full and entire amount of all wages, the earnings of labour in the hosiery manufacture, shall be actually and positively made payable in net in the current coin of the realm, and not otherwise, without any deduction or stoppage of any description whatever, save and except for bad and disputed workmanship," and declares "all contracts to stop wages and all contracts for frame rents and charges" to be illegal, null and void. The only deductions, however, which are actually penalized are deductions for "frame rent and standing, or other charges." Our proposals, we think, will fully cover the ground. The Act, moreover, contains provisions which are difficult to reconcile with the provisions of the Truck Acts, which also apply to the industry. It is provided, for example, that nothing in the Act is to prevent the employer suing the worker for recovery of any debt due, a provision which is not easy to harmonise with section 6 of the Truck Act of 1831.

We should accordingly recommend the repeal of the Act, if our other recommendations were to receive legislative effect.

3. Supply of Tools.

109. In some trades in which it is the custom for workers to find their own tools, the employer sometimes, for the convenience of the workman, buys tools wholesale and retails them to the worker. We have had no serious complaints against this practice, and provided no profit is made on the transaction by the employer, which is already guarded against by Section 3 of the Act of 1896, we see no objection to it or to the employer being allowed to deduct the cost of the tools supplied by instalments from the wages. The workman becomes the owner of the tools possibly at a cheaper rate and pays in the manner that is probably most convenient to him. A particular application of this principle was mentioned by Mr. Burton. He pointed out (Q. 17098) that in the pottery trade large sponges are very important tools. He said "the question of sponges is a very difficult one. A sponge is a very useful thing to have in the house, and if the manufacturer provides these sponges they disappear. Anybody who has had acquaintance with the works knows that sooner or later a proportion of the sponges will disappear, and the man whose sponge disappears always says somebody else has taken it. Therefore the custom is this: sponges are bought wholesale by the manufacturer, who sells them to his workpeople. The manufacturer can get them very much cheaper than his workpeople, and he does get them and sells them to them. My point is that if he does things like that, where it is to everybody's advantage that he should, he should not make a profit out of doing them."

We think a practice such as this is one which cannot reasonably be objected to and we do not suggest any interference.

110. In some mines men obtain their explosives through the owners. We understand that this practice has been adopted in the interests of safety, and that the Home Office has urged that it should be adopted in all cases. The matter is under the consideration of the Royal Commission on Mines.

111. We recommend, therefore, that it should continue to be legal for the employer to contract with his workmen to supply tools, which become the workmen's property, and to deduct the cost from wages, subject to the conditions prescribed in the Act of 1896.

4. Services Rendered by the Employer.

112. These may be of two kinds :—

(a) Services rendered in connection with the labour of the workers.

(b) Services rendered for the comfort and convenience of the workers.

Deductions of the first class are regulated by Section 3 of the Act of 1896, the conditions of which have been already mentioned and in a particular instance, e.g., sharpening of tools, by the earlier Truck Acts of 1831 and 1887.

113. (a) Among the instances of services rendered in connection with the labour of the workers which have been brought to our notice we may mention the following :— pick sharpening in mines ; mending defective pieces of cloth in the woollen-weaving trade : beam and cut carrying in the cotton-weaving trade, and cleaning of looms ; clay-carrying, stopping (i.e., services of a person to make good small defects in the ware which the worker would otherwise have to make good himself) and other services in the pottery trade.

The history of some of these charges has been much the same as of those under the previous heading. They have grown up gradually with the organisation of the industry on a factory basis and might equally well be abandoned.

In other cases, however, the practice has been adopted on the grounds of convenience. In weaving, for example, the weaver finds it more convenient, instead of stopping to make good any defects of weaving in the cloth he has woven, to pay for the services of a "mender" to do the work for him. This mender may either be paid by the worker direct or by the employer who receives payments from the worker for the mender's services.

114. The system often affords a convenient mode of effecting a transition from one method of work to another. Dr. Whitelegge gave us an interesting example of this. The custom in the weaving trade has been for each worker to clean his own looms. The worker is under a strong temptation, in order to economise time and to get as much work done as possible, to clean the machine while it is in motion. This is a fruitful source of accidents. Recently in some mills, with a view to reducing the number of accidents, an arrangement has been made by which the employer provides the services of a cleaner to do the work. As the list of piece-work prices in the weaving trade is extremely elaborate, it is found more convenient to arrange the matter by means of a weekly payment from the worker, than by a readjustment of the piece-work prices. The introduction of the system has led, it is stated, to a striking diminution in the number of accidents.

It seems to us that it would be a mistake to interfere with a system of this sort, though no doubt it is desirable that this and other deductions of the kind should not outlast the period of transition, and should ultimately be eliminated by a revision of the piece-work prices.

In the case of pick sharpening in mines, Mr. Smillie, of the Scottish Miners' Federation, admitted that the present practice by which the mineowner provides the services of a smith to do the work of sharpening the miners' picks was a great convenience to the workers.

115. We have had little complaint from the workers' representatives as to this class of deductions, and, with the safeguards provided by the Act of 1896, we think there is no reason for interfering with them. As regards pick sharpening Section 9 of the Act of 1887 provides the further safeguard of audit. This requirement of the law seems to have been largely ignored by both sides. The power, however, would seem to be a useful one. If retained, it should apply to all deductions of this class.

116. (b) The deductions for services of the second class in regard to which we have had evidence, have been deductions made for the provision of messrooms, facilities for cooking, supply of hot water, etc. We received some complaints of unreasonable charges being made for these conveniences. Cases have also been brought to our notice in which employers have charged the workers indiscriminately for these conveniences, whether they availed themselves of them or not, but this is probably illegal under the existing Act, and we were informed that the Factory Department have succeeded in putting a stop to it wherever it has been reported to them.

The legal position of these deductions at present is not quite clear. We observe that it is stated in the official memorandum on the Acts issued by the Home Office that the Acts do not authorize an employer "to make a charge for the use of cooking utensils or firing or a dining room." We recommend, therefore, that no deductions should be allowed for these services. Many employers willingly and without charge provide all the conveniences referred to under this heading. There can be little doubt that their provision, by promoting the comfort of the workers, will also promote the supply of labour and possibly its effectiveness; but if it is to be made a matter of finance we think this should be done by separate bargain and payment and not by way of deduction from wages.

117. Some employers, we believe not many, have claimed to make a charge to the workers for such matters as the cleaning of closets, the services of the certifying surgeon, the cleaning of the overalls which, in certain dangerous trades, the employer is required by special rules or regulations under the Factory Act to provide for the protection of the worker. This is an attempt to throw upon the worker the cost to the employer of carrying out the requirements imposed upon him by statute—they are not services which the employers render to the worker—and we recommend that such charges should be made illegal.

118. We now come to the cases in which under the earlier Acts of 1831 and 1887 deductions are allowed to be made in respect of benefits or advantages provided by the employer to the worker or in which such benefits or advantages are provided as part of the worker's remuneration.

The Acts of 1831 and 1887 allow the following exceptions to the general principles which they laid down as to payment of wages in current coin.

	Deductions Authorised.	Conditions.
1	For Rent - - - - -	If agreement for deductions be in writing and signed by workman.
2	Medicine - - - - - Medical attendance	If (a) Agreement for deductions be in writing and signed by workman. (b) Employer once a year submits accounts to be audited by two auditors, both appointed by workmen.
3	Fuel - - - - -	If (a) Agreement for deductions be in writing and signed by workman. (b) Deduction does not exceed real and true value.

4	Materials - - - - - Tools Implements	If (a) To be used by workman in his occupation as a miner. (b) Agreement for deductions be in writing and signed by workman. (c) Deduction does not exceed real and true value, and in addition— (d) In the case of tools, if employer once a year submits accounts to be audited by two auditors, both appointed by workmen. (e) In the case of sharpening or repairing tools, if the agreement for deductions is separate from conditions of hiring.
5	Hay - - - - - Corn Provender	If (a) To be consumed by any beast of burden employed by workman in his occupation. (b) Agreement for deductions be in writing and signed by workman. (c) Deduction does not exceed real and true value.
6	Victuals - - - - -	If (a) Dressed under the roof of the employer and there consumed by workman. (b) Agreement for deductions be in writing and signed by workman.
7	Education of children -	If (a) Agreement for deductions be in writing and signed by workman. (b) Employer submits once a year accounts to be audited by two auditors, both appointed by workmen. (c) Workman may choose his own State-inspected school, and have school fees for his children paid to same extent as other workmen (whose children are sent to school chosen by employer).

N.B. (1) Sec. 24 authorises employer to advance to workman money to be by him contributed to friendly society or to savings bank, or to advance money for relief in sickness. But the Section omits to authorise deductions for these purposes, and even seems to exclude them.

(2) Sec. 4 of the Act of 1887 authorises the making of a contract with a servant in husbandry for giving him food, drink (non-intoxicating), a cottage or other allowances and privileges in addition to money wages as a remuneration for his services.

119. We propose to deal with these exceptions in the order in which they appear in the above list. We may remark generally that it is very difficult to extract from the sections the principle on which the matters included in them were selected for exemption. The sections are confessedly full of anomalies. Why, for instance, should deductions for materials, etc., be allowed in the case of miners and miners alone? Why should advances be sanctioned for some benevolent purposes but not for others? Or why require an audit of deductions for tools but not of deductions for materials, or a separate agreement for deductions for sharpening tools, but not for deductions for providing tools?

120. There are three forms in which this question presents itself:—

(a) The case specifically contemplated in Section 23 of the employer letting a tenement or part of a tenement to the worker at a rent reserved and deducting the rent from the wage.

(b) The case of an employer giving a cottage as part of the remuneration of the worker, as in the case of the agricultural labourer.

(c) The system known as the living-in system where the workers live on the employer's premises and receive food and lodging accommodation as part of the remuneration for their services.

121. The only serious complaints received by us came from the mining industry and the Scottish bleaching trade. Their complaint was two-fold. First, that the employer should be allowed to make it a condition of employment that the worker should live in the employer's house, and secondly, that rent should be recovered from the workers by deductions from wages instead of in the ordinary manner.

In regard to the first point it is alleged that men often have to pay higher rents than they would in the case of an ordinary house; that houses belonging to colliery owners are not so often cleaned and renovated as private property, and that when the worker leaves the employment he has to remove from the house, often at great inconvenience, and his wages are kept back till after the removal.

As regards the second point it was represented that it was a hardship to the worker to have the deductions made, whether he had been able to earn a full week's wage or not. The colliery may only have been working half-time, and the worker in consequence earned only half his usual wage, but the full deduction would, it is alleged, be made notwithstanding. They considered that the employer should collect his rent in the ordinary way, and should not have the first claim on the man's wages.

122. Mr. Smillie alleged that the power to make deductions was used by some owners to raise rents in a way which an ordinary landlord, or the owner if he collected his rents in the same way as an ordinary landlord, would find it difficult to do. He cited the following instances. In one case the employer at the request of the workmen removed an earthen or tiled floor in a whole row of cottages and put in a wooden floor. For this an additional 6d. a fortnight was deducted from wages for some years afterwards. The workmen were not consulted as to the additional deduction and were not told they would have to pay more rent. In this particular case if the men had objected, they would have had to leave: the tenancy of the houses was a condition of employment and there were only owners' houses available (Qs. 16782–5, 16875–9, 16911–5). In another case rain-water barrels were provided for the workmen and they were charged 2d. a fortnight extra on the rent for this (Q. 16880).

So far as concerns making alterations and putting an addition therefor on to the rent, it is plain that landlords, other than employers, might have done the same.

Mr. Smillie, while recognising that the abolition of deductions from wages for rent "would not protect the workman against the employer turning him out of the house if he cared to do so," (Q. 16943) nevertheless thought that it would place the two parties to the bargain on a more equal footing.

123. On the employers' side, Mr. Siemens (Engineering and Shipbuilding Employers' Federation) gave evidence on this subject with regard to the engineering and shipbuilding trades. He stated that according to the reports he had received from members of his Federation on the North-East coast and in the Manchester and Bolton districts the practice of collecting rents by deductions from wages was common; that the deduction was made in the majority of cases by the express desire of the workmen, to whom it was a convenience, and who preferred that rent should be collected in this way. He said "it is the evidence of our Federation that the workmen like it because they are compelled—there are people in this world, who, whenever they get money in their hands, let it slip through their fingers; they know it themselves and are very glad if they are saved from themselves, so to speak, by this sort of deduction" (Q. 17638). He said that workmen who left the employment had to leave the house.

No complaint was received by us from the workmen in this industry.

In his own case, however, Mr. Siemens stated deductions were not made from the wages of the men for rent. The rents were collected by a house agent, and the house agent had, so far as he knew, not experienced more than the usual difficulty in the collection of the rents.

Mr. Healy, giving evidence on behalf of the Scottish Chamber of Manufacturing Industries, stated that about 8 per cent. of the firms in his Association from whom he had heard made deductions for rent: that the arrangement was merely a matter of convenience and was of no interest to the employer. In one case the houses are rented off at cheap rates to the employees, on the understanding that the rent will be deducted from wages, in order to attract the necessary labour which is difficult to get.

124. The official evidence we had in regard to this matter related to abuses already punishable under the existing law which had been put a stop to.

Miss Squire instanced a case which had come to her notice in Gloucester. A lucifer match manufacturer in that city owns houses in one street. One girl employed in his factory, a piece-worker, earning a varying wage, never received any money because it was always going to make up arrears in her father's rent. Miss Squire says she traced her wages book back for two months and found that whatever this girl earned, whether large or small, was kept back for the rent. Similar cases were mentioned by the same witness as occurring in the textile districts of Yorkshire.

The employers were successfully prosecuted.

125. With regard to letting houses at a rent reserved, we have come to the following conclusions :

(1) The question of taking away the employer's power to make it a condition of employment that the employee should live in the employer's house is a very far-reaching one which would affect not only employers and workpeople in industrial occupations, but also the important agricultural industry, railway employment, and many occupations of a private character. We have taken no evidence on the question, except in the one or two cases already referred to, and we are not in a position to form an opinion as to the effects which would follow a prohibition of this kind. Much excellent work has been done both by private employers and local bodies in providing housing accommodation for their employees, as at Bournville, Brodsworth, Port Sunlight, etc., and nothing, of course, should be done which would tend to discourage the building of decent houses for their workers by employers. In some cases it is a necessity of the work that the worker should live in the employer's house.

Some of us entertain the opinion that any kind of compulsion in the matter is objectionable and should not be allowed, but do not put this forward as a considered recommendation on evidence.

(2) As regards the power to make charges for rent by way of deduction from wages instead of by a separate transaction, we do not find that any serious grievance or abuse has been established. The convenience and economy of the arrangement also are obvious. The power to deduct the rent from wages no doubt saves bad debts and the employment of agents ; and simplifies accounts. The employer could afford to let at a lower rent, but whether this is the result in fact we do not know. When industries are started in outside districts where no accommodation exists, the employer is bound to build houses for his workers. Many villages have sprung up round a mine or a factory. Though the cases are numerous in which the workers live in houses owned by the employers, complaints have only reached us from one or two trades.

On the other hand it is clear that in the industries which have been represented before us the workers feel very strongly on the subject, and there is no doubt force in their representations that a workman will feel more hesitation in approaching his employer if he wants any repairs or renovation done than he would if the relationship between him and the owner of the property were merely the ordinary one of landlord and tenant. A workman who takes an employer's house cannot feel in quite the same free position to bargain as he would be with an ordinary landlord, and this feeling is no doubt intensified by the power to deduct the rent from his wages. The workers would prefer even the arrangement which is in force at some places where the workman receives his wages at one window and pays over his rent at the next window. The matter is, we think, one on which the feeling of the workers might very properly be considered.

We recommend that the present exception allowing deductions from wages for rent should not be continued, but that any contracts or payments should be part of a separate transaction.

126. The Act of 1831 only authorised an employer to let a house to his workman, and under conditions. It did not authorise him to give a house as part of the remuneration of labour; and to do so was a breach of the provision of that Act requiring the whole remuneration of labour to be in current coin. In the Act of 1887, a provision was inserted to allow a cottage to be given as part wages in the agricultural industry—in order, no doubt, to save an old-standing practice. Why the exception was confined to agriculture, we do not know. The practice prevails, we believe, in other industries, including the railway industry and the mining industry in some districts of the country, and it certainly does in private employments coming within the Act. No evidence on the subject has been submitted to us on behalf of the workers either as regards the agricultural industry or any other industry. We do not recommend any interference with the practice.

(c) Living-in System.

127. We deal later with the question of living-in as it affects shop-assistants, and confine ourselves here to the industries covered by the Acts.

We have no exact information as to the extent to which this practice prevails in occupations covered by the Acts. It exists in certain workshop industries. Miss Deane says (Q. 2457):—

> "The heads of millinery and dressmaking workshops often live in; milliners more often live in than dressmakers; but I do not think that it exists very largely. Where I have found it is amongst foreign workers. It is getting more and more the custom for French women to be brought over in a number for the season, and they live in."

We understand that the system is found to some extent also in retail bake-houses, in the photographic trade and in laundries.

The practice prevails, too, to a certain extent in agriculture and also in private employments coming under the Act. It appears doubtful whether it is covered by the existing exception in the Act, which speaks of a tenement or part of a tenement being demised to a worker, but no attempt has been made, so far as we know, to interfere with the system and we see no reason why the exception should not include the provision of accommodation in the employer's own house as well as on separate premises. We recommend that the exception should be worded so as to do so.

(2) Deductions for Medicine and Medical Attendance.

128. The evidence which we have had in regard to this matter relates chiefly to the mining industry, the engineering trade and the iron and steel trade.

In addition to the evidence of the workers and of the employers, we had the advantage of having the considered views of the medical profession put before us by Mr. Smith Whitaker, Medical Secretary to the British Medical Association.

129. According to the information supplied to the British Medical Association, it appears that the arrangements under section 23 for the supply of medical attendance by the employers now take one of four forms:—

(1) The employer appoints and pays the doctor, deducting each man's quota from his wages, and as a rule paying over to the doctor the full amount of the deductions.

(2) The workmen are allowed to nominate the doctor, and the deductions are paid over to him by the employer.

(3) Each workman is allowed to select his own doctor from among those practising in the district, and the deductions from the wages of each workman are paid over to the doctor of his selection.

Mr. Smith Whitaker explained, as regards the legal position under these different arrangements, that the association took the view that the contract in each case is between the employer and the doctor; but instead of contracting himself with the doctor, the employer may empower the workmen to do so. Thus, in arrangements (1), (2), and (3), the employer contracts with the doctor himself, and in arrangement (4), he delegates his power to the workmen.

Asked which of these systems he thought the best, Mr. Smith Whitaker said that in the view of the association the best way was to let the individual workman have his choice of doctor, and the next best, that the general body of workmen should be allowed to decide, by a majority, upon the doctor or doctors for the works. He admitted, however, that in several parts of the country the profession take a different view. In the Rhondda Valley, for example, the surgeons hold strongly the view that a better type of doctor is obtained if there is the prospect of a reasonably good income and the security that comes from being appointed by the general body of workmen. But the general conclusion of the association, after careful inquiry and deliberation, has been that medical attendance under contracts of any kind will be most satisfactorily given when the individual patient is allowed, so far as the circumstances of the district permit, to choose his own doctor.

Mr. Smith Whitaker was strongly in favour of the present system of deductions from wages being allowed to continue. He said "In all these works the testimony is overwhelming that any attempt to get the doctor paid by private arrangement breaks down and that the only way which really secured working men satisfactory medical attendance is to have the money deducted from wages at the pit or at the works office." He was also in favour of the contributions being compulsory. He thought it was to the interests of the general body of workmen and to the interest also of the average individual workman, regarding his life as a whole, that such an obligation should be imposed. But compulsion should only be exercised in this way, –that where the majority agree to a deduction for medical attendance the majority should be allowed to bind the minority, with reasonable exceptions for men already contributing to some other fund or society guaranteeing him medical attendance. In the case of men leaving their employment, he thought the hardship was very small, because during the time they have been in the employment they have been insured against the cost of medical attendance.

130. Other evidence on behalf of the profession was given by Dr. Crawford and Mr. Thomson of the Scottish Midland and Western Medical Association, an association composed of men engaged in mining practice, and deriving the greater part of their emoluments from the contributions deducted from the wages of the miners and other workmen. The average amount deducted for this purpose in Scotland was stated to be 3d. per week per man. They explained that the system in Scotland was for one or more doctors in large works to be appointed by the workmen. If they are dissatisfied with a doctor they hold a meeting and have him removed. The advantage of the system to the worker is that he gets medical attendance for himself and his family at a cheaper rate; the advantage to the doctor is that he has no trouble in the collection of his money. Both of these gentlemen maintained that the great majority of the workers are in favour of the system, that there is no compulsion on the men to contribute, and if there are any objectors all they have to say is that they prefer to make their own arrangements for medical attendance privately. Such a case, for instance, might be where a man lived at a great distance from his work and it would neither be convenient for him to go to the works doctor nor for the doctor to go to him. They expressed themselves as opposed to any element of compulsion or to the deductions being made a condition of employment.

131. The only representatives of the workers who had anything to say on the subject were Mr. Smillie (representing the Scottish Miners Federation), and Mr. Gavin (representing the Amalgamated Union of Iron and Steel Workers of Great Britain). Mr. Smillie thought that the workers ought to have their choice of doctor; if only one doctor were provided the workmen should choose him, and if there were more than a certain number of workmen, they should have the right of two or three doctors, according to the number of men employed. The doctors should live within a certain distance of the works. But he thought that workmen should be allowed to refuse to pay, if they so desired, and to provide themselves with medical attendance privately (16816, 16818, 16848), and objected strongly to compulsion; pointing out that the works doctor may be a man not liked by some of the workmen and that he may live a long way off.

Mr. Gavin thought that control of the arrangements for securing medical attendance and the moneys subscribed should be in the hands of a committee of the workers; and he also objected to compulsion on the same grounds as Mr. Smillie. Both Mr. Smillie and Mr. Gavin gave us the benefit of their own personal experience in the matter. Each of them had contributed for ten years towards the salary of a works doctor who was never called in because each preferred some other doctor.

As regards the payments to the employer being collected by deductions from wages, their evidence was as follows:—Mr. Smillie said (Q. 16782):

"Then medical fees are kept off. The workmen do not object so much to that because the employer is bound to supply to the workmen's auditors the doctor's receipt for the total moneys paid, less perhaps a percentage for the trouble of making the deductions."

Mr. Gavin said (Q. 16981):

"The next point is with regard to the deductions from the wages of workmen in various steel and iron works for subscriptions to hospitals and infirmaries and to club doctors. Do you object to those deductions?—No, we do not object to them. There is no complaint from the men regarding those deductions being made. The complaint is that we have no control over the disbursement of the money."

132. We questioned some of the employers who appeared before us on the subject. Mr. Siemens pointed out that there could be no grievance in this matter, because these deductions cannot be made except with the workmen's consent, and the workmen need not have the deductions made if they do not like them. He thought that the workmen generally recognised that the arrangement was to their advantage. Mr. Burton was against compulsion to contribute, but said that if the workmen were to have a choice of doctors, it might be a question whether it would be worth anyone's while to be a works doctor.

133. Many of the factory inspectors who gave evidence before us had come across arrangements of this kind, and their general opinion was that there was no objection in principle to such arrangements, provided the control of them was in the hands of the workers and the contributions were not compulsory and were not made a condition of employment.

134. The exception dates from a period when the provision of medical attendance was less adequate than it is at the present day. We think there is no longer any absolute necessity that the matter should be arranged for by the employer. It is one which the workmen are quite capable of arranging for themselves. The evidence which we have taken satisfies us as to the great value of combination among the workmen for the provision of medical attendance by means of regular contributions; the prudence of such a provision, especially in the case of employments where the consequences of sickness or casualty are not infrequent, is unquestionable in the interests of the workmen. The widespread existence of such arrangements is a proof that this is fully realised, and we think that the matter can be left in the hands of the workmen themselves. This will involve the repeal of the exception in section 23 allowing the employer to contract with his workmen for the supply of medical attendance, and will dispose of the question of compulsion, so far as compulsion can be touched at all. It is obvious that no legislation can touch the indirect compulsion which can be exercised either by the general opinion at the works of the man's fellow-workers or by the employer.

135. The question of permitting the continuance of deductions from wages for this purpose is a more difficult question.

If, as we recommend, the arrangements cease to be made by the employer under section 23, and are made by the workmen themselves, the question of deductions assumes a different character. They become payments by the employer on the workman's authority and, under the decision in Hewlett v. Allen[1], are equivalent to payments to the worker himself. The position will be the same in fact as in the case of sick clubs, &c., which we discuss later.

It is said that the collection of the workers' contributions by means of deductions from wages is necessary to secure regularity in the payments, without which it would be impossible to maintain the present arrangements for the supply to the workman of medical attendance. In the case of works, e.g., a mine or quarry, situated in an outlying district with no medical attendance readily available, some guarantee that a certain fixed sum will be forthcoming may be required to induce a medical man to settle there.

136. Our recommendations are—

(a) That the exception in section 23 of the Act of 1831 allowing the employer to contract with his workmen for the supply of medical attendance should be repealed.

(b) That the doctor or doctors must be the choice of the workmen themselves.

(c) That the contributions may either be collected by the workmen and paid over direct to the doctor, or may, at the request of the workmen, be deducted by the employer from the wages for the purpose of being paid either to the workmen's representatives or to the doctor, under arrangements made between employers and workmen.

(d) That no commission on account of the services rendered by the employer in this transaction be allowed by law.

(3). Deductions in respect of Fuel.

137. The evidence which we have had in regard to this matter has related solely to the sale of coal to miners for home consumption. In some cases the coal is given free.

The only evidence on this head from the miners' representatives was that given by Mr. Smillie (President of the Scottish Miners' Federation). He said that the miners got their coal rather cheaper, say 2s. to 3s. a ton cheaper, than the outside public, but that he would prefer that deductions for this purpose should be done away with. He thought that if instead of paying for the coal by deductions from wages, the miners themselves paid the money to the employer, they would get the coal still cheaper. But even if the employers refused to let the miners have the coal, unless they were allowed to deduct the cost from wages, even with that prospect of loss to the miners, he would still abolish the present system of deductions (Qs. 16931–7).

Mr. Hodges (Manager of the Whitwood Collieries) said that the Whitwood Collieries supplied their men with coal at 2s. a ton (Q. 11185), and Mr. Hall (H.M. Inspector of Mines for Lancashire and Cheshire district), who has had a wide experience, considered that the custom was an advantage to the men; he said it was true that in Lancashire the custom was of little advantage to the men because there the miners pay as much as the average Londoner, but in other districts they get the coal at cost price or for nothing (Qs. 3924–5, 3928). He thought, however, that there should be no compulsion on the miner to buy his coal in this way, but his experience was that the system was voluntary and that the owners do it to oblige the men (Q. 3928).

Sir Henry Cunynghame said that this exception was put in the Act to protect the collier's custom of getting his coal, and that it would be very much resented if it were taken away from him (Q. 74).

No sufficient case has, in our opinion, been made out for any alteration of the existing law.

(4). Deductions for Materials, Tools, and Implements in Mines.

138. The question of explosives, tools and lamps in mines we have already dealt with as part of the general question under the heading of "Deductions for the use of tools, light, machinery, heat, etc.," and under the heading of "Deductions for the supply of tools."

The exception was practically superseded by the provisions of the Act of 1896 and there seems no necessity for perpetuating it. We recommend its repeal.

(5). Deductions for Hay, Corn, Provender, Etc.

139. No cases of deductions for this purpose have been brought to our notice. This exception appears to be obsolete, and we recommend its repeal.

(6). Deductions for Victuals dressed under the roof of the Employer, and there consumed by the Workman.

140. No evidence has been submitted to us by the workers either as to the power of the employer to contract to supply food to the worker or to make deductions from wages for food so supplied. The provision of meals at a cheap rate for which arrangements are made in many of the best factories may be an undoubted boon to the workers. Sir Henry Cunynghame pointed out that the system might be very advantageous to the worker. He said (Q. 93):—

"For instance, in the case of railway companies, one has seen enormous dining halls for accommodating a thousand men at a time—enormous places. And in those places they have some temperance drinks. They heat their food there, and it prevents the men going out to the public-houses and spending their money. They have newspapers, and even in some cases men are paid to read the paper to them, and I believe the journal is not selected by the management, as far as I know. It is a very happy system and the men seem quite content with it and value it very much. There is no suggestion of any tyranny or compulsion in the matter, and I think, generally speaking, that there are a very large number of cases in which the giving as a regular understood thing of some advantage of that sort to the workman is a benefit.

He thought that it would be a great pity to put an end to that system. He said (Q. 104):—

"I will give you an instance of what I mean. In the Midlands when you go round these factories that you find there is one thing that strikes you, as it struck me most, was the ill-fed condition of the girls employed. I saw it in one after the other. I saw it in factory after factory that I was in, and I asked why was this—what is it they eat, and the most appalling illustration was given to me of the food that those girls have in the middle of the day. At one particular factory I asked a great deal about it, and I saw the wife of the managing director of the factory who had taken a great interest in it. The factory people had provided a dining room and they had got a cook, and I went and saw the whole thing. They had got a kitchen, where most excellent soup and meat was made at very reasonable prices indeed. One could see that there was really good, and very nutritious soup made, and meat, and they could have it for 1½d. and 2d. The meals were made exceedingly cheap, but when one asked out of 600 girls how many took it, the number given was thirteen, and the remainder went to the pastrycooks and ate food that was not good for them, and not sufficiently nutritious. They were not acquainted with what we now know of the science of food. The rest of them spent their money on bonnets and things of that kind.

At the same time he recognised the possibility of abuses (Qs. 93, 98, 104). He was of opinion that the power to deduct for this purpose from wages should be forbidden except in cases where full value is given to the workers and they desired it; and there should be no compulsion (Qs. 99–103).

Mr. Cadbury, who has a dining-room where his workers can get meals, if they wish to do so, said that the food was paid for entirely by cash. The employees get what they want and pay for it at the time.

141. There are one or two amendments of the law in points of detail which we recommend should be made.

(1) Miss Deane drew our attention to the fact that the provision in Section 23 of the Act of 1831 as to the deduction not exceeding the "real and true value" of the article supplied does not extend to victuals (Q. 2310). This is one of the curious anomalies of the section.

We recommend that deductions for this purpose should be subject to the conditions that the deduction does not exceed the cost to the employer.

(2) The exception only applies to "dressed" victuals. Technically this would exclude an employer providing bread, butter, cheese, meats purchased outside, drink, etc. The distinction seems anomalous and we observe that it was not maintained in the exemptions granted to the agricultural industry by Section 4 of the Act of 1887, which allowed food or drink to be given as part of the remuneration for labour. We recommend that the exception should be made to include any kind of food or drink except intoxicating drink. Intoxicating drink is excepted in the provisions of the Act of 1887 with regard to the agricultural industry, and it seems desirable to follow this precedent. The exemption, of course, would still be subject to the condition as to consumption on the employer's premises.

(7) Deductions for Education of Children.

142. This exception, which dates from a period long anterior to the Education Acts, seems to be now quite obsolete. We recommend its repeal.

E.—Deductions for Benefit Societies, &c.

143. In the introduction to our report we have already called attention to the decision given by the House of Lords in the case of Hewlett v. Allen[1] in which it was held that deductions from wages for contributions to a sick club made with the assent of the worker were not illegal. Payments by the employer at the request of the workman to a third party were held to be payments to the workman himself and did not involve any infraction of the Truck Acts. This decision covers the whole class of deductions for sick clubs, accident and relief funds, thrift funds, insurance and superannuation funds and hospitals.

Evidence has been submitted to us in regard to:—

1. Deductions for benefit societies attached to works.
2. Deductions for benefit societies outside the worker's employment.
3. Deductions for hospitals.

144. The decision in Hewlett v. Allen,[1] while laying it down that deductions of this nature were no infringement of the Truck Acts, did not definitely decide the question whether it is or is not legal for the employer to make a contract with a worker, or to make it a condition of employment, that he should contribute to the sick club. We observe, however, that in the Home Office Memorandum[2] it is suggested that it is to be inferred from the judgments in that case that it is not illegal for a workman to contract as to how his wages shall be expended, unless the contemplated expenditure is in goods or materials, or things of that character: and in the pamphlet published by the Home Office in 1898, the following passage occurs:—

"But judicial opinions have been expressed that the prohibition of contracts relating to the manner in which workmen's wages shall be laid out or expended does not extend further than to preventing them from contracting as to the expenditure of wages upon goods. According to this view it does not, for example, prevent them contracting to belong to a friendly, or accident, or old age pension, or fidelty insurance society, the aim of the Act being to stop 'truck,' but not to put a stop to agreements of another character."

The question has never been expressly determined, but in 1902 so far as shop clubs are concerned, the matter was dealt with by Parliament, after an inquiry by a Departmental Committee, in the Shop Clubs Act of that session, which expressly recognised the right of an employer to make contribution to such clubs a condition of employment subject to certain conditions.

145. That Act enacts that it shall be an offence for an employer to make it a condition of employment that a workman shall join a shop club or thrift fund, unless the shop club or thrift fund is registered under the Friendly Societies Act 1896, and is certified under the Act by the registrar of friendly societies. "Shop club" or "thrift fund" is defined to mean "every club and society for providing benefits to workmen in connection with a workshop, factory, dock, shop or warehouse." Already existing societies in connection with railways where the company contributes to the funds are exempted from the requirements of the Act.

The Act also provided that where a workman was dismissed from or left the employment he should, unless contrary to the rules of the club, have the option of remaining a member, or of having returned to him the amount of his share of the funds of the club, to be ascertained by actuarial calculation.

We have not attempted to inquire into the working of this Act or to go over again the ground which was covered by the inquiry of the Departmental Committee.

146. We have had, however, to consider the question of the workers' contributions to societies of this character, whether compulsory or otherwise, being collected by deductions from wages.

There are various kinds of societies attached to works for which deductions from wages are made, but the most usual are sick clubs, i.e., societies which provide the worker with medical attendance or sick pay or both during the time he is ill; accident societies, which provide an allowance supplementary to the compensation payable by the employer under the Workman's Compensation Acts; superannuation or insurance funds, which provide for allowances on retirement, or in case of death, etc.; and thrift funds. Sometimes one society has a two-fold object—the London and North Western Railway Company's Provident and Pension fund is a sick fund and a superannuation fund combined: so is the Midland Railway Company's society.

Many local authorities and public companies have obtained Parliamentary sanction to the establishment of thrift and superannuation funds with compulsory membership and power to make deductions from wages for contributions to such funds.

147. The only evidence which we have had from the workers themselves came from the railway and mining industries. As regards the railway societies, Mr. R. Bell, M.P., and Sir Frederick Harrison and Mr. Guy Granet gave evidence; but, in view of the fact that these societies are acting under Parliamentary powers, we have not gone further into the matter. We understand that the whole subject of superannuation and similar funds of Railway Companies is being inquired into by a special committee appointed for this purpose.

As regards the mining industry, Mr. Twist and Mr. Greenall expressed the opinion that very few would pay to these societies but for direct or indirect compulsion. If they were to exist at all, the contributions should be made not by way of deductions from wages but should be paid by the men voluntarily. Voluntary arrangements, however, independent of the employers would effect the purpose much better. The men want to receive all their money in hard cash and pay out of their own pockets for any club they want (Q. 7546).

148. On the general question, we have had interesting evidence from such representative employers of labour as the late Sir George Livesey, Mr. Cadbury, Mr. Ferens, M.P., Mr. Burton and Mr. Siemens.

Their views generally are that the system of collecting contributions by means of a deduction from wages is a good and beneficial one. Sir George Livesey said that at his works there was a sick and burial fund, a pension fund and a savings fund; that the system of deductions from wages for all these funds was thoroughly satisfactory to the men and that the deductions were made with their consent. The simplest, easiest and almost the only practical way of collecting subscriptions was by deductions from wages. There is no compulsion, any man can at any time sever his connection with the society by expressing a wish to that effect: all the societies (except, of course, the savings fund) are subsidised and guaranteed by the firm and the funds are subject to audit. He would very much regret the prohibition of deductions, as would the men in his employ; it would be a loss to the men and while it would be a financial saving to the company it would lead to a disturbance of the harmonious relations subsisting between employer and employed (Qs. 10277–84, 10315–8, 10330–7).

Of other employers of labour who gave evidence before us Mr. Cadbury said that since the passing of the Shop Clubs Act his sick club had been discontinued (Q. 8314) but he still has a pension fund, contributed to by deductions from wages. The fund is voluntary, but practically all the men belong to it. On leaving the worker gets all his contributions back with $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. interest. It is administered by trustees nominated by the company and the men. Mr. Ferens thought that deductions for the purpose of sick clubs should continue to be authorised, and Mr. Burton, on behalf of the Pottery employers, expressed a strong view that there should be no interference with the present practice as it exists in the Potteries. He fully realised that there was a danger that membership of such societies might be made an implied condition of employment, but he saw no way of getting over this except by absolute prohibition of deductions. This, he said, would be a very serious matter in the Potteries, where nine-tenths of the works have sick clubs managed entirely by the workers and to which the employer, though he has no voice in the management, often contributes. He admitted that there was no remedy for the man who has contributed for a time and then leaves the works (Qs. 17063–5, 17109–19, 17171–4).

Mr. Siemens said that contributions for sick clubs were deducted from wages in many districts in the engineering trade, that it was voluntary in all cases and that the workmen like it, as it compels them to provide for doctors in time of sickness. As regards savings funds, benefit societies, etc., he said that the deductions for these purposes were made in some cases, but it was not a common practice in the trade. Where it existed, it was approved by the workmen because it enabled them to save (Qs. 17432–3, 17439–40, 17455).

149. Where Parliament has expressly sanctioned membership being made compulsory as in the case of the funds established by private Acts and of societies certified under the Shop Clubs Act, we do not see any ground for interfering with the present system of collecting subscriptions by deductions from wages. As the worker must join the society on entering the employment, it is of no importance to him how the contribution is collected.

There remain the voluntary societies, some of which, it must be borne in mind, are managed wholly by the workers themselves. In the case of these societies, though membership is nominally not compulsory, we have little doubt that there is a good deal of indirect compulsion which the law cannot touch. Some of the Factory Inspectors stated that membership was often compulsory in the sense that it is a custom which the worker is afraid to object to and that the tendency is for such contributions to become compulsory. We feel that the power to make deductions can be used as a means of exercising indirect compulsion. A man may feel that his employer wishes him to contribute, or pressure may be brought to bear upon him by a foreman who is anxious to make his subscription list look well, or even by his fellow workers: and though a man may perhaps have made or may wish to make other and voluntary provision of the kind, he is unwilling to protest against having part of his wages stopped for the works club for fear of giving offence and perhaps losing his employment.

It is urged by employers on the other hand that without the general support of the workmen and without the power to make deductions from wages to secure regularity in the payments, these clubs could not possibly be maintained.

150. We should be sorry to put any obstacle in the way of the beneficial objects aimed at by these societies, but we have not heard any evidence which has convinced us that these contributions could not be collected equally well without the power to deduct money from the workers' wages. We think that men and women would be more likely to follow their own inclination in regard to joining these works clubs if contributions were collected in the ordinary way without the employer having recourse to deductions. We are of opinion that workers should be left entirely free in this matter, and that the only way by which to prevent indirect compulsion is to abolish these deductions.

We recommend, therefore, that deductions from wages for contributions to benefit societies attached to works should be made illegal except in the case of (1) societies certified under the Shop Clubs Act and (2) of societies authorised under statutory powers to make these deductions.

(2). Deductions for Benefit Societies outside the Worker's Employment.

151. The only evidence submitted to us under this head had reference to the well-known miners' relief funds which have a membership of 330,000 in England and Wales. It is the general practice for the contributions of members to be deducted from their wage and accounted for by the employer. Membership is voluntary.

Evidence with regard to the system of deductions for this purpose has been given before us by representatives from the various societies (deputed by the Central Association of the Funds), by Mr. Ratcliffe Ellis, the secretary to the Mining Association of Great Britain, and by the secretary of the Wigan and District Miners Permanent Relief Fund, an independent society.

152. The evidence of the representatives from the societies was strongly in favour of the system of collecting the subscriptions by means of deductions from wages; it lessened the expenses of collection and secured the societies against default: the men were practically unanimously in favour of the system and there was no compulsion on them to join: the need for the societies still existed in spite of the provisions of the Workmen's Compensation Act, for there are some accidents which the Acts do not provide for, and in other cases the worker gets a double benefit, he receives compensation from his employer and an allowance from the relief society. All these witnesses stated that interference by the law with the present system of collection by deductions from wages would be most detrimental to the societies and to the miners themselves.

This evidence was reiterated by Mr. Ratcliffe Ellis, who, speaking especially in regard to the Lancashire and Cheshire Permanent Relief Society, one of the Relief Funds belonging to the Central Association, said that there was no compulsion on any man to join, that no complaint of injustice in this matter had ever been brought to the notice of the employers by the Miners Federation, and that a system of voluntary payments instead of deductions would, in his opinion, cause a considerable diminution in the membership of the society.

153. On the other hand, Mr. Walkden, who is secretary of the Wigan and District Miners' Permanent Relief Fund, another society with a membership of 13,500, not connected with the Central Association, working in the same district as the Lancashire and Cheshire Permanent Relief Society, alleged that membership of the latter society though nominally voluntary was practically made a condition of employment in many collieries in Lancashire. He said that in some collieries a man might be refused employment because he did not belong to this society, or pressure might be brought to bear upon a man to join by the officials, or even by persistently deducting the contribution from his wages every week despite his protests, until after getting the sum refunded a few times by going to the pay office, he finally gets tired of objecting and allows the deduction to be made. Similar evidence was given by Mr. Greenall and Mr. Twist. It will be observed that all these three witnesses come from the same district.

Mr. Walkden maintained that the system of deducting contributions from wages was quite unnecessary—in the case of his own society the system of collection was to have appointed collectors at each colliery who took the money, and in his experience the expense of collecting in this way is not so great as to make it impossible to carry on the society. The societies could in his opinion flourish quite as well if the payments were made voluntarily by the men.

154. No evidence of discontent with this system of deductions from wages has been submitted to us from any other district and it seems from Mr. Walkden's evidence that the objection of the Lancashire miners is, in particular, not shared by the miners of Northumberland and Durham. We think, however, that a system of collection by deductions from wages undoubtedly assists in the bringing pressure to bear on workers to contribute and that in all cases of benefit societies, whether inside or outside the works, it is better to have a system of collection which is quite apart from payment of wages by the employer. We recommend that deductions from wages for benefit societies outside the employment should not be allowed by law.

155. In some works voluntary collections are made for hospitals. Mr. Shackleton and Mr. Turner informed us that in the cotton and woollen trades, for instance, contributions were made in this way and that the hospitals were adequately supported by this method. In others, contributions for this purpose are gathered in by deductions from wages with the assent of the workman. The practice is for the secretary of the hospital or hospital fund to hold a meeting of the workpeople at the works. He lays the case before them and they then vote as to whether they will allow deductions to be made from their wages every week for this purpose.

156. The representatives of the workers who appeared before us were generally agreed that the deductions for this purpose, which seem to be made in many employments of all kinds, are not objected to by the workers. Mr. Gavin for instance (Amalgamated Union of Iron and Steel Workers of Great Britain) said there was no objection to them, and Mr. Smillie (Scottish Miners' Federation) said he thought it a very fine thing that workmen should so contribute. Miss Tuckwell pointed out, however, that there might be danger among low-paid women workers of their paying because they thought the employer would like it, and Miss Black (speaking for the Women's Industrial Council) said that there were large numbers of places in which every worker was so strongly expected to contribute 1d. a week to a hospital that it is practically compulsory and in some places it is actually compulsory. Mr. Turner (woollen trade) thought there ought to be complete unanimity among the employees, otherwise deductions should not be made for this purpose.

157. Mr. Siemens, Mr. Ratcliffe Ellis and Mr. Burton said that the contributions were voluntary and the men were willing to pay. Mr. Burton told us that the North Staffordshire Infirmary was largely maintained by these contributions and that if this method of collection by deductions from wages were interfered with it would seriously cripple charitable institutions.

The only employer giving evidence before us who makes this contribution compulsory was Mr. Cadbury. He said that if it were voluntary there would be a deficiency in the revenue; that the subscription seems to be acceptable to the employees and its continuance has been supported by representative committees of their men and women workers

158. Evidence was also given by the Secretary of the Leicester and County Saturday Hospital Fund and the Secretary of the North Riding Infirmary at Middlesbrough. Both of these witnesses said that they would deplore the prohibition of deductions for this purpose: they thought that the funds would suffer seriously if this method of collection were stopped and contributions were left to the men to make individually, because of the lack of organisation. We were given to understand that the workmen are well represented on the various boards of management.

159. We think it may be inferred from the evidence that cases of undue pressure are few, and it does not appear to us that any interference with the system is called for. We recommend that deductions from wages for contributions to hospitals should be allowed.

MISCELLANEOUS.

160. One or two points of minor importance have arisen in the course of the inquiry with which we will deal shortly in this part of the Report.

(1) SUPPLY OF DRINK TO WORKERS.

161. Our attention has been called to the practice of giving intoxicating drink to workers during their work in the mining industry and in agricultural occupations. It is the custom in the thick coal mines of South Staffordshire for the mine owners or contractors ("butty" men) to give a daily allowance of beer to their men and in the cider districts of Worcestershire, Devonshire, Somerset, Hereford and Gloucestershire for farmers to supply their labourers with cider.

The supply of drink in these cases if given to the worker as part of the remuneration for his services would involve a contravention of the Act (intoxicating drink having been excepted from the provisions as to agricultural labourers in Section 4 of the Act of 1887)—but there has been difficulty in the application of the Act in consequence of the doubt whether in particular cases the drink was supplied as part of wages or as a free gift to aid the worker in the performance of his work.

162. We have had evidence as to this practice from Mr. H. Johnstone, H.M. Inspector of Mines for the Staffordshire district. It seems that the practice is of very old standing. He said that it had prevailed for at least 150 years and that the reason for its introduction was probably to be found in the special physical conditions under which the work in the South Staffordshire mines was carried on. Owing to the mode of working the mines the workings tended to become very hot, and the heat and dust induced perspiration and a violent thirst. The pit water is warm and unpalatable, and the men were accordingly allowed a certain quantity of beer which was sent down the pit at stated intervals. The men who worked in the thick seams were allowed two quarts a day and those who worked in the thin seams one quart, this allowance being halved in the case of boys. In the course of time the allowance of beer came to be regarded as a right and was recognised throughout the district as a condition of employment.

The practice is still maintained in the great majority of collieries in the Black Country, but nowadays owing to the shortening of the shifts from twelve hours to about nine, only one drink per day is given instead of two.

The mine owners generally are said by Mr. Johnstone to be averse from the custom and would be glad to see it discontinued, but the butty men who contract for getting the coal under the charter-master system and are the immediate employers of the men would prefer to continue under present conditions.

The workmen are in favour of the continuance of the practice. The Secretary of the South Staffordshire Miners' Association in a letter to Mr. Johnstone said (Q. 12712):—

> "The general opinion is that the custom has been with us from time immemorial, and that a breach of the custom would create the greatest friction that has prevailed in the Black Country for some years. . . . We claim that the nature of our work is such as renders it necessary that the custom of allowance of beer should be sustained as heretofore, and we pray that the Government, in framing their Bill, will give special consideration to our peculiar coalfield."

A few of the mine owners have stopped the practice, taking advantage of the opportunity offered by some change in the terms of employment. In other cases attempts have been made to substitute money payments for the beer allowance, but without much success; the men demanding the sum required to purchase the same quantity of beer elsewhere and the employers being only willing to give the sum which the beer actually cost. The Inspector estimated that about 5,000 men are at present receiving beer allowance out of 6,800 men employed.

Mr. Johnstone was in favour of the practice being stopped; the special conditions which gave rise to the practice have largely disappeared—the ventilation of the mines has much improved and the heat is not so great. He thought that the work could be done just as efficiently without it, and that the practice would to a large extent disappear if the butty system were abolished.

163. The practice appears to us to be objectionable on general grounds, and it is especially to be deprecated in the case of boys, as tending to encourage the habit of drinking. We think it should be stopped.

We understand that the question has never been raised in the Courts, but it appears to us that in its present form the practice involves a violation of the Acts.

164. This practice is one which obtains in many cider districts, but in view of the wide field which we had to cover we considered that it would be sufficient to take evidence from a typical district. Mr. J. W. Willis Bund, Chairman of the Worcestershire Quarter Sessions, Standing Joint Committee and County Council, offered to give evidence before us on this question, and as we were informed that the authorities of the County of Worcestershire had shown considerable activity in attempting to put a stop to this practice, we were very glad to avail ourselves of his offer. We have also had evidence from the Deputy Chief Constable of Worcestershire, from a representative of the Worcestershire Farmers' Association, and from the ex-President of the Worcestershire Chamber of Agriculture.

165. The representatives of the farmers stated that prior to the passing of the Truck Act of 1887 it was usual for farmers in making a contract to agree to give so much wages and so many quarts of cider a day. After the passing of the Act, which allowed only non-intoxicating drink to be given as part of wages to agricultural labourers, attention was called to the illegality of the practice of contracting to give intoxicating liquor as part of wages. The result was that the farmers stopped the practice of contracting to give cider as part of wages, and wages increased by about 2s. a week. Cider is now only given occasionally to labourers, more especially at harvest time when long hours are being worked, but it is a free gift and not a part of wages, and the cider which is made on the farm has little or no commercial value; 3d. per week being the average cost. They admitted that some farmers do not conform to the custom; and that if labour were not plentiful, those who did not give cider would be prejudiced. Cider no doubt was an attraction to labourers; they often preferred it to money, and men have refused to work overtime for money, and have demanded and got drink instead. They thought that more work was done when cider was given and that the practice did not encourage the habit of drinking, and had no deleterious effects on health, physique, or mental faculties.

If the practice was stopped, they did not think it would prejudicially affect the supply of labour, but it would not lead to any increase of wages and it might even result in the men having less wages to take home as they would probably buy the cider for themselves. There was also the risk that the abolition of the custom might lead to farmers evading the law by selling their men 4½ gallon barrels of cider for a nominal sum, which would be an undesirable practice.

166. The Deputy Chief Constable of Worcestershire stated that the practice was very common in busy seasons but it was not so prevalent as it used to be. He drew attention to the difficulty of getting information which would substantiate a prosecution, owing to the fact that in all cases the cider was given by private verbal arrangement between the parties: wages were the same whether cider was given or not and the cider was undoubtedly an attraction to the labourer. He thought that, if the practice were stopped, the farmers would often have great difficulty in finding sufficient labour.

167. Mr. Willis Bund stated that there were two branches of this question, viz., the case of the ordinary farm labourers and the case of the seasonal labourers (i.e. hop and fruit pickers). In both cases there is a well-known and recognised practice of giving cider. There is no expressed contract to this effect, but there is usually an implied bargain: and prosecutions had been successfully taken by the County Authorities in several cases, despite the defence that the cider was a free gift. That defence did succeed in one case, viz., that of Long v. Crane (see report of case in Appendix IV.) and was upheld by the High Court, but in that case there was no doubt whatever that the cider was a free gift. The difficulty however was to get evidence as to the bargain between the farmer and his labourers. On the larger farms and with the better class of farmer the system of not giving cider and paying higher wages is spreading, and spreading to the great advantage of the people. It is only in out-of-the-way places and on the old farms and among the smaller men that the practice continues to the same extent. The case however is different with the seasonal labourer; he expects to have his cider or other drink, and the farmers who had given up the practice find a difficulty in getting this class of labour. He instanced a case where 400 hop-pickers struck work because they were to get nothing to drink. He was dubious about this class of labourer taking to a system by which they would get no drink. A good many of them came out for a holiday and looked forward to this form of enjoyment.

He objected to the practice in toto because it encourages drinking habits, and in the case of the seasonal labourers he thought it was also desirable in the interests of social order that the practice should be stopped.

168. The law cannot, we think, touch cases in which cider is bona-fide given by the farmer to his labourers as a free gift, but it would no doubt be desirable if the law could be strengthened so as to hit cases in which, by a secret understanding between the parties, cider is given as part of the remuneration of labour. We have considered whether any simple amendment of the law could be made which would effect this, but regret that no satisfactory solution has presented itself to us. Mr. Willis Bund suggested to us, that, wherever less than the current rate of wage is given, the onus should be on the employer to prove that he did not give anything else to make up the wage, but we think there would be considerable difficulty in framing any statutory provision to carry this out.

The custom appears to be gradually dying out, and the only remedy perhaps is the vigorous enforcement of the law by the police.

(2) Workmen's Compensation.

169. The question of employers making deductions from wages to cover their liability under the Workmen's Compensation Act has been considered by us in connection with the case of Owner v. Hooper[1] (see report of case in Appendix IV.) In that case the employer made a deduction from wages at the rate of 2d. in the £. It was held by the High Court that no infringement of Section 3 of the Act of 1831 had taken place, as the deduction did not represent any payment made to the workman in lieu of cash.

In effect, what the employer had done was to reduce the wages of his workmen by the amount in question, and so to reach a net wage. There is nothing to prevent an employer reducing the wages of his workers on account of the additional liability imposed on him by the Workmen's Compensation Act, and the matter must be left to be settled between the two parties. In our opinion it would be the wiser course for employers and workmen to deal plainly with net wages as such and such a definite sum. We may add, however, that no complaints were made to us by any of the workers' representatives on the subject, and we infer that cases of the kind must be rare.

(3) Uniform.

170. We observe that the provisions of Section 23 of the Act of 1831 do not include any exemption for a uniform or livery supplied by the employer to the worker. In cases under the Workmen's Compensation Acts, it has been held that in deciding what the earnings of a workman are, the value to him of the use of a uniform provided for him by his employer must be taken into account (Great Northern Railway Co. v. Dawson[2]). The custom of supplying uniform is universal in the railway service and in some of the minor employments of a private character which come under the Acts. It would seem that the uniform so supplied would be regarded as part of wages, as being part of the consideration received by the worker for his services: if so, the practice should be regularised by a provision allowing the supply of a uniform or livery as part of wages.

(4) Exemptions.

171. Section 9 of the Act of 1896 empowers the Secretary of State to exempt from the operation of that Act any trade or business, or any branch or department of a trade or business, if satisfied that its provisions are not required for the protection of the workers employed therein. Two exemptions have been granted under that section, one in respect of the cotton weaving industry in Lancashire, Cheshire, Derbyshire, and the West Riding, the other in respect of iron-ore mines and limestone quarries in certain districts of Lancashire, Cumberland, and North Yorkshire. The application for the exemption of the cotton weaving industry came from the workers, who feared that the Act would encourage attempts to establish a system of fines, and also felt themselves strong enough, through their trade association, to protect themselves, under existing conditions, without the assistance of its provisions. We understand from the representatives of the workers in the industry who appeared before us that they are strongly in favour of the continuance of the exemption. We have had evidence, however, showing that in the case of workers in this industry who are outside the workers' association, the exemption has had a very prejudicial effect—excessive fines are imposed by employers, against which they are unable to protect themselves, and for which the law furnishes no remedy. The matter is one which appears to call for further consideration. In view of the amendments to the present law which we have recommended, the exemption will become of less importance to the organised workers, and it is possible that on further consideration they would be prepared to assent to its revocation. However that may be, it appears to us undesirable that any class of workers needing the protection of the Act should be deprived of its benefit, and the point should, we think, be borne in mind when the question of continuing the exemption under a new Act comes to be considered by the Secretary of State.

We have had no evidence in regard to the other exemption.

(5) Enforcement.

172. Our attention has been called to the fact that the powers of the Factory Inspectors to enforce the provisions of the Acts do not extend to Docks and Warehouses, which are premises within their jurisdiction under the Factory and Workshop Act. We suggest that the provision in Section 13 (2) of the Act of 1887 should be amended accordingly.

173. Any amendment of the Acts should be accompanied by consolidation. The earlier Acts are complicated and difficult to follow, and their drafting is in many respects defective. Much has been repealed, and much also has become obsolete. Consolidation would make the law easier for the inspectors to enforce and for employers and workmen to understand.

IV.—SHOP ASSISTANTS.—LIVING-IN SYSTEM.

174. The terms of our remit were:—"Further to consider and report whether the practice of shop assistants and certain classes of workpeople being lodged and boarded by their employers gives rise to abuses needing remedy by an extension of the Truck Acts or by other action of the State."

It would be a matter of some difficulty to disentangle the evidence with regard to "living-in," that is, a system under which both lodging and board are supplied by the employer, from the evidence with regard to the system of boarding or partially boarding employees, that is to say the supply of meals on the employer's premises during work hours. These questions are themselves distinct, but as the evidence was presented to us on both topics together, our narrative on the whole case will be also so treated so as to prevent duplication.

175. We have had a large body of evidence submitted to us. Representatives of the National Union of Shop Assistants, comprising 22,000 shop assistants out of a total of about 400,000 or 500,000, have appeared before us, including Miss Bondfield, the Assistant Secretary, and Mr. J. Seddon, M.P., their Parliamentary representative; the General Secretary of the Irish Drapers' Assistants' Benefit and Protective Association, with a membership of from 3,000 to 3,500, and the Secretary of the National Association of Grocers' Assistants, representing 2,000 assistants, have also given evidence before us. We have also heard several shop assistants holding independent views. Evidence has also been submitted to us by employers and their representatives from London and large provincial towns, from Scotland and from Ireland. Of these, some have had the system of living-in, and still continue it; others have had it, but have now abolished it, and others have never had recourse to it. We have further had the advantage of a report from Miss Lucy Deane, one of His Majesty's Senior Lady Inspectors of Factories, who made an inquiry for us into the system, in the course of which she visited many towns in England, Scotland and Wales. Besides inspecting one hundred and thirty representative boarding establishments, Miss Deane visited various boarding-houses for women, and interviewed the secretaries of many Young Women's Christian Associations. Finally, we have ourselves visited establishments in the West and East of London about which complaint was made to us by the National Union of Shop Assistants.

176. It has been suggested that the living-in system had its origin in the apprentice system, now fast dying out, which prevailed in England in the old days, and under which the apprentice commonly lived with his master; and that it continued to exist in view of the conveniences attaching to it. The system was cheaper, and parents felt more security in regard to the welfare of their children if they lodged with the employer and were under his supervision.

Conditions now are changed: the employee is often taken on without any apprenticeship: facilities for transit are greatly improved; many of the conditions which rendered the system necessary have disappeared and living-in has now ceased to exist to any appreciable extent except in the drapery and grocery trades.

In her memorandum Miss Deane points out that even in the drapery trade the living-in system is by no means general, and is on the whole becoming less so; and she also draws attention to the marked dissimilarity between different towns and districts. Thus she says (page 355 of Vol. III.):—

"In Scotland living-in is unknown, except in one establishment in Edinburgh, where English women are employed. In Wales, on the other hand, all live in. In Liverpool, a seaport town, the majority live out. In Bradford, with the exception of two establishments, all live out. In Worcester all live in. In Manchester the two systems are found side by side. Repeated inquiries from all sorts of persons have failed to elicit any reason for the curious dissimilarity. I am inclined to think that local custom is largely responsible."

The practice, however, of the assistants having their dinner and tea on the premises of the employer commonly prevails even where they do not live under his roof.

The Evidence of the Shop Assistants.

177. The views of the representatives of the three associations or unions who appeared before us were practically identical. All of them declared that the system was responsible for many abuses, but apart from this they condemned the system on general grounds and asked for its abolition by law. These views were not shared, but on the contrary were strongly controverted by shop assistants who gave independent evidence before us. The case, however, presented to us by the associations or unions against the system was as follows :—

1. That living-in is generally made a condition of employment either express or implied.

Thus Mr. Frank Tilley, one of the representatives of the National Union of Shop Assistants, said :

"From my experience there can be no possible doubt that in England generally, but more particularly in the Midlands and south, including London, 'living-in' is practically a condition of employment so far as the drapery trade is concerned, the few assistants 'privileged' to live out being buyers or managers of departments, who are usually married men. The rank and file, including men and women up to thirty-five and forty years of age, are single, and live in, although, on the other hand, it is by no means rare (and I have met several cases) for married men to live and sleep in the house as single men, while their wives and families live elsewhere, there being no option in the matter—they must live in, or lose their chance of employment. This fact is sufficient, I consider, to prove how much 'living in' is a condition of employment in modern shop life. I may add that, in my own case, during the whole of my experience, 'living-in' was a condition of employment." (Q. 13553.)

Special stress was laid upon the effects of the system in preventing men from marrying. It was alleged that permission to live out for the purpose of getting married was frequently refused.

Mr. Seddon referred to cases within his knowledge where, owing to living-in being made a condition of employment, husband and wife were separated. We quote the following extract from his evidence :—

"Living-in leads to deception. Numbers of married men, in order to get berths, declare themselves single, visiting their wives secretly. This creates a double evil; often the man suffers, and the wife not unfrequently suffers also.

"Have you known of cases of that kind?—Oh, yes, quite a number.

"It being a condition of employment that they must live in, they have to represent themselves as bachelors?—Yes; and in two cases it has been disastrous to both of them; the wife has contracted bad habits and the husband as well, and it has meant the destruction of what ought to have been, not only home life, but the relationship of man and wife." (Qs. 13878–80.)

2. That the board and lodging accommodation provided are often inferior and inadequate.

(a) Complaint was made that in many cases the food supplied is scanty, ill-cooked and lacking in variety, and that assistants often find it necessary to supplement the food given them by private purchase. Even where the food is good, the time allowed for its consumption is inadequate and the nervous strain on the assistant is such that many have no appetite for it. We quote in extenso a passage from Mr. Hoffmann's evidence which puts all these points.

"The daily rush from counter to dining-room and back to counter without even a breath of fresh air, obviously, must be injurious to health. Often the food provided is unappetising, cooked and carved very roughly, served in dining-room situated in the basement, artificially lighted, and without proper ventilation, as for example — and —. The food provided varies greatly in different houses. Whilst by some firms fairly good food is provided, in the majority of living-in houses the very opposite is the fact. Many influences bear upon the quality and quantity of the food supply—the size of staff, humanity of the employer, efficiency of the cook, and knowledge of the housekeeper or caterer. But the assistant is at the mercy of all these, or the lack of these qualities, and has to take what is provided, or go without. . . . . I remember well one Sunday at —, the pressed beef placed before us glittered with all the colours of the rainbow, and smelt very offensively. . . . . Breakfast, as a general rule, everywhere, consists of bread and butter, or margarine, with tea or coffee, or chicory and coffee, drawn from huge urns. Though some firms do allow some little extras, or, as they are sometimes called 'luxuries' for breakfast (such an one is —, where they are allowed cold ham, herrings, sausages, or two eggs for the men, and one egg for the women), the sameness of the menu becomes positively wearying. One always knows what there is for dinner by the day in the week, or gets to know the day of the week by what there is for dinner. . . . . In a large number of cases the food provided is insufficient for the physical needs of the employee; so insufficient, that varying amounts of from 2s. to 6s. per week are spent in adding to the food supplied. The surprising thing is that different firms admit this by supplying extras to the assistants at a price, as at—and—. At —, the waiters at the tables receive £10 per annum as salary, and are told they will be able to make so much extra by selling things to the assistants. Thus rashers of bacon are sold for 2½d. and eggs 1½d. each, small pots of jam 1d., two sardines 1½d., and so on. (Q. 13711.)

A case was brought to our notice in which a shopkeeper had on the premises where his assistants were lodged, presumably for their consumption, the carcase of a sheep which was unfit for human food. He was fined £5 and costs, but on appeal this decision was reversed by the High Court* who held that as the meat was not exposed for sale the Act did not apply. Mr. Justice Wills remarked, "Any measure that could deal with such a case might be a useful piece of legislation." We respectfully agree with the learned judge, and in the conclusions hereinafter noted, we make a special recommendation on this point.

(b) The sleeping and other accommodation was said to be frequently bad. Ventilation is inadequate and there is a lack of sufficient cubic space. There is often an absence of privacy, four or five sleeping in a room. Complaint was made of the insufficiency of bedclothing in the winter and the infrequency of change of bed linen, and in some cases of worse things. It was stated that in many cases also the sanitary accommodation left much to be desired and that a bathroom for the use of the assistants was an exception. The means of escape in case of fire is generally inadequate. In many cases there is no sick-room accommodation. We quote some extracts from the evidence of Miss Bondfield and Mr. Tilley, bearing on these points :—

"At —— (employing about 800), the assistants (living-in) are boarded in lodges apart from the business house. In one room, occupied by a member of our union, there were five beds. The beds were infested with bugs, which could only be subdued by a lavish use of Keatings' powder, administered by the assistants at their own expense.

"— (employing twenty men, forty women, seven boys, and seven girls.)—In some rooms double, usually three single beds; informant contracted itch through unclean condition of bed linen.

"——Three men sleep in an attic 23 feet by 8 feet 6 inches, with sloping roof 3 feet 6 inches, rising to 7 feet 6 inches; small window, 2 feet 6 inches by 3 feet; fireplace blocked. My informant states that in the heat of summer the room smelt like a fowl house.

"— (employing about seventy men, 100 women, and several juniors).—My informant writes :—

"'Four beds were occupied in the room I shared. The ventilation was inadequate, and the room was 'foul' when I first entered it at 9.30 a.m., on my arrival. I had only four clean sheets during the six months. On two occasions I threw them on the floor and slept on the ticking for several nights before they were replaced. One man stated that his sheets were not changed for seven weeks. Rats were plentiful in his room, but I never heard of the firm paying any attention to the matter'" (Bondfield, Q. 13274).

"In some cases, even now, only double beds are used (the evils of which are obvious), and the bedding and coverings both insufficient and dirty. I have seen, at — three such beds crowded into a comparatively small room, with only one small window for ventilation and light, occupied by six youths. Bad ventilation seems to be a feature of the bedrooms in many 'living-in' establishments. In some instances they have no direct communication with the open air, but open on to corridors, the light being obtained through a pane of glass in the wooden partitions dividing corridor from bedrooms; some of these rooms are more like cupboards than rooms. Such are to be found more particularly in old buildings which have been altered to accommodate a growing staff of assistants. I occupied such a room in 1894-5 at —" (Tilley, Q. 13553).

3. That on the moral side the system has not only no advantage but is actually harmful.

It was contended that the system affords no safeguard against moral dangers. There is no real supervision over the individual, and the supervision in bulk, so to speak, is confined to requiring assistants to be in by a certain time at night. No steps are taken, however, to see that all the assistants are in; if they are away all night, no one in authority knows, unless their room-mates inform against them. Miss Bondfield says :—

"If they are not in, nobody knows, provided their room-mates do not tell tales. For instance, if one says to the other 'I want to go to a theatre to-night . . . . . do not split on me, and strip my bed in the morning,' the other girls will say 'All right.' There is no possibility of finding out that that girl has not been in for the night." (Q. 13211.)

"I am quite sure you recognise the gravity of the position we are placed in as a Committee about this, and I may put it to you quite frankly thus. Are you able to testify that there is a system under which it is possible without the exercise of any great dexterity for these girls to be absent the whole night?—Yes, it is my own experience. When I was a young apprentice myself, I was employed in a house at Brighton; for the purpose of sleeping their assistants, they took various houses in back streets. The house that I was put to sleep in was No. 1, ——— Street. My sleeping-room was on the ground floor, with the window facing on to the street, so that one could step into the street from the window, and back into the room from the street, without going through the door at all. I was put into a room with a woman of mature age who led a life of a most undesirable kind; that was my first experience of a living-in house. There was another girl in the same room who was suffering from consumption. I was in that house for three years, and I could have been out any night during those three years without the firm knowing anything about it." (Q. 13216.)

The serious allegation was also made that in some cases assistants not returning before the hour of locking up are shut out for the night and that girls so excluded have been known to spend the whole night wandering about the streets.

Further, it is contended that not only is the supervision which is supposed to be one of the advantages of the system merely nominal, but the system is productive of actual moral harm.

Stress was particularly laid upon the danger resulting from boys and men or young girls and women occupying the same bedroom. It was alleged that the assistant has no choice of his or her bedroom companions and that often evil moral effects of a serious nature may result from undesirable companionship.

4. That the system robs the assistants of their sense of personal responsibility which would be developed by ordering and controlling their own lives: and so individuality and independence of character are checked. The women assistants in particular get no training or experience in housekeeping or domestic management which would fit them for subsequently managing homes of their own and which they would get if they lived in lodgings on their own account.

178. These were the chief points in the case against the system put to us by the representatives of the Shop Assistants' Association. Other complaints of a minor character were that there are no facilities for seeing friends; that permits to sleep out are difficult to get on nights other than Saturday and Sunday; that on the other hand some employers put obstacles in the way of the employees remaining on the premises on Sunday. Another point made was that assistants are deprived of their political rights. If they had lodgings outside, they would be able to take advantage of the lodger franchise. Under the living-in system they were unable to obtain votes.

Finally, they stated that there was no freedom of complaint; that if they ventured to remonstrate about food, or lodging, they rendered themselves liable to dismissal, with the possibility also of the employer "spoiling" their reference.

179. The representatives of the shop assistants' unions contended that if the living-in system were abolished, the assistants would have no difficulty in finding suitable lodgings according to their income. Apartments with respectable people could be found without difficulty for young boys and girls from the country by their parents, and even if temporary difficulty were found in meeting the demand for accommodation, it would quickly be overcome by the establishment of boarding houses or homes or in other ways. The effect of the abolition so far as regards the employer would only be a slight dislocation of business, and a little less profit to him, but these slight disadvantages would be more than counterbalanced by his getting more efficient work from his employees. The advantages to the assistant would be great: life in lodgings would be a nearer approach to home conditions, the danger of contracting bad habits would be lessened, and the assistant would benefit by getting away from the environment of his work and having the right and the resulting responsibility of ordering his own life after business hours.

180. The Shop Assistants' Union further contended that the assistants should be free, if they so wish, to have their dinner and tea out. They said that in many places now an hour's interval is allowed for dinner, and that no hardship to the employer nor hindrance to business would result, as the assistants could go out in relays. They thought that such an arrangement would be much more beneficial to the assistant than the present system, as it would give him a break in the middle of the day, a release from work and its surroundings for an hour, and an opportunity for a little fresh air.

181. The views of the shop assistants unions on the living-in system were not shared by some of the assistants from good class houses who gave evidence before us. Thus Mr. Forbes and Mr. Pitstow expressed the opinion that living-in was a great advantage to a young man coming to a business house in London for the first five or six years, because he has the certainty of his meals and lodging accommodation, his liabilities are reduced to a minimum, and he has only to find his clothes and luxuries; he has to conform to certain rules and regulations which render him less liable to temptation than if left to his own resources, and he has a better opportunity of saving money. They agreed, however, that after a certain number of years a man should live out. Mr. Bouillon thought that the general view of the male assistants was against living-in; they objected to the restraint put upon their liberty, especially in the matter of getting in by a certain time at night. In the good class of house, the supervision is more than nominal, for the senior hands have charge of the juniors, and by their example and personal influence are able to exercise control over them. On the whole, he thought the system was a good, healthy and wholesome one, according to his experience. Stress was laid by these witnesses on the advantages of the system from the social point of view.

182. Mr. Stewart, who had experience of living-in and living-out in London, and had also lived-out in Glasgow, thought that living-in was a good thing for young people coming to London, but that after a few years the assistants ought to be allowed the option of living-out. Persons who have arrived at maturity ought not to have the restraint of living-in placed upon them. He said that many cases existed of persons desiring to live out who were unable to obtain permission to do so. He recognised that some distinction should be drawn between London and Glasgow and other provincial towns; that there were special advantages in living-in in London because of the distance that people would have to travel for rooms and of the greater temptations of London life. He thought that the living-in system in London gave the firms a better class of employee.

183. As regards the women, Miss Oliver said that there was a very strong feeling among the assistants in the best houses against living-out. She said that the young ladies decidedly prefer to live in: they could not get the same comfort and conveniences in lodgings, nor the same social life. Living-out with parents, relatives or friends would be different, but often a young girl coming up to London knew no one, and life in lodgings would be very comfortless and would expose girls to very serious moral dangers. As regards the protection and supervision afforded under the living-in system, Miss Oliver said that the young girls are in a large measure overlooked: certain people are in charge of them, they have to keep stated hours, and the senior hands take an interest in them. Moreover, when any girl begins to lapse at all, the general consensus of condemnation is a great deterrent.

It will thus be seen that the evidence given by shop assistants was very far from being unanimous, and we cannot but think that the colour of the individual experience of many of the witnesses has been applied to the system as a whole. If in that experience the food, lodging, supervision and companionships have been good or have been bad, these respective qualities have been attached to a system which may in other instances display very opposite characteristics.

184. There was a similar lack of unanimity in

The Evidence of Shopkeepers.

We propose to review, first, the evidence of shopkeepers who retain the system and approve of it; secondly, that of those who have had the system, then done away with it either wholly or partially; and, thirdly, the evidence of those who have never had the system.

185. Those who retain and approve of the system confess that there are, no doubt, some abuses; that there are cases in which the food and the lodging accommodation leave much to be desired; but they say that there has been much exaggeration on this head, and that the system should not be condemned for the faults of a minority.

The case which they present in favour of the system is—

(1) That the system is advantageous to the assistants themselves. They could not provide themselves with food and lodging of the same quality for the allowance which the employer could afford to give them as a general rule in lieu of living-in. With regard to the supply of food the force of this is obvious when it is remembered that the management can rely upon practically a certain number of meals at fixed hours under conditions of convenience and economy which could not apply to outside catering establishments.

(2) That the system does afford, especially in the case of young assistants of both sexes from the country, a real protection against moral dangers. The supervision is not in name only. The housekeeper looks after the girls, and the senior hands take an interest in them. At the very least a certain protection is afforded by the lads and girls having to be in by a certain time at night. They contended that as a matter of fact the morals of assistants living in are fully up to the standard of any other class of business man or girl.

(3) That if the system with its attendant advantages were abolished, it would not be possible to secure the same high standard of assistant.

(4) That assistants are divided in opinion on this question. That the majority of young women are in favour of this system; though perhaps the men as a whole object to it. Mr. Edwin Jones said that he inserted a test advertisement for an assistant in the Daily Telegraph, asking applicants to say whether they wished to live in or out. For living-out there were 19; married, 4; for living-in, 8; indifferent whether they lived in or out, 14; not stated, 2; so that 23 were in favour of living-out, 8 against, and 14 indifferent. He thought this was perhaps a pretty fair representation of the general feeling of male assistants in the matter (Qs. 17990-3).

186. The general effect of the employers' evidence was in direct contradiction to the statements of the assistants on several points. For instance, they declared that assistants are given as far as possible a choice of bedroom companions; if they object to a particular person, arrangements are made for effecting a change. Permits to sleep out are readily granted. An employer would place no obstacle in the way of his male assistants marrying, though he certainly does not like his assistants to marry on an inadequate salary.

187. Finally, they declared that any sudden abolition of the system would involve a very serious loss to the employer, who might in many cases be unable to put to any use the premises vacated by the assistants. If living-in were to be abolished by law, they considered that a period of grace should be allowed. Where the living-in accommodation was in houses apart from the business premises, no great difficulty would arise, as no doubt the houses which had been used for this purpose could be sub-let; but where the lodgings provided were on the business premises, they would be a serious loss, as the accommodation might not be wanted or might not be suitable for business purposes and might be useless for any other purpose. They also considered that there should be an exemption for small employers where the assistant lives with the family.

188. Some interesting evidence was given to us by Mr. Debenham and Mr. Derry, employers who in the past had had the system of living-in, but had recently abolished it wholly or in part. Mr. Debenham, who abolished it practically for all assistants in 1905, declared that his action was prompted by the opinion that living-in tended rather to diminish the independence of the staff, and that so far as he could say at present, the results had fully justified his opinion. The business was now better conducted, the assistants were physically superior, brighter and more energetic, and on business grounds he had no desire whatever to revert to the living-in system. He told the Committee that he had also given up providing meals for his assistants. They were allowed to go out for dinner and had so much time given them. He thought that this system had been justified by results. The entire break from business obtained by the assistant going out to the mid-day meal had a good effect both physically and mentally; the arrangement caused, of course, slight inconvenience and loss of time. He had never heard that his assistants found any difficulty in finding suitable lodging accommodation, nor was there any trouble about getting them to business in time.

He thought, however, that the abuses of the living-in system had been very much exaggerated.

189. Mr. Derry, who has abolished living-in for his male staff, gave much the same reasons for adopting this course as Mr. Debenham. He said, although the firm had endeavoured in their own business to avoid the objections and difficulties connected with the system by securing good companionship, good supervision, good food and the like, they had finally come to the conclusion that living-out would be an advantage to the assistants. Under the living-in system as it exists to-day, all responsibility of providing for themselves is taken away from the assistants and so they are denied experience of the value of money in home catering He said that the firm were convinced that living-out would create a sense of personal responsibility and would tend to the uplifting of character, and they have had no cause to regret their action : the effect of the abolition of living-in for the male staff has not been to relax discipline in any way. The firm would be prepared to abolish the system also in the case of the women, but financial considerations at present stand in the way. The premises which the women now occupy would become a source of loss, as they could not at present be applied to other purposes.

Unlike Mr. Debenham, Mr. Derry was strongly in favour of the continuance of the system by which the assistants were provided by the employer with dinner and tea on the premises. He pointed out that business was going on all through the day, more or less, and there was no definite slack period. He thought it was more convenient for the employer that the assistant should have dinner on the premises, and from the point of view of the assistants themselves he considered it to be an advantage for them to get good meals at cost price.

190. The evidence of employers, e.g., Harrods, Ltd., who have never had the living-in system was to the general effect that there was no falling off in the efficiency of the assistants because of living out, that punctuality was well maintained, and that the assistants were of a very good class. Mr. Burbidge explained that Harrods, Ltd., engaged their assistants as far as possible from homes in the neighbourhood. Questioned as to the living-in system, Mr. Burbidge said that he thought that there was a necessity for the system in the case of young people from the country. He thought that sleeping-out was very well for people of a mature age, but not for the very young lads of fifteen and sixteen. He considered that if all firms were to allow sleeping-out, there would be a dearth of employees from the country, as parents would refuse to send their children to London if it became necessary for young boys and girls to live in lodgings.

191. In view of the fact that the living-in system does not exist in Scotland save in a single case (Messrs. Jenner & Co., Edinburgh), we made special inquiry as to the conditions existing in Edinburgh and Glasgow, and the working of the system of living out. We found that the large majority of the assistants lived with their parents or with relatives, and that the number living in lodgings was very few. For instance, Mr. Pettigrew (of Pettigrew & Stephens, Ltd.), of Glasgow, had only 35 out of 220 assistants employed who were living in lodgings; Mr. Maule, of Edinburgh, 40 out of 500; and Mr. Taggart, of Glasgow, 14 out of 135. Mr. Pettigrew expressed the opinion that the conditions in Glasgow were very different from those obtaining in London. He saw no necessity for living-in in any provincial town, but the conditions of life in London were different, and he thought young people from the country coming to London should be boarded by the employer for their moral and physical welfare, and also on account of the expense in obtaining proper lodgings. In Glasgow even at the present time everybody is known, but in London a person is lost. He thought that this consideration would weigh very much with parents, and that the system of living-out would prevent the better class of girl coming to the London business houses. He stated that he was well acquainted with the conditions of many of the London houses, and considered the standard of living-in a high one.

192. Mr. Maule, of Edinburgh, stated that plenty of lodgings were available in Edinburgh, that his firm keep a list of respectable lodgings, and make a point of knowing that they are respectable, and that young girls coming from London or elsewhere are given this list. The list is merely to assist them in finding accomodation: they are quite free to go elsewhere if they wish, so long as the firm know that the house in which they are going to live is respectable. He said that his lady superintendent is sent out very often to look at and report upon the lodgings taken by the girls (Qs. 19057–8).

193. On the question of the employees being provided with meals on the premises, Mr. Maule and Mr. Burbidge both strongly favoured the practice on the ground that it was necessary for business purposes and also good for the assistants who might otherwise not provide themselves with a substantial meal. Mr. Taggart, however, does not provide meals for his assistants. He allows them 1 hour to 1¼ hours for dinner, and if they are working late they are allowed time also for tea.

194. The evidence with regard to Messrs. Jenner and Company, of Edinburgh, was given by Mr. Cormack of that firm. Of 739 persons employed, 186 live in; 100 of these being women and 86 men. The other two-thirds of their employees are obtained from the neighbourhood of the establishment, viz.: Edinburgh and Leith. Those who live in are obtained from large businesses, mostly in England, where they have been accustomed to the living-in system. We see no reason to doubt that, on the assumption that the system of living-in is continued, the conditions both as to accommodation, food, supervision, medical attendance, &c., prevailing in such an establishment leave nothing to be desired. Mr. Cormack, who approves of the system, although he thinks it should be optional, is asked: "Suppose Parliament did not see its way to abolish living-in, would yours, or any well-conducted firm that attends to its assistants' welfare, object to rigorous inspection?" and his reply is "We would not" (Q. 18627).

Conclusions.

195. We have considered the whole question very carefully, and proceed to state the conclusions at which we have arrived. The question has three aspects: (1) the quality of the accommodation, and the allied question of its value to the assistants as part of the remuneration for their services (under this head we include the question of the supply of food on the premises); (2) the advantages or disadvantages of the system on the moral side; (3) the advantages or disadvantages of the system on the social side.

(1) The Quality of the Accommodation and Food provided, and their Value to the Assistants.

196. The general result of the evidence we have received is to show that considerable differences exist between different establishments; that in a number of cases, perhaps a considerable number, the quality of the accommodation and food, without being actually bad, leaves much to be desired, and that in a few cases there has been serious abuse. It has not, however, been proved to our satisfaction that the evils alleged to exist are either so serious or so widespread as has been represented. We think much of the evidence we received related to the past, not to the present time, and it was admitted that conditions had improved considerably and were improving.

197. The Committee themselves visited a number of establishments of which complaint was made to them by the representatives of the Shop Assistants' Union, and are bound to say that they did not find the complaints substantiated. In some cases the accommodation certainly lacked brightness and cheerfulness, and the furniture, paper, paint, &c., were shabby; we also noticed in one or two cases, at least, that the bath and lavatory accommodation was inadequate or inconveniently situated; but the accommodation was in all cases clean, and probably of much the same quality as the assistant would get, if not in his own home, at any rate in lodgings. It must be remembered that assistants are drawn from different grades, and that the difference between, say, a West End establishment and an East End establishment corresponds to differences in the homes from which the assistants come.

198. In order to determine the value to the assistants of the accommodation and food provided, and the probable effect on them of the abolition of the system, we questioned the employers who appeared before us as to the cost to them of the accommodation and food provided. The estimates furnished varied from 9s. a week to 14s., and in one case (Mr. Debenham's) rose as high as 17s. 6d. Roughly, therefore, the sum which an employer could allow his assistants if they lived out instead of in, would, in most cases be from £25 to £30. We very greatly doubt whether the assistants could get the same quality of accommodation and food for this amount in lodgings in London, or in other large towns, and we cannot accept the views of Mr. Seddon and other witnesses that assistants would be better off living out than living in from a monetary point of view.

199. The value of the system from the moral standpoint no doubt depends very largely on the nature of the supervision and influence exercised by those in charge. We are satisfied, however, that, for youths and young girls at any rate, especially for those coming up from the country, with few if any friends or relatives near, there is considerable value in the restrictions which the system imposes. We think the system affords safeguards, which in many cases would not be present if the assistants were living by themselves in lodgings. The influence also of the older assistants and the restraint of public opinion will, in good houses, be a very important factor. From the parents' point of view, the system provides a security without which they might be unwilling to let their children come to the towns. A large number of assistants come from the country districts or small provincial towns.

200. The practice of Scotland has been frequently cited to us in the course of the inquiry as proof that under a system of living out, the supposed dangers do not in fact arise or that other safeguards are forthcoming. The inquiries we have made however into conditions in Glasgow and Edinburgh show that the circumstances are entirely different. The great majority of the assistants in those towns live either with parents, relatives or friends. In the instance where that is not the case, living-in is provided.

201. Of course the case of older assistants is somewhat different. The need of supervision grows less, men may desire to get married, and there is no doubt force in the contention that under the system a man does not gain the experience, and develop the sense of responsibility that come from the management of a home of his own. There may in some cases be a tendency on the part of the employer to put obstacles in the way of an assistant marrying—for one thing, it is a loss to him if the accommodation he has provided is not fully used. But we do not believe that this is often the case. The difficulty in the way of an assistant getting married probably arises rather in connection with the amount which the employer is willing to allow him in lieu of board and lodging.

202. It was suggested to us by the representatives of the assistants that there was the possibility of moral danger from the association under the living-in system of youths with the older men and young girls with the women. The possibility of such danger attaches to any system which brings together a number of persons of different ages; but we are certainly not convinced that the danger is likely to be greater than the danger in the alternative of life in lodgings.

We cannot too strongly condemn the practice—of which we are satisfied there have been in the past a few instances—of shutting out for the night an assistant who returns after the hour of locking up.

(3) The advantages and disadvantages of the system on the social side.

203. On the social side, the system has both its advantages and disadvantages. On the one side, there are the restrictions on social intercourse imposed by the necessity of being in by a certain hour, the difficulty of having friends to see one, and the like. These restrictions are not unnaturally found irksome by some, and perhaps are at the bottom of a good deal of the feeling against the system. On the other hand, there are many social advantages, particularly in the good houses, and it is clear from the evidence that many of the assistants like the club life which they get under the system.

204. The assistants, as we have pointed out, are very far from being unanimous in their views upon the system. We have had no means of ascertaining on which side the bulk of opinion lies; the Assistants' Union which has headed the agitation represents actually only a small minority of the whole body.

205. We have come to the conclusion that while the case for absolute prohibition has not been made out, the evils which have been shown to exist are such as can be adequately met by regulation. We proceed to consider the form which such regulation should take.

206. The National Union suggested that if the living-in system were not abolished, the provisions of the Truck Acts should be applied. This would make an agreement necessary between the employer and the assistant in order to legalize the part payment of wages in board and lodging, and would, they thought, put the assistant in a more independent position. We do not think this the best way of dealing with the matter. It would not of itself remedy defects in accommodation, &c., such as have been brought to our notice. Assistants seeking employment would in many cases have to accept the employer's terms. Nor would the employer undertake the provision of accommodation unless he had some guarantee that it would be utilized.

207. We propose that premises on which assistants are lodged should be required to conform to certain regulations and conditions, and should be regularly inspected. Precedents for such regulations will be found in the byelaws which may be made under Section 90 of the Public Health Act, 1875, for houses let in lodgings and the byelaws approved by the Home Office for servants' registries. For general sanitary purposes, the premises would be already under the supervision of the local authority. A system of regulation and inspection would, we believe, meet with no opposition from the majority of employers.

Our inquiry has had reference chiefly to establishments employing a considerable number of assistants. Cases where only one or two assistants are employed stand on a somewhat different footing; the regulations in such cases might be of a simpler character.

208. We therefore recommend—

(2) That the law as to the sale of food unfit for human consumption should be extended to cover the case of an employer supplying or having in his possession for the purpose of supplying to his assistants, food unfit for human consumption.

(3) That the law should provide for inspection of the living-in arrangements of shops by inspectors of the local authority, who already inspect under the Shop Hours Acts, and that it should be their duty to enforce the regulations made by the central authority.

SUMMARY OF RECOMMENDATIONS.

209. For the sake of convenience we proceed to epitomise our recommendations :—

(1) That the whole law on the subject of Truck and Fines and Deductions from Wages should be consolidated with the amendments indicated below. Certain repeals—referred to in the Report—will be consequential upon consolidation.

(2) That the Truck Acts should be extended to outworkers.

(3) That the powers of the Factory Inspectors with regard to the enforcement of the Truck Acts should be extended to docks and warehouses.

(4) That the inclusion of a summary of the law in the Factory, Mine and Quarry Abstracts should be definitely required by statute.

(5) That fines should be totally abolished in the case of young persons of sixteen and under in all employments.

(6) That the maximum fine or accumulation of fines in any one week permissible by law should not exceed five per cent. of the wages of the workman for the week.

(7) That the deduction for or payment of a fine should be made only in the week in which it is imposed, and that no claim for arrears of fines should lie.

(8) That employers who maintain the system of fining should furnish to the district inspector of mines or factories, as the case may be, a copy of the fine-agreement and, when required, a return of the fines imposed on their employees.

(9) That the fine agreements should in all cases be publicly posted by placards at the works, and no fine should be allowed by law except in pursuance of a specific contract antecedent to the commission of the offence. A copy of this placard should be furnished free of charge to every workman on entering the employment, and on any alteration being made therein.

(10) That the provisions of the Act of 1896 should be amended so that the prosecution should have the option of proceeding against the employer for imposing an unfair or unreasonable fine in cases where an unfair or unreasonable fine is imposed without an agreement.

(11) That the inspectors of the local authority who already enforce the provisions of the Shop Hours Act should be empowered to enforce the provisions of the Truck Act in regard to fines in shops.

(12) That where it is shown that a bonus is liable to be withheld as a punishment for unpunctuality, breaches of discipline, etc., the Court should have power, after considering all the circumstances of the case, to decide whether the bonus is used by the employer as a means of evading the requirements of the statute, and in the event of its deciding that it is so used, to convict the employer.

(13) That the provisions of Section 1 of the Truck Act of 1896, except in so far as altered by the foregoing recommendations, should be embodied in the statute.

(14) That in respect of deductions for bad or negligent work, or injury to materials or other property of the employer, the existing provisions of the law should be repealed and the matter be left to be regulated under the provisions we have suggested in regard to fines and the ordinary common law rights of the parties.

(15) That in respect of materials, no deductions or payments should be allowed in respect of materials such as glue, thread, paste, twine, &c., which go into the substance of the fabric or product.

(16) That in respect of the use of tools, machinery, standing room, light, heat, &c., no deductions or payments should be allowed; the alteration of conditions thus produced being left to find its economic adjustment in wage rates and the employer to have power to sue for any loss occasioned to him by the misapplication or loss of tools, &c., supplied for the use of the workman.

(17) That in respect of the supply of tools, &c., which become the property of the worker, deductions should be allowed, subject to the existing provisions of the Act of 1896, Section 3.

(18) That in respect of services rendered by the employer in connection with the work or labour of the workman, deductions should be allowed, subject to the existing provisions of the Act of 1896, Section 3.

(19) That in respect of the provision of mess-rooms and similar facilities no deductions should be allowed; any charges for these facilities to be by way of a separate bargain and separate payment.

(20) That in respect of rent no deductions should be allowed; the matter being left to be dealt with by free contract, entirely separate from the contract of employment.

(21) That the supply of a house or of lodging accommodation on the employer's premises should be allowed.

(22) That in respect of medicine and medical attendance :—

(a) The exception in Section 23 of the Act of 1831 empowering the employer to contract to supply his workmen with medical attendance, &c., should be repealed.

(c) The contributions may either be collected by the workmen and paid over direct to the doctor or may, at the request of the workmen, be deducted by the employer from the wages for the purpose of being paid over either to the workmen's representatives or to the doctor under arrangements made between employers and workmen.

(d) No commission on account of the services rendered by the employer in this transaction should be allowed by law.

(23) That the supply of fuel for home consumption, and deductions in respect thereof should be allowed.

(24) That the supply of food and drink (not intoxicating) consumed on the employer's premises, and deductions in respect thereof, should be allowed.

(25) That the provisions of Sections 23 and 24 of the Truck Act of 1831 in respect of the supply of hay, corn or other provender, and also in respect of the education of children, should be repealed.

(26) That in respect of benefit societies attached to works, no deductions should be allowed except in the case of (a) societies certified under the Shop Clubs Act, and (b) societies authorised under statutory powers to make deductions.

(27) That in respect of benefit societies outside the employment no deductions should be allowed.

(28) That in respect of hospitals there should be no alteration of the existing law.

(29) That the supply of uniform should be allowed.

(30) That power should be given to a Central Authority to make regulations as to the accommodation, e.g., sanitation, lavatory, bath and sanitary accommodation, ventilation and cubic space of bedrooms, single beds, etc., provided in living-in establishments.

(31) That the law as to the sale of food unfit for human consumption should be extended so as to apply to the case of an employer supplying, or having on his premises for supplying, to his workers, food unfit for human consumption.

(32) That the law should provide for inspection of living-in establishments by inspectors of the local authority who already inspect under the Shop Hours Act, and that it should be made their duty to enforce the regulations of the Central Authority.

210. We cannot conclude our Report without recording in emphatic terms our testimony to the value of the labours of our secretary, Mr. Bettany. Without a secretary of such capacity and such power of unwearied industry it would have been impossible, looking to the great mass of detail with which we have been throughout confronted as a Committee, to bring our labours to a conclusion for possibly some years to come. In correspondence with the interests affected, in the arrangement of the work of the Committee, and in assistance in framing this Report, we gratefully record our appreciation of his services.

MEMORANDUM BY MR. DELEVINGNE.

The recommendation in the Report with regard to deductions or payments for bad work and damage seems to me to leave the question in an unsatisfactory position. The intention is, I understand, to abolish these deductions or payments. The repeal, however, of the provisions of Section 2 of the Act of 1896 as suggested in the Report, will not by itself be sufficient to give effect to this intention. Those provisions are restrictive, not enabling, provisions; and their repeal would require to be accompanied by a definite enactment prohibiting all such charges if their abolition is to be effected. It appears, however, that though charges for bad work or damage are not to be allowed, it is still to be open to the employer to impose a fine in respect of acts or omissions causing or likely to cause bad work or damage, subject to the conditions proposed in the earlier part of the Report. It is difficult to see how provisions can be framed which will prohibit charges in respect of bad work or damage, but allow fines to be imposed in respect of the acts or omissions on the part of the workers which led to the damage. Nor would this mode of dealing with the matter seem likely to be satisfactory either to employer or employed. A fine of 1s. in the case of a man earning 20s. a week for some act which has resulted in serious damage will not have much value as a deterrent or measure of discipline, while it certainly will not be satisfactory to the employer. On the other hand, if the employer, being deprived of his present power, has recourse to the other methods open to him, as indicated in the Report, the result will be harsher probably for the worker and certainly not more conducive to harmonious relations between employer and employed than the existing system.

I agree with the remark in the Report that it would no doubt be the most satisfactory settlement of the question if it could be arranged for all disputes as to bad work or damage to be referred to some works tribunal to settle. The evidence we have had shows that such disputes are at present often settled in the organised trades without difficulty between the union and the employers; and it seems well worth consideration whether employers and workmen could be encouraged to adopt this method of settling questions in regard to the work of the employee. The general establishment of committees representative of employer and employed for purposes of this kind is hardly to be hoped for at present; but they are already in existence at some works, and something might perhaps be done to promote their formation more widely.

Where, however, this is not practicable the following conditions would seem sufficient (with the existing restrictions in Section 2 of the Act) to check the abuses to which the Committee's attention has been called:—

(1) The employer should not be able to throw on the worker the loss caused by defects which are due to the worker's inexperience, or to other causes outside the worker's control; the worker should only be liable in cases where there has been carelessness or negligence on his part, and the onus should be placed on the employer of proving the carelessness or negligence in any legal proceedings that may ensue.

(2) The charge to be made should bear some relation to the wage of the worker as well as to the loss to the employer. This might perhaps be secured by providing that over a given period, say, a month, the amount of the charges shall not exceed a fixed proportion, say, 10 per cent., of the wages earned during that period by the worker. This should allow sufficient elasticity in the working of the system without harshness to the worker.

It seems to me to be better to deal with the subject directly in this way than, while ostensibly abolishing deductions or payments for damage or bad work, to leave it open to the employer to re-introduce them (where the amounts are small) in the shape of fines and without the protection suggested in (1) above; or, in more serious cases, to force him to bring the matter into the Courts, or to resort to one of the other methods outside the Truck Acts which are indicated in the Report.

I cannot see that anything is gained by prohibiting deductions from wages, while allowing payments by the workers, in respect of facilities provided by an employer for taking meals. These facilities are provided voluntarily by the employer for the convenience of the workers—the worker is not bound to use them—and no charge can be made by the employer on a worker who does not use them. The collection of the payments from the workers would give the employer more trouble than a deduction from wages, and might make employers less inclined to provide the facilities. Little or no complaint was made of the present system of deductions as such.

The charges collected, however, should be subject to the same condition of fairness as in the case of other advantages and benefits supplied by the employer.

The evidence given before the Committee does not seem to me to justify the prohibition of deductions for rent. Though the present system applies to large numbers of workers in various industries, complaints were made only by small sections of two industries and the grievance chiefly complained of had to do rather with the employer's power to require a worker to live in the employer's house than with his power to deduct the rent from wages. The convenience of the present system is obvious, and it should not, I think, be interfered with.

Pages 62–3, Paragraphs 150 and 154.

The recommendation in the Report that deductions for benefit societies should be prohibited seems to me to be against the weight of the evidence.

So far as regards clubs or societies attached to an employer's works the recommendation refers only to those which are not certified under the Shop Clubs Act or are not formed under express statutory powers, and of which, therefore, membership is voluntary on the part of the worker. The only evidence from the workers' side against deductions came from a small section of the mining industry, though the number of workers who belong to these clubs must be very large ; while very strong evidence as to the advantages of the system and of the serious effect which prohibition of deductions would have on the welfare of the clubs was given by such employers as Mr. Cadbury, Sir George Livesey, Mr. Ferens and Mr. Burton.

The ground for the recommendation in the Report, as I understand, is that membership of these clubs though voluntary in name is often compulsory in fact. Prohibition of deductions, however, will, at the most, go only a little way to prevent this kind of indirect compulsion while at the same time it will place a serious disability on the many useful clubs which are formed and managed by the workers themselves.

The case is even stronger as regards the benefit societies not attached to the employer's works, of which the miners' relief funds are the most important instance. Though these funds exist in most of the colliery districts of the country, and have a membership of 330,000, complaint came only from a single district, where a competing society is at work. It was admitted by one of the witnesses that the men in Northumberland and Durham are strongly in favour of the present system.

It seems to me that no case has been made out for preventing the workers, if they so desire, from having their contributions to societies of this kind deducted from their wages and paid over to their committees or representatives. The recommendation in the Report also seems to me to be inconsistent with the proposals in Paragraphs 136 and 159, to allow deductions to be made at the worker's request for contributions to a medical fund or a hospital. It is difficult to see what distinction in principle exists between a workers' club for providing medical attendance, and a workers' club for provision against accident, or for other kinds of benefit ; the same considerations appear to arise in both cases.

MALCOLM DELEVINGNE.

December 15*th*, 1908.

MEMORANDUM BY MR. A. F. YARROW.

I am of opinion that the placard having reference to fines which is generally fixed inside the works or shops, and consequently the particulars of which are only known to applicants for employment after they have actually entered the works, should be posted outside the works or shop, so that persons seeking employment shall have the opportunity of knowing exactly the conditions adopted in the works or shop prior to actually making application for a job. If the placard containing the list of fines were placed outside not only would it give applicants an opportunity of ascertaining exactly the conditions of employment prior to seeking it, but it would give the public an opportunity of knowing the conditions, and if these fines were oppressive, public opinion, through the Press would have an opportunity of making itself felt, and in this way any oppressive conditions would probably automatically be discontinued.

I agree with Mr. Delevingne that I cannot see anything is gained by prohibiting deductions from wages in respect of facilities provided by an employer for taking meals. These facilities are provided voluntarily by the employer solely for the convenience of the workers, who are not bound to use them. The collection of the payments from the workers will give the employer more trouble and expense than a deduction from wages, and the charge, therefore, for facilities for taking meals would have to be increased to a corresponding extent, and would be a direct loss to the workers.

In like manner I agree with Mr. Delevingne that the evidence does not justify the prohibition of deductions for rent. If the rent had to be collected independently, it would cause expense, and the rent would have to be raised to a corresponding extent, to the detriment of the workers.

Pages 62 and 63, Paragraphs 150 and 154.—Deductions for Benefit Societies.

I agree with Mr. Delevingne in his remarks.

I am in accord with Mr. Delevingne that the recommendation in the Report that such deductions should be prohibited seems to me most undesirable. Every possible encouragement should be given to encourage thrift among workers, and if deductions be prohibited for such purposes, there is no doubt it would be a death-blow to many benefit clubs, established for provident purposes. I am, therefore, strongly of opinion that nothing should be done to discourage such clubs, there being little doubt that in the majority of cases they are well managed. In very many of those attached to works where the workers are employed the firms give large contributions for the sake of encouraging thrift among their workpeople which contributions would be lost. I cannot imagine anything more undesirable than to do anything that can in the least check thrift, the want of which is the cause of so much misery among workers.

MINORITY REPORT BY MRS. H. J. TENNANT AND MR. STEPHEN WALSH, M.P.

SIR,—It is with regret we find ourselves unable to sign the Report. We are in cordial agreement with certain of the Recommendations (viz., 2, 3, 4, 15, 16, 20, 22 (a), 25 and 27), so far as they go, but we are unable to agree with the three chief proposals which would maintain :—

(1) The system of fines.

(2) The system (under the title of fines) of deductions for bad work and injury to materials and other property ; and

(3) The system known as the living-in system. From these three systems we would withhold the sanction of the law.

Also, we are unable to concur in certain of the minor recommendations. We are in disagreement with Recommendations 12, 17, 18, 19, 21, 22 (d), 23 and 24 which deal with the bonus system, houses, benefit societies, messrooms, medical attendance, the supply of tools, food and fuel, and with service rendered by the employer in relation to the work done by the workman.

In our opinion, disciplinary fines fail in their purpose. We believe them to be not merely negative in good but active in harm, inasmuch as they maintain and even create the very situation they are designed to destroy. Irritating in their imposition and ineffective in their result, they occupy in the organisation of industry, where they exist, the place that should be held by supervision. Our opinion is supported by the evidence of His Majesty's Inspectors of Factories Miss Paterson (Qs. 2564, 2571, 2721), Miss Squire, Miss Deane (Q. 2362) and Mr. Owner, and by other witnesses. Replying to the Chairman, Miss Squire (Q. 1837) says :—

"I should say, from my experience, that they are quite unnecessary ; that if a foreman or forewoman knows his or her business, there is no need whatever for a disciplinary fine. I think that is exemplified in certain factories where there are a very large number of departments, and the departments all resemble one another very closely, perhaps 300 girls in each department, with someone in charge ; the work is very similar. Each foreman or forewoman is provided with a book to register the fines for breaches of discipline. I found, on examining these books, that some forewomen will have their book almost filled up in six months, and others will never enter a fine of any kind ; they are quite able to maintain discipline by their own influence.

Miss Tuckwell confirms this opinion from her experience in teaching as well as from her industrial experience :—

"A good teacher can manage very well without punishments, whereas a bad teacher may be always punishing, and yet not secure good order." (Q. 5273.)

We endorse from our own experience all that has been said by the workers' representatives of the embittering effect of fines. It is significant of this power of embitterment that they are resented as much when devoted to some treat or benefit fund as when they pass directly into the master's pocket.

It is an unchallenged fact that many firms which have abandoned disciplinary fines have achieved at least as good, and often better, results without their aid. Of the employers' evidence in this sense, that given by Mr. Edward Cadbury was the most exhaustive. We therefore select it for examination, and draw attention to the supporting evidence given by Mr. Rowland Barran, M.P., of Messrs. John Barran & Sons ; Mr. Derry, of Messrs. Derry & Toms ; Mr. Ernest Debenham, of Messrs. Debenham's ; and Mr. Ferens, M.P., of Messrs. Reckitt & Sons.

Mr. Cadbury (Q. 8205) describes in detail the supervisory system substituted for the system of fines, and he gives his experience of the results of the two systems. Fines were "not in any way reformative," they "had practically no influence upon the character of offenders." (Q. 8192.) Such influence as they had was of the moment only. The system did not lead to efficiency, and did not weed out the real offenders. Asked what he would say upon the representation, frequently made to the Committee, that fines were almost a necessity in respect of late attendance, Mr. Cadbury replied: "Our time-keeping has very much improved since we . . . abolished fines." (Q. 8204.) In illustration of this improvement he informed the Committee that "late-time" cases fell from 115 in the year 1900 to 33 in the year 1905. "Substantially we have eliminated lateness." The cases of bad work fell from 129 in 1900 to 19 in 1905. In Mr. Cadbury's opinion, it would have been impossible to effect this result by a system of fines. (Qs. 8204, 8234 and infra, 8249, 8250–1, 8259.)

This reduction in the number of offences was accompanied by a reduction in the number of discharges. The percentage of discharges under the system of fining had been double that under the reformed system. (Q. 8406.) Mr. Cadbury's carefully noted and tested experience, important in all respects, is of importance in this last respect more perhaps than in any other. For it dispels the fear, held so widely, that if the power of fining were removed, the power of dismissal must be increasingly exercised. It demonstrates that because fines do little to eliminate the habitual and the grave offenders, and because careful supervision does much, it is under the system of fines, supposed to be the more considerate, that the greater number of dismissals takes place.

Mr. Cadbury alone had prepared a table of results; but Mr. Ferens (Qs. 7716, 7718) supported Mr. Cadbury's facts by his belief that in Messrs. Reckitt's works, the abolition of fines had not led to increased dismissals and was not likely to do so, and Mr. Derry stated his opinion that "one gets better work if one does not employ such harsh and unreasonable means as fines." (Q. 17892.)

Dismissal is too generally considered to be an alternative to fining: it is its accompaniment. Supervision, with cautioning as one of its incidents, is the true alternative. Dismissal, as before, would be an accompanying power in reserve, but one upon which it would be diminishingly necessary to call. And the workers, therefore, so far from being the losers, so far from exchanging into a harsher system would, in this respect as in others, gain by the abolition of fines. We emphasise this aspect, as there are some who, on all other grounds would advocate the abolition of fines, who hesitate to do so lest the worker should be sacrificed. This consideration receives great weight in the Report. (Par. 61.)

Similar and greater weight is given to suspension which it is anticipated would be widely adopted were the power of punishment by fine removed. We are able to share this conclusion in view of the testimony of a large number of employers that the system is one of great inconvenience to manufacturers. While their machinery is running inside, few employers will indulge in the luxury of keeping their workers standing outside.

We believe as discipline improved under the abolition of fines, there would be less, not greater, recourse to suspension. We agree with Miss Squire that, in the place of the present register of fines, a register of suspensions should be kept by employers; this would enable Inspectors to investigate the circumstances of each suspension and report upon the system.

We have been deeply influenced by the evidence of those inspectors who have exceptional experience in the administration of the Truck Acts; by the evidence of Miss Tuckwell, the President of the Women's Trade Union League, speaking on behalf of 150,000 federated women workers; and by the evidence of those employers who have had exceptional experience of discipline with and without fines. In the presence of the facts produced by these witnesses, and in the knowledge that the majority of firms have no recourse to fines, we are unable to share the conclusion that it is necessary or desirable to maintain them. Nor can we agree with the conclusion that the supply of persons capable of exercising efficient control is unequal to the demand. Where the demand is made, the response appears to us to be excellent. Mr. Ferens' evidence on this point is of interest. (Q. 7668.)

By stimulating a better system of control, a better selection of men and women for responsible posts, a better supervision not only of human beings, but of plant and materials, and by ensuring a closer association of employers with the management of their works, we believe the abolition of fines would be an important contribution towards the development of national efficiency.

In the regulation of fines we have no similar faith. We readily admit that under the proposals of the Report many of the abuses of the present legalised system would disappear. But many would remain. The sense of injustice, the irritation that is the essence of the system, the friction, the substantial grievance of the loss where the maximum penalty becomes the standard penalty, or where the wages are already low, all this would remain. The tendency of a maximum to become a standard, illustrated by several witnesses, and recognised in the Report (Par. 85) must not be considered by itself, but in connection with the clear intention of unscrupulous firms to make a profit out of their workers by methods that upright firms would reject (Par. 92.) Many such cases are within our official experience. It must also be realised that, though a limitation to 5 per cent. would secure an improvement, it would remain a heavy charge upon a low wage. To the worker whose wages do not exceed ten shillings, 6d. is a serious loss ; still more so is 3d. when it is taken from five shillings.

These would be some of the disadvantages for the worker. For the Factory Department there would be : The multiplication of notices—already of embarrassing volume—with but little chance of their receiving close attention, though the labour of their treatment would be great. Moreover there would be involved the dangerous practice of calling upon an inspector to sanction abstractions. There are many abstract penalties to which it would be impossible to take exception under a legalised system of fines, which in the circumstances of their application might be altogether unjust. The employer would have yet more notices to send, and yet another age condition for his confusion ; while he would hardly be in a strong position towards those workers who had reached the 5 per cent. limit at the beginning of the week.

(2) Deductions for Bad Work and Injury to Materials, and other Property.

The recognition of bad work as a subject for discipline, and the consequent inclusion of its penalties among fines, does not diminish or indeed touch the dangers of the system. Those dangers have been clearly established by the evidence, and are acknowledged in the Report (Pars. 75, 86.) We do not labour them ; but we point out that an employer may as unjustly attribute to the carelessness of the worker (often powerless to bring rebutting proof) a fault in fact due to some defect in his own plant or materials, and may as successfully penalise him under one system as under the other. The deduction for bad work becomes the disciplinary fine for carelessness ; a worker, helpless in the one case, is helpless in the other. Where the fault is in fact one of carelessness, and its repetition is continued, stronger measures in our opinion would serve best the lasting interest of both worker and employer.

We are unable to endorse the conclusion reached by the Committee (Recommendations 30, 31 and 32) that the evils of the living-in system can be adequately met by regulation. A system where workers are compelled to lodge and board in a particular place must, in itself, stand condemned, whether that place be owned and controlled by the employer or by any other person. However bad the accommodation may be, the assistants have no power to retaliate by removing to a rival establishment, and there is, therefore, no incentive to improvement. No amount of regulation can overcome this underlying evil, nor can regulations do more than impose a minimum standard in the matter of sanitary requirements. Further, no system of inspection would be effective even if a much larger number of inspectors were appointed than we have any reason to expect from local authorities. (Bondfield, Q. 13284.)

Inspection, in order to be effective, would necessarily be intolerable to the assistants themselves. A visit of inspection during the day-time to ascertain whether a sufficient amount of air-space was allowed in sleeping apartments would obviously not meet the case. Such visits would have to be followed up by night visits, by which alone the number of persons occupying a room could be proved. In view of the difficulty met with by inspectors in detecting overcrowding in workshops, owing to the ease with which workers are transferred from one department to another, and of the repeated attempts made by occupiers to evade the law in this respect, we can see no reason to hope that overcrowding in bedrooms could be checked by day visits alone, and the objections to night visits are apparent. The last shred of pretence at being home-like would be torn from living-in houses, if an inspector were liable to enter the occupants' bedrooms at night. The very suggestion reveals the futility of any attempt at adequate inspection.

It is alleged that assistants would experience difficulty in procuring lodgings were the present system abolished. It is clear, that in so far as employers have been making a profit out of the living-in accommodation provided, similar profits could be made by independent undertakings—boarding houses, or co-operative lodgings—and there seems no reason to fear that the supply of such lodgings would not respond to the demand created by the abolition of the present living-in houses. In so far as employers supply their assistants with this accommodation at cost price, as it has been represented they do, we would submit that the release of their capital from the unprofitable investment should be taken into account in calculating the increase in wages, consequent upon the withdrawal of board and lodging.

We fully recognise that employers who board their assistants on their shop premises would meet with difficulty in altering their arrangements at short notice. In the case of living-in houses apart from the shop or workrooms, we think it would be reasonable to suggest that they could be abandoned, or converted to other purposes within a year. But in view of the difficulty in certain cases of finding a use for the upper storeys of a large shop, we think that a longer period of transition should be allowed. We would suggest three years as a reasonable period, and we would be willing to allow that or any similar reasonable period in the case of the detached houses where the employer is embarrassed by a long lease.

Were the system abolished, the situation so created would be met, we believe, in three ways :—

(1) By a reduction in the number of young people sent by their parents from a distance ;

(2) By the placing of those so sent with friends or relations, or in suitable lodgings ;

(3) By the greater employment of young people in their own towns. (Bondfield, Q. 13289.)

It is suggested in the Report that the circumstances in which the living-out system is possible and successful in Scotland, which are those we have just described, would not be acceptable elsewhere. We submit that there are no facts in support of this opinion. We see no reason why assistants in England, for example, should not follow the custom observed in Scotland. In many parts of England they do so in considerable measure. (See Miss Deane's Memorandum.) Mr. Derry, of Messrs. Derry and Toms, is satisfied there would be no dearth of lodgings. It has, however, been represented to us that, even if the lodging accommodation were sufficient, it would be unsuitable, and that under such a system the great moral advantages attached to the living-in system would be lost. We share neither the distrust of the one system, nor the trust of the other. Questioned upon the moral advantages of the living-in system, Mr. Derry replied (Q. 17880) :—

" I do not think there is any advantage in it at all. I have put it before in this way, that, supposing anyone wishes their daughter or son to enter the business, I think it is very much better for them to be able to come to town and select lodgings for the daughter or the son, and for them to go to some responsible person, any religious or other institute of some sort, and ask them to keep an eye on the person. The parent or guardian has then got an opportunity of knowing into whose care he is giving his child. But the character of some employers I would not trust for their own housekeepers. I do not think drapers are worse than any other commercial men, but all commercial men are the same. For my own part, if I had a boy or a girl, I would much rather see them properly lodged with a person that I could find out all about, than I would put them into a big house of which I knew nothing."

And :—

(Q. 17881.) " It has been put before us that it is impossible for the parents to find such a person ?—I totally disagree with that opinion. The experience I have of them (and we take a great deal of trouble with our young people), is that they are extremely well provided for, and numbers of them are living with Christian people in whom we should have every confidence to put our own children. I think there is no difficulty in finding proper apartments. Some of them have had changes, and have had queer experiences, but in the end they have settled down into comfortable, respectable places. I do not agree with the view that parents cannot find such places for their children.

(Q. 17882.) " You think there would be no difficulty in the case either of a young man or a young woman ?—No, I do not think so.

(Q. 17883.) " Or of all young men and young women ?—Yes. The whole thing is a matter of £ s. d. If the employers are able to pay them sufficient to get a decent lodging, there are decent lodgings to be had I am quite out of touch with excuses which have been made by employers at conferences I have been at, with regard to the moral side of the question. I think it is sheer nonsense. Whatever system we have, we shall have black sheep as well as white ones, and I think when they get a change after their business, there is more chance for them, and they are more likely to be moral when they get freedom from what we may term drudgery.

(Q. 17884.) " You described some houses in which the system has clearly been bad, both in respect of companionship, and food, and accommodation ?—Yes.

(Q. 17885.) " It has been suggested to us that things of that kind may happen in the East End, but could not possibly happen in the West. What do you say on that point ?—I should say it is an extremely possible thing that it happens in the West End. I will put it no more strongly than that.

(Q. 17886.) " There was one example you gave us in which the assistants who came to you had been locked out on Sundays. Was that in the East or the West End ?—It was in the centre of London."

With Mr. Derry's views we are in complete agreement. We would submit that the system has been proved to fail in the direction in which most has been claimed for it. Mr. Derry, for example, refers to the dangers of bad companionship and of the practice of locking out assistants on Sundays (Qs. 17818, 17884), matters with which Miss Bondfield also deals fully in her evidence. With regard to the first matter, it is clear from the evidence that assistants must constantly endure bad companionship. They are reluctant to complain, sometimes lest they themselves should suffer, sometimes lest others should suffer. With regard to the second matter, it has been shown that in cases where a pass had to be obtained by assistants desiring to spend the night out, this pass was insisted upon only in respect of the first five nights of the week. No pass was required in respect of Saturday and Sunday, and on those nights the assistants were required to live out. The abandonment of the interests of morality on these two nights of the week is significant. Again, Miss Bondfield (Q. 13300) gives a case in which an assistant, arriving in London from Cardiff on Friday evening, is turned out on Saturday under the same system to find her own lodgings for the two following nights. While assistants who, in accordance with the custom of the living-in system, are summarily discharged, lose their work and their home at the same time. The dangers are obvious.

We received striking evidence of the injury to health which arises from compulsory association in bedrooms with phthisical companions, and such cases are within the experience of one of us. (Bondfield, Qs. 13328, 13216.)

It is unnecessary to examine further the claim that a custom which has disclosed so many and such grave abuses, has been a moral protection. Nor is it necessary to add condemnation to a system so condemned. We conclude by drawing attention to the evidence given by several witnesses to its devastating influence upon the citizenship of both men and women.

(4) Minor Recommendations.

In our disagreement with the minor recommendations, we are governed by the same principles as those which guided our policy upon the larger matters. We desire to secure to the workman a net wage free from harassing and dangerous inroads, and full freedom in the disposal of this wage.

(1) Bonus System.—We regard this system as altogether dangerous. The recommendation of the Committee on this point we consider inadequate to prevent an employer allotting a proportion of the present wage to a bonus for good work or good conduct, and then withholding the bonus on the worker failing to reach his standard. Its retention would therefore nullify the limitation of fines by percentage. In our opinion the bonus is as unnecessary in order to procure a high standard of work or conduct, as is the fine. We agree with the view put forward by Dr. Whitelegge, His Majesty's Chief Inspector of Factories, that the system "places part of the real wage on a footing which removes the protection of the Truck Acts. Withholding it is substantially a fine." (Q. 540 The retention of the system, therefore, would be open to the same objections as the retention of the system of fines, and it is not necessary for us to elaborate the matter further. We would merely draw attention to the evidence under this head given by Miss Paterson and Miss Deane. (Qs. 2475, 2496, 2588, 2590.)

(2) Supply of tools, fuel, uniform, and other services.—In our opinion such supply compulsorily by the employer to the workman, is open to the abuses in general attaching to the supply of goods of any kind in this manner, and we see no adequate reasons for allowing the exceptions proposed in Recommendations XVII., XVIII., XXIII. and XXIX. Especially in the matter of tools we would point out that except in certain cases, where a workman does not as a matter of course possess a set of tools (e.g., a carpenter), the supply of tools and implements is open to the grave objection that something so supplied and coming into the possession of the worker in one place of employment, may not be adapted for use in another firm, so that the worker is left with a useless implement upon his or her hands. It seems better, therefore, to prohibit altogether the sale of tools by an employer to a workman. Thus in some cases the cost of the tools would form part of the expenses of production, and in others, where the tools form part of the workman's personal outfit, he would make his own arrangements as to purchase.

Similarly we are of opinion that Recommendation XV. should be extended to include all materials, not only those which go into the substance of the fabric or product.

(3) Mess-rooms, etc.—We cannot concur in Recommendation XXIV., as it is open to the same objection as that referred to above in reference to the living-in system. An employer who supplies food to his workers should be subject to the competition of outside canteens and restaurants ; otherwise there can be no guarantee of the quality of the food. Mess-rooms and the provision of meals, therefore, should be allowed only if their use be optional, and payment be made at the time and not in the form of deductions from wages.

We are unable to attach importance to the recommendation of the Committee in Paragraph 141 that deductions for food "should be subject to the condition that the deduction does not exceed the cost to the employer." It is not, in our opinion, possible to ascertain the cost in such cases without the employer's help. The cases in which this help would be most needed are the cases in which it would be most denied. This difficulty has been emphasised by inspectors.

(4) Medical Attendance.—We cannot subscribe to any recommendation based upon the principle that a deduction may be made "at the request of the workman." Such "requests" are apt to be wanting in the ordinary characteristics of a free request, and we consider therefore that all arrangements for medical attendance should be under the control and management of the workmen concerned, or of outside persons entirely unconnected with the employer's business.

(5) Fines in Mines.—We strongly deprecate the prevailing system of imposing fines upon miners guilty of breaches of statutory regulations instead of taking proceedings in the manner provided in the Coal Mines Regulations Acts. In view of the opinion we hold that fines are ineffective as a means of enforcing discipline, we are unable to approve of this option of fining as a penalty for offences liable to endanger human life. We regret, therefore, that the Committee decided to refer this matter to the Royal Commission on Mines without making any recommendation. (Paragraph 68.) We further regret the Committee's decision not to deal with the question of fines for improper filling. (Paragraph 69.) We wish to condemn the system of duplicating disciplinary fines with the deductions made in pursuance of Section 12 of the Coal Mines Regulation Act, 1887. In our opinion it offends against equity to impose a fine in money in respect of a matter for which the workman has already suffered the penalty in weight prescribed by the Statute.

(6) Administration.—We are of opinion that Recommendation VI. should be strengthened in the sense that, not only should inspectors appointed by local authorities be empowered to enforce the Truck Acts in shops, but that local authorities should be required by law to appoint such inspectors. We also suggest that Recommendation III. should be extended to all places under the inspection of factory inspectors.

We disagree with the conclusions reached in Paragraph 36 of the Report. It may be seen from the Annual Charities Register and Digest that many charitable institutions derive the chief part of their income from industrial earnings, which amount in several cases to as much as 90 per cent. of the total income. In one case where these earnings were about 91 per cent., they amounted to over £6,000. We are of opinion that where institutions of this character engage in trade competition they should be subject to regulations similar to those of other industrial undertakings. The ultimate object of the profit accrued should not be allowed to enable them to compete unfairly with their trade rivals.

Summary of Conclusions.

Summarised, our Recommendations are as follows :—

(1) That disciplinary fines should be prohibited by law.

(2) That all deductions for bad work and injury to materials and other property should be similarly prohibited, and that no fines should be permitted as penalties in respect of such work or damage.

(3) That the living-in system should be prohibited by law.

(4) That the bonus system should be prohibited by law.

(5) That no deductions should be permitted in respect of the supply of tools, fuel, uniform, or other services, or in respect of any materials used in manufacturing processes, whether such materials pass into the substance of the fabric or product or not.

(6) That no deductions or payments to the employer should be allowed in respect of medical attendance whether avowedly at the request of the workman or not.

(7) That the use of mess-rooms supplied by the employer and the taking of meals so provided should be optional, and any accommodation so used or meals so taken should be paid for at the time, and not in the form of deductions from wages.

(8) That the powers of factory inspectors with regard to the enforcement of the Truck Acts should extend not only to docks and warehouses, but also to any other workplaces which are subject to inspection by these inspectors, such as the buildings and railways dealt with in Sections 105 and 106 of the Factory and Workshops Act, 1901.

(9) That local authorities should be placed under a statutory obligation to appoint inspectors for the enforcement of the Truck Acts in shops.

We are in agreement with the views expressed in Paragraph 38 of the Report, and we wish definitely to recommend :—

(10) That the Truck Acts should be extended to the classes of workers referred to in that paragraph (omnibus conductors, tramcar drivers and goods guards).

We endorse most cordially the tribute paid by the Committee to Mr. Bettany whose help and courtesy have been unfailing.

CORRESPONDENCE THAT PASSED BETWEEN THE CHAIRMAN OF THE TRUCK COMMITTEE AND THE CHAIRMAN OF THE ROYAL COMMISSION ON MINES.

Dover House, Whitehall, S.W.
28*th July*, 1908.

To the Chairman of the Royal Commission on Mines.

DEAR LORD MONKSWELL,

The Departmental Committee on Truck, &c., has had laid before it a certain body of evidence in regard to the subject of certain fines and deductions from the wages of miners. At a recent meeting of the Committee I was requested to write to you as Chairman of the Royal Commission on Mines upon the subject. I have no doubt that you will agree that it would be undesirable that there should be separate deliverances on the same subject by the Commission and the Committee, and my Committee feel that the questions referred to may be held to fall more expressly within the remit to the Royal Commission presided over by you. They are accordingly refraining from dealing with them further than by narrating this communication. A copy of the evidence laid before the Committee will be sent to the Secretary of the Commission.

The following are the three main points :—

(First).—The statutory provisions of the Mines Regulation Acts, not only in the formulation of the general rules, but in giving statutory authority to the framing of special rules, form a very detailed code, the breach of any of the provisions of which may be the subject of prosecution at law. The evidence laid before the Committee appears to show that—partly owing to unwillingness and partly owing to the expense and loss of time incident to legal proceedings—prosecutions which would otherwise be warranted under the statute do not take place; but that a system has come into play, at least in England, of the imposition of fines,—which, apparently by consent of both parties, are imposed and paid as in lieu of what might be the more inconvenient and drastic consequences of criminal proceedings. The contention has been put before us that the system of fining is unsatisfactory and in substance not very distinguishable from compounding for offences. But, as I have said, my Committee do not desire to pronounce definitely upon it, but have asked me to mention the point as it has occurred upon the evidence submitted.

(Second).—There appears to be considerable dissatisfaction in regard to fines for bad filling, and this also the Committee desire to bring under the notice of the Royal Commission. No specific recommendation has been adopted by the Committee on this particular question, which, however, the Royal Commission, with its fuller knowledge of the subject, may desire to deal with.

(Third).—Under the Truck Act, 1831, Section 23, permission is given to the employers to supply materials, to be by such artificer employed in his trade or occupation if such artificer be employed in mining. The most important of such materials, in so far as public safety is concerned, are explosives. My Committee, in dealing with such materials generally, are in favour of their not being charged or allowed as permissible deductions from wages; but, as the predominating consideration with reference to explosives is that of the public safety, and as this point is particularly before the Royal Commission, we desire to make no pronouncement upon it further than indicating the view just mentioned.

I have the honour to be,
Dear Lord Monkswell,
Your Lordship's very faithful,
(sd.) THO. SHAW.

To the Right Hon. Lord Monkswell.

Royal Commission on Mines,
31, Great George Street, S.W.
30*th July*, 1908.

DEAR LORD ADVOCATE,

I am obliged for your letter of the 28th instant conveying to me the views of the Departmental Committee on Truck, etc., as regards that part of their enquiry which relates to certain fines and deductions from the wages of miners, and I have to say that I laid the matter before the Royal Commission on Mines at their meeting to-day. The Commission desire me to convey to you their appreciation of the Committee's courtesy, and to inform you that they concur in the opinion that it would be undesirable that the subjects referred to should be dealt with in the Reports of both the Commission and the Committee.

With regard to the first of the points specified, the enforcement of general and special rules under the Coal Mines Regulations Acts by fines or by prosecution appears to the Commission to concern directly the question of safety; the matter was referred specially to them by the Home Office, and they have taken a considerable amount of evidence relating to it. The Commission propose, therefore, to make some recommendations on the matter in their Report, and when they come to discuss it they will consider carefully the evidence given before your Committee which you have kindly promised to send to the Secretary to the Commission.

The second point as to fining for bad filling does not, in the opinion of the Commission, affect safety, but is closely connected with the question of check-weighing. The representatives of the colliery owners and of the miners decided not to offer any evidence on this subject before the Commission, and in the circumstances the Commission cannot see their way to deal with the matter.

With regard to the third point, the Commission agree that the supply of explosives to miners is a question affecting safety, and they propose to deal with it in their Report. In doing so they will not fail to give the fullest consideration to the views expressed by your Committee on the general question of deductions from wages for the supply of materials to workmen.

I have the honour to be,
Very faithfully yours,
(sd.) MONKSWELL.

The Right Hon. The Lord Advocate, Chairman of the Departmental Committee on Truck and Fines and Deductions from Wages.

APPENDIX II.

[1] SUMMARY OF THE LAWS OF THE COLONIES AND CERTAIN FOREIGN COUNTRIES RELATING TO TRUCK AND FINES AND DEDUCTIONS FROM WAGES.

I. THE COLONIES.

CANADA.

The matter is mainly left to the Provincial Legislatures. The following is a summary of the laws in force :—

Truck Generally.*

CASH PAYMENT.

British Columbia (Urban Workmen †).—Contracts to provide for cash payment, or else they are void. If workman consents, payment is allowed by duly honoured cheques or by note or British coin circulating in British Columbia at face value.

ADVANCES.

British Columbia (Workmen Generally‡).—Advances to which the workman is entitled not to be withheld or be subject to deduction of poundage, discount, interest, etc.

The employer may advance moneys to be contributed to legally established benefit funds, etc., or for relief in sickness.

PAYMENT IN KIND.

Prince Edward Island.—Payment in spirituous liquors, illegal and punishable (under liquor laws) and of no effect, the workmen having still a right of action for his wage.

Nova Scotia (Coal Mines).—Employers may make deductions in respect of coal, oil, rent, powder. The Dominion Coal Company has been authorised by special Act to deduct, under written agreement, instalments towards payment for lands or tenements bought from the company.

British Columbia (Urban Workmen†).—Payment in goods prohibited, and of no effect. Goods, board or lodging cannot be the subject of an action by the employer and cannot be set off against a claim for wages.

There are, however, special exceptions permitting the supply of the following :—

Medicine and medical attendance.
Fuel.
Provender for cattle used in work.
Tenements.
Materials, tools and implements used by miners, fishers and loggers.
The boarding and lodging, in company's boarding cars, of workmen constructing or repairing railways.

MANNER OF SPENDING WAGES, ETC.

British Columbia (Urban Workmen†), (including Miners), except Farm Labourers).—Contracts indicating directly or indirectly the place where, the manner in which, or the person with whom wages are to be spent, are null and void.

British Columbia (Workmen Generally‡).—No conditions to be imposed, and no dismissal to be made because of method of spending, etc.

Deductions.*

DEDUCTIONS FOR SHARPENING AND REPAIRING TOOLS.

British Columbia (all Workmen, including Miners, but excluding Farm Labourers).—Illegal unless provided for in agreement separate from contract of hiring.

DEDUCTIONS FOR DAMAGE, ETC.

Manitoba.—In an action by an employee against the employer in respect of wages, the Court may consider damage or loss caused by wilful or malicious act or neglect or breach of contract of service, but cannot award to the employer any balance or sum in his favour.

Nova Scotia (Coal Mines).—There are provisions as to deductions for stone, etc.

DEDUCTION FOR BENEFIT FUNDS, MEDICAL ATTENDANCE, HOSPITALS, &c.

Nova Scotia (Coal Mines).—Employer may make deduction for "church or society dues."

There are special Acts (applying apparently to all employees) authorising deductions for sick benefit funds, &c., prescribing for audit by a committee of the workmen, and prescribing that payments out of the funds shall be made only to doctors, &c., approved by a majority of workmen at a special meeting. In towns of more than 3,000 inhabitants the employer must, at the request of 30 or more workmen, make deductions, but these can go only to practitioners specified by the individual workmen. If the workman wishes to change his doctor, he must give a month's notice. The fine payable by an employer for breach of these special provisions is 50 dollars. The employer is enabled by statute to make advances to his workmen for contributions to legally established benefit societies, &c., or for relief in sickness.

Dominion of Canada—(Public Works, i.e., Railways, Canals, etc).—Deductions permitted for medical attendance, hospitals, medicine, etc. An Act of the Dominion, and regulations made thereunder, require such things to be provided.

Nova Scotia (Mines and Manufactures).—Employer on request of 40 per cent. of workers, must facilitate attendance by a given doctor and make the necessary deductions.

Nova Scotia (Coal Mines) Employer may make deductions in respect of doctor's fees.

Ontario (Unorganised Territories of).—Special provision is made for the provision of medical attendance by the employer, the expense to be apportioned by the Minister over the Board of Health.

British Columbia (Urban Workmen†).—Employers may make deductions in respect of medicine and medical attendance.

MISCELLANEOUS DEDUCTIONS.

Nova Scotia (Coal Mines).—Employer may make a deduction for checkweighers' fees. On employee's written order, the employer may apply his wages to the payment of debt.

Nova Scotia (Metalliferous Mines).—Employer may not make a deduction in respect of rates without written consent.

Ontario (Subsidized Railways).—Some of the Acts authorising these require the rates charged for board, clothing, etc., to be fair and reasonable.

British Columbia (Workmen Generally‡).—Deductions for goods, board and lodging not to exceed real and true value.

British Columbia (Urban Workmen†). Employers may make deductions in respect of:

Fuel.
Provender for cattle used in work.
Tenements.
Materials, tools, and implements used by miners, fishers, and loggers.
Boarding and lodging, in company's boarding-cars, of workmen constructing or repairing railways.

† Urban Workmen = workmen employed on works, etc., in or within three miles of an incorporated city or town.

‡ Workmen = any persons engaged in manual labour except domestics and farm labourers.

NEW SOUTH WALES.

Truck Generally.

Payment of Wages.—To be made in money (coin, postal notes and orders, or banknotes) or, when the workmen consents, in cheques, drafts, or orders payable on demand, but if these be dishonoured the workman can recover damages as well as the wages. Payment to be made (if so demanded, and this notwithstanding any contract) at intervals of not more than fourteen days. Advances, where customary or agreed, to be made without deduction for poundage, interest, discount, etc. Contracts violating these provisions are to that extent void.

Spending of Wages and Place of Residence.—Contracts imposing conditions as to the manner and place in which, or the person with whom wages are to be spent, or requiring residence on the employer's land, are forbidden, as also is dismissal in respect of the same matters.

Goods, etc., illegally supplied in payment of wages, and goods supplied, sold, or delivered at shop owned, etc., by the employer, or supplied, etc., by his orders, cannot be the subject of an action by the employer against the workmen and cannot be set-off against the workman's claim for wages. Where payment is made illegally (i.e., in goods, etc.) the workman may still claim payment in money.

Fines.

No statutory provisions.

Deductions.

Deductions for Sharpening and Repairing Tools.—Forbidden except when made by agreement.

Deductions for Damaged Goods, etc. — Not specially regulated by statute.

Deductions for Sick Funds, etc.—Not specially regulated by statute. See however the provision below as to medicine, etc.

Deductions for Hospital.—A special Act permits deductions in Yancowinna (which includes the Broken Hill, Alma Round Hill, and Silvertown Mining Districts) in respect of voluntary donations or subscriptions to a hospital fund.

Matters to which the Act does not apply provided the deduction or stoppage does not exceed the amount of the advance made or the value of the thing supplied:—

Supply of medicine or medical attendance.

Supply of fuel, materials, tools, appliances, or implements for the use of the workman.

Supply of bushmen's outfits up to the amount of two months' wages.

Supply of provender for cattle, etc., used in the work.

Supply of tenement for the workman.

Allowances or privileges in addition to money wages.

Advances for relief in sickness, or for workman's family by his order.

Persons to whom the Act Applies.

All "workmen," i,e., anyone "in any manner employed in work of any kind or in manual labour whether under or over twenty-one years of age," the following classes being excepted:—

Seamen.
Domestic servants.
Persons engaged in agricultural or pastoral pursuits.

Penalties.—For first offence, fine not exceeding £10; for the second, not exceeding £25; and for the third, not exceeding £50.

NEW ZEALAND.

Truck Generally.

Payment of Wages.—To be made in money (coin or notes) or, when the workman consents, in uncrossed cheques, drafts, or orders payable on demand, but, if these be dishonoured, the workman may recover damages as well as the wages.

Spending of Wages.—Contracts imposing conditions as to the manner and place in which or the person with whom wages are to be spent, are illegal and void.

Goods illegally supplied, and goods supplied, sold or delivered at the shop, etc., of the employer or by his orders.—Such supply is not effective payment. The workman may still recover his wages, and, save when the supply is expressly provided by an exception in the Act, the employer cannot bring an action in respect thereof, nor can the supply be made the subject of a set-off or counterclaim against the workman in an action by him against the employer in respect of his wages.

Fines.

No statutory provisions.

Deductions.

Deductions for Sharpening or Repairing Tools.—Forbidden except when embodied in an agreement.

Deductions for Damage, etc.—Not specially regulated by statute.

Deductions for Sick or Benefit Clubs.—Not specially regulated by statute. See however the provisions below as to medicine and medical attendance and as to advances for relief in sickness.

Deductions for Workmen's Compensations, etc.—There is an Act forbidding an employer or insurance company taking directly or indirectly any deduction or payment from any worker in respect of employer's liability or workmen's compensation, and this Act contains a proviso exempting from its provisions any voluntary arrangement approved by a stipendiary for insurance against accidents happening to the worker outside the time when he is engaged working for such employer. The premium payable by the worker is not to exceed one-third of the amount payable.

Matters to which the Acts do not apply provided the deduction or stoppage does not exceed the ordinary real and true value of the things supplied:—

The supply of medicine or medical attendance.

The supply of food, materials, tools, implements or appliances for the workman's use in his calling.

The supply of bushmen's outfits up to the amount of two months' wages.

The supply of provender, etc., of cattle used in the work.

The supply of a tenement for the workman.

The supply of victuals dressed or prepared under the employer's roof and there consumed, and non-intoxicating drink, there consumed.

Advances to take up engagement, or to be contributed to any society or association or savings bank, or for relief in sickness or for the workman's family, and made by his order.

None of these exemptions, save that for medicine and medical attendance, apply to contractors (a) to the Government or local authority, (b) for railway or road-making work.

Persons to whom the Act Applies.

All workmen, i.e., any person in any manner employed in work of any kind or in manual labour whether under or over twenty-one years of age, the following classes being excepted:—

Seamen.

Persons employed in agricultural or pastoral pursuits.

Penalties.—First offence, £10; second, £25; third, £50.

QUEENSLAND.

No general law.

Deductions for Workmen's Compensation, etc.—The Workmen's Compensation Act, 1905, Sec. 14, forbids the deduction from wages of sums intended to recoup the employer for the expense of insuring, etc., against his liability to pay compensation under the statute, or damages under the general law.

SOUTH AUSTRALIA. TASMANIA. VICTORIA.

No law on the subject.

WESTERN AUSTRALIA.

Truck Generally.

Payment of wages.—To be made in money (coin or notes) or, when the workman consents, in uncrossed cheques, drafts, or orders payable on demand, but, if these be dishonoured, the workman may recover damages as well as the wages.

Spending of wages.—Contracts imposing conditions as to the manner and place in which or the person with whom wages are to be spent, are illegal and void.

Goods illegally supplied, and goods supplied sold or delivered at the shop, etc., of the employer or by his orders.—Such supply is not effective payment. The workman may still recover his wages, and, save when the supply is expressly provided for by an exception in the Act, the employer cannot bring an action in respect thereof, nor can it be made the subject of a set-off or counterclaim against the workman in an action by him against the employer in respect of his wages.

Fines.

No statutory provisions.

Deductions.

Deductions for sharpening or repairing tools. Forbidden except when embodied in an agreement separate from the contract of hiring.

Deductions for damage, etc.—Not specially regulated by statute.

Deductions for sick and benefit clubs, etc.—Not specially regulated by statute; See, however, the provisions below as to the supply of medicine, etc., and advances for relief in sickness.

Matters to which the Acts do not apply, provided the deduction or stoppage does not exceed the ordinary real and true value of the things supplied at the place where they are supplied :—

The supply of necessaries at the workman's written request, during the first six weeks of his service, to be paid out for from the wages earned during that time.

The supply of medicine or medical attendance, in any part of the Colony defined by the Governor by Proclamation.

The supply of food, materials, tools, implements or appliances for the workman's use in his calling.

The supply of Bushmen's outfits up to the amount of two months' wages.

The supply of provender, etc., of cattle used in the work.

The supply of a tenement for the workman.

The supply of allowances or privileges in addition to money wages.

The supply of victuals dressed or prepared under the employer's roof and there consumed, and non-intoxicating drink there consumed.

Advances to take up engagement, or to be contributed to any society or association or savings bank, or for relief in sickness or for the workman's family, and made by his order.

Persons to whom the Act Applies.

All workmen, i.e., any person in any manner employed for wages, in work of any kind, or in manual labour, whether over or under twenty-one years of age, the following classes being excepted :—

Seamen.

Persons employed in agricultural fruit growing or pastoral pursuits.

Persons engaged on sheep or cattle stations.

Penalties. First offence, £10 ; second, £25 ; third, £50.

II.—FOREIGN COUNTRIES.

AUSTRIA.

Truck Generally.

Payment of Wages.—To be paid in coin except that the following payment in kind may be made in pursuance of an agreement to that effect, viz :—

Lodging.

Fuel.

Medicine and medical attendance.

Tools and materials.

Provisions or regular board (the value being reckoned at what it would cost the workman to obtain them).

The use of land may also be regarded as a part payment. There is a special prohibition against spirituous liquors being given as a payment in kind, and payment of wages in inns or public houses is prohibited.

Spending of Wages.—Agreements binding the workmen to purchase at certain shops are prohibited.

Advances Illegally Made and Goods Illegally Supplied.—Agreements contravening the forgoing regulations are null and void and such advance or supply is of no legal effect. The workman can still claim his wages, and the money value of the things which have been supplied, or the money which has been advanced goes either to the sick club fund or to the district poor fund.

Fines.

Deductions from wages in respect of 'Conventional' fines are permitted and will be regulated by an ordinance based on an understanding between workmen and employers and now awaiting sanction. Full particulars of the fines, etc., have to be entered up in a list open to inspectors and workmen. When there are Special Industrial Courts these decide disputes between employers and employed as to fines. In places where there are no Industrial Courts, the ordinary tribunals are competent.

Deductions.

Other deductions are permitted only under the same restrictions as apply to fines. A deduction without agreement may only be made in respect of the contributions due from the workmen towards insurance against illness and accidents, and is made on each pay day. In the event of an omission to make such deduction on the proper date, it can be made only during the four weeks next following.

Persons to whom the Law Applies.

Industrial workmen (including those employed in mines, canal construction, and river-works), home workers, and trade employees.

BELGIUM.

Truck Generally.

Payment of Wages.—To be made in coin or other legal tender. All payments made otherwise are null and void, except that the following may be taken into account :—

The lodging of the worker.

The use of land.

The supply and repair of tools and implements at net cost (prix de revient).

The use of materials, etc., according to custom or agreement, at net cost prices.

The use of uniforms or special costumes which the worker is compelled to wear—at net cost.

And the following may be authorised to be taken into account by the "deputation permanent" (who, when granting or revoking authority, must hear the local "Council of Industry and Labour" or section thereof, if there is one).

The supply of commodities (denrées), clothes, and fuel, at net cost prices.

There is an appeal to the king against revocation.

Payment may not be made at or near public houses, shops, etc.

Where wages are less than 5 francs a day they must be paid at least twice a month, at intervals of not longer than sixteen days, and pieceworkers, etc., are to be paid, wholly or partly, at least once a month, and partial payments are to be accompanied by an account of work done and money paid.

Manner of Spending Wages.—Apart from the last three items in the first paragraph above, employers may not impose or require by contract a particular method of spending wages, but freely concluded contracts (baux) may provide as to the first two items in that paragraph.

Goods Illegally Supplied.—Cannot be the subject of an action by the employer against the workman.

Fines.

Deductions from wages in respect of fines are prohibited except as regards those imposed for breaches of discipline and contained in regulations duly exhibited in the establishment.

Deductions.

Other deductions are prohibited except for:—

Bad work, waste, or damage to material or products.

Sick or provident funds.

Advances in money up to one-fifth of wages (the price of building land sold by the employer to the workman being reckoned as an advance).

Amounts due for things supplied as set out aforesaid under the heading "Payment of Wages."

Persons to whom the Law Applies.

Workmen, except:—

(1) Agricultural workmen.

(2) Domestics.

(3) Generally; workmen "living in."

Penalties.

The employer, 50 to 2,000 francs; others directing labour 50 to 2,000 francs unless acting under express instructions and without a personal interest, in which case it is 26 to 100 francs, which will be enforced against the employer.

Time limit 6 months.

FRANCE.

No direct legislation.

The general law of debt restricts the amount that may be seized from workmen's wages to one-tenth, and the amount that may be ceded to another tenth; in the absence of any law forbidding sales by a master to his men, this general law operates to limit the extent to which he can obtain satisfaction for goods that he may supply.

The same law prevents the employer making an adjustment to his own advantage between sums due from him as wages, and sums due from the workmen for supplies received, except in respect of:—

(1) Tools or instruments necessary to the work.

(2) Materials, etc., of which the workman has the charge and use.

(3) Sums advanced for the same objects.

If the employer makes an advance in money for any other purpose than that specified at (3) above, he can only recoup himself by successive deductions of not more than a tenth of the wage due. This tenth is not to be confused with the tenths already referred to.

A further law has been several times proposed, and, after many vicissitudes, seems likely to pass. It will probably provide somewhat as follows:—

(a) Wages to be paid in money (coin or notes) at least twice a month, and at not more than sixteen days' interval; payment to be on a working day, and not to be made at a public house, bar, shop, or store (except in the case of workers employed at such places).

(b) Piece-work to be subject to agreement and paid for at intervals of less than sixteen days.

(c) Fines to be limited to one-fourth of the daily wage, and the fines themselves to be allocated to the benefit of the employed.

The absence of detailed statutory requirements as to Truck, may perhaps be partly accounted for by the existence of industrial tribunals (see page), having power to settle disputes between employer and employed.

GERMANY.

The laws of the Empire are contained in "7 Reichs-gewerbe-ordnung," and are as follows:—

Truck Generally.

Payment of wages.—To be made in cash.

Supply of goods on credit.—The employer is forbidden so to supply goods. If he does, he cannot sue for them, nor make deductions, nor demand the return of the goods, which, with any payments that may have been made, are forfeited to the workmen's relief funds.

Cash sales.—No restriction, except that a workman cannot be bound by a contract to purchase from the employer, etc., and that any sales effected must not be such as to circumvent the other provisions of the truck law.

Payment in kind.—Can only be effected by previous agreement or by the workman's consent given at the time of payment; it is further limited to the supply of:—

Regular meals (at average cost price).

Food and drink (at cost price, i.e., actual cost, plus carriage, but excluding interest and such general expenses as those of warehousing and insurance.

House and land (at ordinary local rates).

Medicine and medical attendance (at average cost, including interest and general expenses).

Tools and materials: Deductions specially limited in the case of time-workers to the average cost price, including interest and general expenses: in the case of pieceworkers there is a different limitation, the price permitted to be deducted (in cases where specially agreed) being the usual local price. One object of this is to prevent the worker trading in the goods supplied to him.

The payment may be either agreed upon beforehand, or a deduction may be made at the time of payment, the workman's consent being required in the latter case unless the goods have already been supplied.

Payment by orders or stamps on shop of employer, etc.—Forbidden.

Proceedings must be taken within five years.

Penalty.—Fine up to 2,000 marks or imprisonment up to six months.

Illegal payments are of no account, and if they have been made the workman can demand ready money payment without deduction for what has been supplied.

*Payment in public houses or shops.—Forbidden except with administrative permission, usually given only for small and temporary undertakings. Penalty up to 50 marks or one month.

Fines and Deductions.

Generally there is freedom of contract subject to the restrictions of the general laws of the Empire, except so far as such freedom might infringe the special truck law set out above, and except that a contract binding the workmen beforehand to any deduction not intended to be applied to the improvement of their own position or that of their families, would be illegal.

Subject to these limitations, the following are in pursuance of the general law permitted.

Fines.—For certain breaches of contract (but see below).

Deductions.—For securities: for investment on behalf of the workmen (especially the young): for the support of crêches and educational institutions; for relief funds, savings banks, etc.

The general law is, however, limited by certain special provisions:—

Fines for illegal dissolution of contract: deductions for damage.—Fines and deductions are limited in the case of managers, foremen, engineers and others in superior positions (e.g., subordinates specially technically educated) to a day's pay on which the breach occurs and a day's pay for each day thereafter up to one week. Workers in factories where at least twenty are employed are liable to a deduction up to the average week's wage. In all other cases the deduction must not exceed in one payment more than one-fourth of the wages due, nor in all one week's wage. The application of these moneys must be provided for in the Arbeits-ordnung (see below).

* Prussia has a further special provision on this point.

Fines for assaults on fellow workmen.—May equal the average daily earnings.

Fines for grave offences against good morals, against rules for the maintenance of order or the safe working of machinery.—May equal the average daily earnings.

Fines other than the above.—May not exceed half the average daily earnings.

Fines : General provisions.—Full particulars must appear in the Arbeits-ordnung.

This is a code of regulations made for every factory, etc., after opportunity for comment by the workmen or their agents, and submitted to an administrative authority before being posted in the factory. This code must prescribe the manner of payment and set out the particular purposes to which penalties will be applied—subject always to the general principle that all the penalties are to be devoted to the benefit of the workmen. Failure to issue such a code renders the employer liable to a fine up to 300 marks or imprisonment up to six weeks ; failure to post it renders him liable to a fine up to 30 marks or imprisonment up to eight days.

The fines authorised by the code must be inflicted without delay and with the full knowledge of the workmen. Particulars must be booked for production to a Government official when required (penalty up to 20 marks or imprisonment up to 3 days), and no illegal punishment may be inflicted (penalty up to 150 marks or imprisonment up to four weeks).

Deductions for damaged work or injury to property of employer.—The workman's misconduct may render him liable to a fine under the Arbeits-ordnung, but there are no special provisions as to deductions, and, under the general law, the workman would only be liable to compensate the employer in certain cases, e.g., of malicious intent or culpable negligence. The employer's right to claim such compensation still exists even though the workman has been fined in respect of the same matter.

Deductions for relief, benefit and accident funds.—These are permitted only in pursuance of a previous agreement. In view of the elaborate provision made by the laws of the Empire for insurance against sickness, accident and old age this branch of the subject is not of much importance in Germany.

PERSONS TO WHOM THE LAWS APPLY.

The laws apply to all workmen, including journeymen, labourers, apprentices, inspectors, foremen, mechanics and factory hands. Home workers, if they work for a particular trader, are included, even when they provide their own materials.

OCCUPATIONS TO WHICH THE LAWS DO NOT APPLY.

Practically all industrial undertakings are included except :—

Agriculture, i.e., farming, cattle rearing, market gardening, forestry and vine growing, and any occupations (e.g., flax-scutching) carried on incidentally thereto, no matter on what scale they are conducted. (This provision leads to many anomalies.)

Fisheries (regulated by the laws of the various States).

Railways (excluded, except so far as concerns the work of constructing railways).

Merchant shipping—excluded (the exclusion, however, not extending to the crews of boats on inland waterways or of rafts). Special provision is made in the shipping laws. Wages are to be paid in cash, except that food and some other necessaries may be supplied. Fines are prohibited, but desertion renders liable to forfeiture of all wages due, which would be devoted to compensating the employer, any surplus going to the relief funds.

Trading houses.—That is to say, commercial clerks and apprentices employed in the mercantile trade are excluded.

Mines.—The provisions under the heading "Truck generally" are specially applied, but the Imperial provisions as to fines, etc., as a rule have no application, the matter being left to the various States.*

* Prussia has a law requiring regulations as to the supply and cost of working materials and tools to be included in the Arbeits-ordnung.

HOLLAND.

No special law as to Truck.

The law as to insurance against accidents prohibits the deduction from wages of the expense cast upon the employer by the said law. A Bill amended so as to contain the following provisions has been adopted by the Second Chamber of the States General and is under the consideration of the First Chamber. There is considerable opposition, and the Bill must be accepted or rejected in its entirety.

Summary of Proposed Law.

TRUCK GENERALLY.

Payment of Wages.—To be made in money (coin, or, in some places, if the workman agrees, notes) no payment in kind being permitted to be made to workers who do not 'live in,' except for :—

- Food, light and fuel for consumption at the place of supply.
- Working clothes.
- Materials, tools and implements for work, and the repairs thereof.
- So much of the produce, raw material or bye-products (other than spirituous liquors) as may be among the first necessaries of life for the workman and his family.
- House, land and stabling.
- Definite businesses or services to be done by or on behalf of the employer for the benefit of the workman.
- Instruction given.

Contracts Providing for the carrying over, or retention in the employer's hands, of a portion of the wage due.—These are illegal except when contained in a written agreement or in regulations made for the purpose of providing for the forfeitures dealt with in the next paragraph.

Forfeiture for Irregular Termination of Employment.—The master or man terminating the employment without notice, in cases where notice is necessary, has to pay an indemnity or forfeiture. The amount of this is :—

- In the case of contracts for indefinite periods, the amount the worker would earn in the usual notice period.
- In the case of contracts for definite periods, the amount the worker would have earned before their expiration.

Contracts (to benefit the worker) for a lower indemnity are void ; the indemnity may be larger but the arbitrator could then, if he thought fit, return it to the legal standard. Indemnities carry interest at 10 per cent. per annum from the date of the termination of the employment.

The remedies here provided are optional and do not exclude actions for damage where such are appropriate.

As to the detention of moneys to build up the amount of the indemnity—the amounts are to be deposited in the Post Office Savings Bank in the name of the workman, within three days after pay day, not more than 10 per cent. of the wages due being so dealt with. The maximum limit of the total is the same as the amount of the possible forfeiture (see above), but in the case of workers earning 4 guilders a day or less there is also a limitation to twelve days' wages. Immediately an engagement terminates in a regular manner, the workman or his representative may dispose of the deposits and interest. Further details are to be provided for by administration order.

Illegal Payments, etc.—To be void and the worker to be able (within six months) to sue, but the Judge to be able to limit the amount at most to that which represents the workman's loss arising out of the illegal payment.

Manner of Spending Wages.—Contracts prescribing the manner in which, or the place at, or person with whom wages are to be spent, to be void. ('Deductions' for savings and for benefit funds are made exceptions to this rule, but as to these, see below.) The workman can sue for and recover what has been deducted from his wages in this manner or what he has paid. The judge has a discretion similar to that referred to in the preceding paragraph.

Collation of Debts against Claims for Wages.—Except at the termination of the engagement this is limited to:—

(1) Damages due from workman to employer.

(2)* Fines imposed pursuant to the law (as set out under "Fines") and then only where a written proof has been given to the workman stating the amount of each fine, the time when and the reason for which it has been imposed, and a statement of the regulation or provision in a contract which has been infringed.

(3)* Contributions to funds or deposits in a Post Office Savings Bank or Saving Fund.

(4) Rent; or hire of tools and instruments.

(5)* Purchase money of ordinary daily household necessaries (excluding spirits) and of raw or bye-materials used in the work, provided that a written note of the cause and amount of the debt be given and that the price be not more than the cost, or more than the workman could buy for elsewhere.

(6) Advances in money properly proved by written declaration.

(7) Anything paid in excess of wages due.

(8) Costs of sick nursing and medical treatment.

There is no contracting out of this.

Fines.

Not to be imposed except in pursuance of a written contract and then only for breach of regulations (which must be pointed out, and which must mention the fine.)

The Fine not to go directly or indirectly to the benefit of the employer or other person inflicting it and its destination to be stated in the Regulations or Contract.†

Fines to be of fixed amount and expressed in terms of the currency in which wages are paid.†

No single fine, and no week's accumulation of fines, to exceed one day's pay.†

An employer cannot both fine and sue for damage in respect of one and the same fact.

Deductions for Idleness, Time Lost, Etc.

No wages to be due for the time during which the workman has not performed the stipulated work, unless (1) he has been performing an unpaid obligation laid upon him by authority (e.g. voting), or has been prevented by specially exceptional circumstances beyond his own control (e.g., certain funerals and confinements), or (2) he has been prevented, and this for a short time only, by illness or accident not caused by his own wilfulness or immorality or by a physical defect which he has wilfully misrepresented to the employer at the time of entering into the contract. If such short absences be the subject of compensation or allowance out of insurance, etc., contracted for or legally prescribed, then the wage to be paid may be correspondingly reduced. Pieceworkers are to have mean wages, less any expenses they may have saved by their absence. These provisions may not be deviated from save in pursuance of contract in writing, or of regulations.

Deductions for Benefit Friendly and Similar Funds.

To be permitted if the funds accord with the general regulations on such subjects.

Deductions for Investment on Behalf of Working Minors.

To be permitted under conditions.

Persons to Whom the Law Applies.

The provisions as to fines and deductions do not apply to Merchant Shipping nor (unless applied by law, ordinance, or declaration, by or in the name of the parties) to servants of the State, the Province, the Commune, the Dike and Polder Services, or any other public corporate body.

Persons "Living in."

Housing, board, and other necessaries, if given in place of wages, to be in accordance with local usages, if these agree with health and morality: nursing and medical treatment (in so far as not otherwise provided) to be supplied, up to six weeks, if the engagement lasts so long. The cost may be recovered from the person employed, but in the case of the first four weeks, only if the illness or accident has been purposely caused, or results from immorality or from some physical defect misrepresented when the agreement was made. Contracting out of these liabilities is not permitted.

* In respect of these at each pay day the worker may not be debited to the extent of more than one-fifth of the wage then due and the actual collation of debts must not be effected in excess of two-fifths of the same amount.

† Not to apply to certain more highly paid workmen if by regulation or contract excepted, though in that case "the Juge" may fix a lower fine if he deem that imposed excessive.

ITALY.

No general law. There are, however, in force in many industrial establishments codes of special rules agreed upon by the employers and workpeople, and dealing (inter alia) with the circumstances in which the amount of the wages earned need not be paid over in full. From a detailed examination of 1631 such codes which has been carried out by the Italian Minister of Agriculture, Industry, and Commerce, it appears that in 880 cases the regulations provide for the retention, as a deposit, of part of the wages due, the retention being sometimes effected by instalments until the amount of the customary deposit is in the hands of the employer. The deposit varies in amount from three to thirty lire, or from the earnings of a week to the earnings of fifteen days. The principal object of requiring a deposit is to safeguard the employer against a sudden cessation of work by the employee, without notice, the codes providing in such a contingency for the definite retention of all or part of the deposit, by the employer. It is generally arranged that the deposit shall be returnable (sometimes with interest), if the employer leaves his work in a regular manner—as, e.g., by complying with the custom, etc., as to notice or by duly delivering up papers, books, or medals, etc., received on being taken into employment. With regard to dismissal, the provisions vary. In some cases the deposit is returnable, if the worker be dismissed through no fault of his own. In one case (apparently that of the women in the straw industry in Macerata) half the deposit is forfeitable on dismissal for "family circumstances or marriage." In another, the deposit is forfeitable on dismissal:—(a) Owing to three days' absence; (b) for carrying away materials; (c) "immediate dismissal": and in at least one case the deposit is forfeitable simply "on expulsion."

In several cases it is also provided that the deposit or part of it is liable to be sequestrated in respect of damage to machinery, fittings, or goods "by the carelessness or fraud" of the workman, and, in some cases, the amount of the deduction to be made from the deposit is limited to the actual damage done. In most cases where there is any provision on this head, it is the rule that the workman, after the deduction has been made, shall submit to a retention of his wage to bring the deposit again up to its original amount.

SWEDEN.

No special law, though attempts have been made, in a general Bill as to employer and workmen (which failed to pass), to provide for payment in coin and not by money order or assignation of goods.

SWITZERLAND.

There are two main sets of provisions, one contained in a law of 1877 and one in a law of 1902. In this summary the 1877 law is dealt with first, and some notes (indicated by brackets) are added, giving the effect of various decrees and decisions explaining or amplifying the law as passed. The law of 1902 will be seen to be an extension of the law of 1877 to fresh industries, with some minor modifications, probably suggested by the experience already gained.

Law of 1877.

Payment of Wages.—Manufacturers are bound to settle accounts with their employees at least once a fortnight, in cash, in current coin, and within the factory. Special contracts or the rules of the factory may decide that the actual payments may be made once a month. The part of the wage carried to the new account is not to exceed the pay of the last week. The conditions of payment for piecework are to be settled, pending the completion of the work, by agreement between the parties.

Fines.—May not exceed a half day's wage.* The proceeds are to be employed in the interests of the workmen and particularly for benefit funds.†

[Fines are considered never to have been part of the wage and so the freedom of the employer to choose to which object, among those benefitting the workmen, he will devote them, is not restricted by the provision against deductions for special ends set out below.]

Deductions for damage to work, materials, etc.—These are not "fines"

[And therefore escape the maximum limit and the direction as to the application of proceeds. They are considered, however, to affect the amount actually due to the workman, and therefore, like fines, to be exempt from the provisions relating to deductions for special ends. See below.]

[Deductions for lateness, unreasonably leaving or stopping work, etc.—These, of course, are fines. For the reasons suggested by the previous paragraph employers have tried, but unsuccessfully, to urge that the deductions really relate to a species of damage to interests and so are not fines.]

Deductions for Special ends.—These are forbidden unless they are made in pursuance of a special contract.

[And the contract must be really "special;" the workman cannot be held to have made a special contract because he knows of and has signed the factory rules in which the employer has included a provision on this point. The deductions at which the provision is aimed are those which the employer might wish to make in respect of savings banks, relief funds, etc., etc. and not e.g., the deduction of moneys in respect of damaged goods. As to these, see above. Moreover, if the workman at the termination of his employment is his employer's debtor, in respect, for instance, of advances made by the employer, and the employer retains his last wages, it is for the judge to decide, in case of difference, if the wages can be retained, and, if so, to what amount.]

Application of the Law.—The law applies to every industrial establishment where workmen (many or few in number) are regularly occupied together on enclosed premises (un local fermé).

Making of Factory Rules.—Manufacturers are bound to establish rules for the organisation of the work, the discipline of the factory, the conditions of entry and departure and the payment of wages. These rules are subject to the approval of the Cantonal Government, which is given only after the workmen have been heard. If the rules lead to abuse, the Cantonal Government can enforce revision.

[The rules may provide for a monthly interval between payments but they cannot be held to form a special contract binding the workman to deductions for special ends.]

This applies to all the industries which produce or use explosive substances and, apart from them, the following industries, enterprises, and works :—

Building, including all labour in correlation therewith whether performed in the workshop or the yard, or on the building, or during transport.

Carriage by land and water, including the floating of timber.

All labours or services connected with or accessory or auxiliary to the working of a factory, even though not carried on within its enclosed premises.

The owners of such establishments are bound to settle with their workmen at least once a fortnight, in cash, and in current coin. By special understanding, previously arrived at, the parties may agree that payment take place once a month. The part of the salary carried forward to the new account is not to exceed six days wage. For piecework the conditions of payment may be settled beforehand at pleasure, but payment should be made at the latest on the first pay-day following the completion of the work. Where tasks take more than twelve days to execute, the workman has a right on pay-day to an account corresponding to the amount done.

Fines are not to be inflicted except under approved rules, and may in no case exceed half the daily salary of the workman fined. The proceeds of fines are to be applied to the benefit of the workmen and particularly to relief funds. Deductions for defective work or spoilt material, etc., are not considered as fines. Disputes as to the mode of payment, deductions, and the collection and allocation of fines shall be settled by the competent judge.

* An appeal in 1888 brought out the fact that a fine of fixed amount might happen, so far as concerned some of the persons affected, to be more than the half of a day's pay and therefore illegal, and it was held to be unsafe to fix any amount approaching the half-day's pay of the lowest paid person affected. It will be noticed that the limitation is more clearly expressed in the law of 1902.

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA.

There is no Federal Legislation, and the matter is left to be dealt with by the various States. Their enactments are subject, however, to the usual rule that they must be "Constitutional," and some of those relating to "truck" have been declared by the Courts to be unconstitutional and for that reason not enforceable. Thus in Pennsylvania, where wages were required to be paid in money of the United States, the Courts have decided that, so far as this law amounts to making a contract between parties against their will, it is unconstitutional. The Constitution of the United States may thus have a considerable bearing on the State laws. The following provisions are to be found in the laws of the States of New York, New Jersey, Connecticut, Delaware, Massachusetts, Ohio, Pennsylvania, Illinois and Missouri and Rhode Island, and the laws of these States may be taken as typical of the legislation on this subject throughout the union :—

Truck Generally.

Wages—Cash Payment :—

New York.—Wages to be paid in cash.

New Jersey.—Payment in goods prohibited : scrip redeemable at face value (but the law is said to be commonly evaded).

Illinois.—Miners to be paid in money (but this is held not to interfere with contracts). Scrip to be redeemable in bankable currency.

Pennsylvania.—Wages to be paid in U.S. money (but the Courts decide that this applies only to mining and manufacturing businesses and also is unconstitutional so far as it forces a contract on an unwilling person).

Wages—Interval Between Payments :—

New York, Connecticut, and Massachusetts, require weekly payments.

New Jersey, Missouri, and Pennsylvania, require fortnightly payments.

Illinois, Delaware, Ohio, and Rhode Island have no law on the subject.

WAGES—PAYMENT IN KIND:—

Ohio.—Payment in goods at unreasonable prices forbidden.

Pennsylvania.—Wages may not be stopped for goods furnished, except by legal powers (but the Courts hold that this allows the worker to direct the application of his wages to payment for goods supplied).

WAGES—PLACE OF SPENDING.—The American laws describe "stores" kept by employers as "company stores." There are some special enactments as to these:—

Connecticut.—Prices to be reasonable.

Pennsylvania.—Company stores prohibited.

Massachusetts.—Persons employed on public works not to be restricted in trade or in choice of a place for boarding.

Ohio.—Coercion of employees in trading forbidden.

Fines.

Illinois.—No law. (A report of 1886 shows that while there were few fines on men workers, women and children earning poor wages were great sufferers.)

Massachusetts.—Has a law regularising fines on weavers for work of inferior grade and restricting them to agreed fines. (The Courts hold that a posted notice, known to the weaver, that second grade work will be paid at half rates, is a sufficient agreement.)

Deductions.

Generally there is freedom of contract.

DEDUCTIONS FOR DAMAGE, ETC.:—

Ohio.—Limited to cases where there is an express contract.

DEDUCTIONS FOR SICK FUNDS, ETC.:—

Illinois.—Contracts for such deductions expressly enabled.

New Jersey.—Forced contracts illegal; others are enabled to be made.

DEDUCTIONS FOR TIME LOST:—

Massachusetts.—No such deductions to be made from the wages of women and minors when there is a stoppage of work owing to a breakdown of machinery and the workers are not allowed to leave the mill.

APPENDIX III.

INDUSTRIAL TRIBUNALS.*

FRANCE.

The "Conseils de Prudhommes" in France are tribunals of masters and men competent to consider disputes between manufacturers ("marchands-fabricants") and their subordinates, i.e., foremen, workmen (in factories or at home) and apprentices. They do not exist in every judicial "circonscription."

Constitution, Scope, and Area of Jurisdiction.

The Councils are constituted, and their scope, their area of jurisdiction and the number of their membership (which must be even—at least six, not including the President and Vice-President—) fixed, by ministerial decree at the request of the local chambers of commerce or chambers of manufacturers. The members are elected by the employers, workmen, and foremen engaged in the industries for which the council is constituted; the electoral qualifications are a minimum age of twenty-five years and five years' employment in an industry (of which three must have been spent in the "circonscription" of the Council). The members elected choose in their turn a President and Vice-President, who hold office for a year and can be re-elected. The members are magistrates and under the surveillance of the Minister of Justice, are paid by the municipality, and are in principle irremovable except for grave dereliction of duty.

Powers.

The Councils are intended to control and settle accounts between manufacturers and "chefs d'atelier," inspect and visit workshops, and report contraventions of the laws and regulations. They can decide, for instance, in cases of dismissal alleged to be unjustifiable, the infliction of fines, the price of piecework, and the settling of compensation for damage to material. They have power throughout their district and can, if requested by the parties, decide also on disputes arising beyond it. In matters affecting amounts up to £12 their decision, when there is agreement, or when the decision is arrived at by an absolute majority of the members present, is final. In case of disagreement, i.e., when the tribunal is equally divided, a Judge of the Peace is called in to decide. In cases affecting more than £12 there is an appeal to the Civil Tribunals, or, if the judgment has gone by default, "opposition" may be entered. Apart from the powers already mentioned, the Councils can (but rarely do) exercise a certain restricted jurisdiction as magistrates, dealing with the discipline of workshops and factories. These powers are disciplinary rather than repressive, are subject to appeal and are merely in addition to, and not in substitution for, the proceedings of the ordinary courts.

Procedure.

The Councils work in two ways, first by a "Bureau of Conciliation" of two members (one an employer and one a workman, each presiding in turn), and then, if the attempt at conciliation fails, by a "Bureau of Judgment" of at least four members (an equal number of whom must be employers and an equal number workmen), who hear witnesses on oath and give judgment publicly according to the decision of an absolute majority of those present. The Bureau of Conciliation cites the defendant to appear by a simple letter. If he does not come, he is cited again by a "Huissier." If he still refuses, the case is referred on to the Bureau of Judgment. Contempt of the Bureau of Conciliation is punishable by a fine of not more than 10 fr. or imprisonment for not more than three days.

General Remarks.

The working of the Councils has, on the whole, given general satisfaction to both sides; and it is probable that the system will in the near future be extended, notably to comprise clerks and employés other than workmen strictly so-called.

GERMANY.

The attempt to remove to special courts the business of deciding in cases of dispute between masters and men dates from 1845; much has been done, but the whole field has not yet been covered.

The existing law, that of September 29th, 1901, provides briefly as follows:—

Institution of Courts.

Trade courts, competent to deal with disputes between masters and workmen,† or between two workmen of the same master, may be set up by a commune or union of communes, and may act for a single commune, for several, or for a union of several. As a fact, the existing courts, as a rule, act for single communes. If a commune has more than 20,000 inhabitants a trade court must be set up, and, if the commune will not act, the competent Minister of the Federal State concerned must order the institution of the court on his own authority. Even where institution is not obligatory, the Minister may set up a court if employers or workmen demand one and the commune or union of communes concerned will not accede. The commune instituting a court makes the necessary General Regulations as to the election of assessors and as to procedure, and can, if it wishes, restrict the jurisdiction to certain trades, certain factories, or certain districts.

Expenses.

Expenses are provided for partly by fees, and for the rest, by the authority instituting the court.

* This summary has been prepared from Reports obtained through the Foreign Office in January, 1907.

† i.e., journeymen, labourers, factory workers, apprentices (including outworkers and homeworkers) workers in mines, salt works, ore-dressing works, quarries or coal mines, whether these trades are carried on above ground or underground: or, speaking generally, all those workers who come within the truck law. Foremen, superintendents and persons doing superior technical work, whose annual remuneration does not exceed 2,000 marks are also within the scope of the law.

Powers of the Court.

The powers of the court are:—

(1) To decide on disputes:—

(a) As to the delivery or contents of workbooks, testimonials, wages books, work tickets or papers, wages payment books.

(d) Return to the worker of his testimonial books, identity papers, documents, tools, clothing, securities, etc.

(e) Claims for damages* and infliction of penalties (whether for illegal or incorrect entries in the papers mentioned under (a) above, and in sick-fund books or superannuation insurance receipt cards—or for the matters set out under (a), (b), (c), and (d)).

(f) Calculation of, and making of deductions for, the contributions of the workmen to sick funds, and entrance money.

(g) Allocation of remuneration among workmen for work done collectively.

(2) To act as a Board of Arbitration and Conciliation dealing with the conditions of the continuance of or return to work, especially in the case of strikes or lock-outs.

(3) To file motions with various authorities, extending even to the Federal and Imperial Legislatures.

The court is also under an obligation to supply the State or Local authority with an expert opinion on trade matters.

The jurisdiction of the trade court excludes that of the ordinary tribunals, even though both parties might prefer recourse to the latter, and there are special provisions for rendering any evasion of this principle as difficult as possible. Further, contracting-out is guarded against. Thus an arbitration contract can only provide for exemption from the arbitration jurisdiction of the trade court if it contains express provision for special arbitration by an equal number of employers and workmen, presided over by a person neither the employer of the workman concerned nor an employee of the master concerned.

The court can decide cases if:—

(a) The liability arises;
or (b) The factory is situate; } in its district.†
or (c) Both parties dwell

Composition.

The composition of the court is as follows:—

(a) A Number of Elected Assessors.—These must be persons over thirty years of age who are competent to act as jurors (that is to say, they must not have forfeited, by previous punishment or by proceedings against them for crime or misdemeanour, the right to fill public appointments; and they must be persons not limited by the decree of a court in the control of their property). During the year preceding election they must not have been in receipt of parish relief for themselves or their families.

Half the assessors are employers and half workmen, employed or working in the district for at least two years, and elected by their fellows by direct and secret ballot. Only persons affected by the trade court and competent to act as jurors (see above) can vote; they must be twenty-five years of age and employed or resident in the district. Further details may be provided for by the statutes of the commune.

(b) A President and his Representative (or, in a union of chambers, the several presidents and vice-presidents).—These must possess the qualifications set out for assessors above, and, unless they have already been recognised in some communal or governmental capacity, their election requires confirmation by the higher administrative authorities. They must, moreover, be neither employers nor workmen, but chosen from some disinterested profession.

These are the only personal qualifications specified; thus there is no requirement of judicial competency. The communal statutes may, however, provide for this, and, as a matter of fact, most of the persons acting in these capacities are qualified to act as judges.

The ordinary quorum is three with the president. The communal statutes may require more, but in all cases the numbers of workmen and employers must be equal.

Procedure.

The procedure is cheap and simple, and facilitates amicable settlements. Such a settlement is to be proposed at the opening of each sitting, again whenever opportunity offers, and again in any case at the conclusion of the sitting. The complaint is either produced in writing or taken as a protocol by the court clerk. The court effects all services and summonses; and the case may be settled before the president without assessors, by compromise, default,† admission of claim, or withdrawal of suit. Failing either of these alternatives, the president fixes a hearing before himself and assessors, and arranges for evidence. Thereafter he sees that facts are clearly stated and proper evidence produced, and that the parties make all such applications as are necessary to serve their cause.

* Thus claims under contract (special or contained in the code of regulations) for fines, deductions, or compensation in respect of damage to work would come before the trade court. Claims for wanton damage, not arising out of the performance of a task, would go to the ordinary courts, as would also claims for penalties because of the acceptance of a situation in the same district or because of an ex-workmen setting up on his own account.

† Protests, if any, must be lodged within three days.

Parties may not be represented before the court by professional lawyers, etc., but one person may appear for another, and, in exceptional cases where such representation seems justified, the loser may be ordered to pay all or part of the attendant costs.

Decisions are enforced like those of the "Amtsgericht" (ordinary courts).

Appeals.

Appeals against judgments in cases involving more than 100 marks, and complaints of certain orders, may be made to the landgericht (a subordinate district court), and its decision is final.

Costs and Expenses.

The costs of the court are in proportion to the amount involved, e.g., three marks in a dispute involving one hundred marks, and can be reduced one-half in case of judgment by default, admission of claim, or withdrawal of suit. No costs at all are charged when there is a compromise. The communal statute can effect further reductions under some heads.

The court expenses are limited to out-of-pocket expenses actually incurred.

Special Courts for Certain Trades.

With regard to mines, salt-works, and ore dressing works the central administrative authorities can institute special courts which oust the jurisdiction of the ordinary trade court. Prussia, for instance, has five mining courts. These courts, however, are modelled largely on the trade court pattern.

Clerks and apprentices in mercantile businesses are subject to special mercantile courts, resembling the trade courts, but instituted as the result of a separate law.

LIMITATIONS ON THE SCOPE OF JURISDICTION.

The jurisdiction of the trade courts is subject to the following limitations and exceptions:—

Military and Naval Works.—The trade courts have no jurisdiction.

Works of State and City Authorities.—The trade courts have jurisdiction only in so far as a "trade" is carried on.

Works belonging to Members of Guilds *—

The trade courts have no jurisdiction over disputes with apprentices. These can be dealt with by the guilds, and there is no provision for arbitration or for representation of workmen.

As regards disputes with journeymen and labourers, the jurisdiction of the trade court may be excluded by the institution of a Guild Arbitration Court, half employers and half workmen, with a president chosen by the Government. There is an appeal to the ordinary courts (i.e., not the trade courts) but recourse cannot be had to these in the first instance.

General Results.

The system seems on the whole to give satisfaction. Between 40 per cent. and 50 per cent. of the cases are settled by compromise, 20 per cent. to 25 per cent. by withdrawal of claim, and only about 10 per cent. by trial. Thus in Berlin, in a recent year, only one-third of the cases proceeded so far as to reach a sitting of the whole court, consisting of president and assessors. The defects recognised are:—

(c) The general restriction of the trade court provisions to what may be called the "aristocracy of labour."

A suggestion frequently made is that the aim should be to have general labour courts replacing all special tribunals and competent to decide all disputes arising from contracts to work.

[June 9th, 1893. Q.B.D.]

(From the shorthand notes of Messrs. Cherer, Bennett and Davis, 8, New Court, Carey Street, London, W.C.)

Gibbons. My Lords, I appear in this case, with my learned friend Mr. Poland, for the appellant. It is an appeal by way of special case from the Justices of Worcestershire. They state in the case that at a Petty Session held on April 25th, 1893, an information was preferred by the appellant, Thomas Long, the Superintendent of Police, against John Henry Crane, who is the respondent, and the information charged: "That the respondent, on April 10th, 1893, at the parish of Astley, in the County aforesaid, being the employer of an artificer in a trade to which the Truck Acts, 1831 and 1887, respectively, applied, to wit, the trade of a servant in husbandry, did unlawfully make a payment to one Samuel Walters otherwise than in coin, to wit, by the delivery to the said Samuel Walters of a quantity of cider." I do not think I need go further into the case at present. If I may state the first point which your Lordships' opinion is asked upon, it is whether a Police Officer can prosecute for offences under the Truck Acts of 1831 and 1887. The 1 & 2 Will. IV., c. 37 (the Truck Act), enacts by the third section that all wages must be paid to the workmen in coin.

Wright, J. You had better read the case.

Gibbons. If your Lordship pleases. I did not know whether you would decide this point first. "At the hearing of the said information the following facts were proved in evidence before us and admitted on behalf of the respondent. The respondent was on the date of the said alleged offence named in the said information the employer of one Samuel Walters, a servant in husbandry, who was first engaged to work for the respondent about three years ago by the respondent's bailiff, William Mills, at wages of 14s. a week, with the use of a cottage and garden rent free, and at the time of such engagement no mention was made that the respondent should supply by way of payment or otherwise to the said Samuel Walters any drink. On April 7th, 1893, the said Samuel Walters signed an agreement (which was produced and shown to us at the hearing and marked 'A'), of which agreement the following is a copy: 'April 7th, 1893. Samuel Walters agrees to work for John H. Crane at the rate of 14s. a week and use of cottage and garden. Notice to be given on either side fourteen days verbally or otherwise to determine the engagement,' and he signs that 'Samuel Walters, 7/4/93,' upon a 6d. stamp. The rate of wages paid by the respondent to the said Samuel Walters under the terms of his hiring were equal to the standard of wages paid to servants in husbandry in the district. The said William Mills, in accordance with the express instructions received from the respondent, did, on the said April 10th, 1893, deliver to the said Samuel Walters a quantity of cider of about three or four pints' measure, which (as he, the said William Mills, swore) was a gift in accordance with the practice previously adopted and authorised by the said respondent at irregular times, but generally in hot weather, and not in part payment of wages or remuneration to the said Samuel Walters. The respondent at the hearing took the following objections——"

Lawrence, J. Really the first point is whether this was an infringement of the Truck Act.

Gibbons. That is one of the points.

Lawrence, J. If you have chosen to put in two or three more conundrums, as they have been called, why are we to spend the rest of the day in determining whether a constable could prosecute for offences under the Truck Act if no offence has been committed?

Wright, J. The Justices say there is no offence.

Lawrence, J. If giving your gardener a pint of beer on a hot day or a glass of whiskey and water on a cold night is an offence, the Truck Act every day must be broken. The whole question is whether it was paid as wages, is it not ?

Gibbons. The interpretation clause of " wages " is rather large.

Wright, J. The Justices have found it was not a payment for anything, neither in the form of wages nor for anything else. They have found it was a free gift. You cannot possibly contend that is within the Truck Act.

Gibbons. I do not think I can argue against your Lordships' view. I want to put this section before your Lordships. I think I am precluded by the Justices' finding, unless there is something incorrect in the way the contract is set out.

Lawrence, J. The contract is set out, and it is found this is done at irregular times, generally in hot weather. I suppose when men do a little more work, such as in hay time.

Wright, J. The recent Act contains an express power to give a servant in husbandry cider if it is given in addition to his wages.

Gibbons. Not cider, nothing intoxicating. This was an intoxicating drink.

Lawrence, J. I suppose cider is an intoxicating drink if you take enough of it.

Gibbons. We have a transcript of what took place before the Magistrates, and that was admitted by the respondent. The Act says : " Within the meaning and for the purposes of this Act any money or other things had or contracted to be paid, delivered, or given as a recompense, reward, or remuneration for any labour done or to be done, whether within a certain time or to a certain amount, or for a time or an amount uncertain, shall be deemed and taken to be the ' wages ' of such labour." If your Lordships cannot bring the case within those words, I do not think I ought to occupy your Lordships' time any further.

Wright, J. You are quite right. The case could not be argued.

Littleton. The appeal will be dismissed with costs ?

Lawrence, J. Yes.

SQUIRE v. SWEENEY.

[Irish Weekly Law Reports, January 30th, 1900.]

Magistrates' case stated—Factory Acts—Truck Acts—Inspection—Enquiry—Place for giving out work—Obstructing Inspector.

The Act 41 Vict. c. 16, Sec. 68 (4), does not confine the place at which inquiries and examinations under it are made to the place where work is given out to outworkers, or to the factory or workshop itself.

This was a case stated by the Justices of Donegal, sitting at Dungloe Petty Sessions. The case set out that the summons was taken out by Rose Squire, an Inspector of Factories, against John Sweeney, junior, for : " That he, being an employer within the meaning of the Truck Acts, 1881, 1887, 1896, did unlawfully obstruct an inspector, to wit, the complainant, in the execution of her duty." At the hearing of the complaint it was proved that the complainant was an Inspector of Factories and Workshops, and that the defendant was a partner in the firm of John Sweeney and Son, hosiery contractors, grocers, drapers, and hotel keepers of licensed premises. The complainant proved that she and Miss Deane, another inspector, were in Dungloe by instruction of the Home Office to execute the Truck Acts, and that on November 14th, 1899, they, with Constable B. McCaughey, R.I.C., entered the premises of the defendant, in the back part of which hosiery work was given out, and which was not connected with the drapery shop, but which was entered by a separate door from the back yard, and that they approached the premises to make inquiries in pursuance to the powers given them by the Truck Act (1887), Sec. 13 (2) ; Truck Act (1896), Sec. 10 ; Factory and Workshop Act (1878), Sec. 68, in order to obtain information required by them for the purposes of the Act. It was proved that the complainant had power to enter the premises and require production of the list of outworkers under the Factory and Workshop Act (1891), Sec. 27, and Factory and Workshop Act (1895), Sec. 42 (2), and that in consequence of the conduct of the defendant no inquiries were made, and that there was no opportunity of disclosing the object of the visit, and that the name of the occupier of the buildings appeared both as " John Sweeney " and " John Sweeney and Son." These premises included a drapery shop, a grocery shop, a hosiery giving-out department, and a business office which formed part of the drapery shop. The entire premises formed one block of buildings. The defendant was standing at the door of the drapery shop when the complainant approached. She went to him and asked if she could have speech with him ; the defendant turned and led the way into his private office, and when they got there she asked if she were addressing Mr. John Sweeney. He made no reply, but ordered her in a violent manner to leave, and turned her towards the door. She had no opportunity to produce her warrant of authority, and she was not asked for it. When the complainant, Miss Deane, and Constable McCaughey were on the street, the defendant again molested and abused them. The defendant contended that the drapery shop was not a factory, and he proved that no hosiery work was given out there, and that the hosiery giving-out department was disconnected with the shop, and that the lad employed there had nothing to do with the hosiery giving-out department, and that there was a man in charge of that. The justices on this evidence dismissed the complaint on its merits, and on the application of the complainant stated the present case.

Palles, C.B., said that in the view the Court took of the matter it would not be necessary for him to review the facts of the case, or to go through the various Acts and sections cited. The judgment of the Justices was based on two points, and on one of these they were wrong. They had been of opinion that on the construction of Sec. 68, Sub-sec. 4, of 41 Vict. c. 16,* the only place in which an inspector could make the inquiries, or the examination mentioned in the section, was in the place where the work was actually given out. In his opinion there was nothing in the section which could restrict its operation in this way. The determination of the magistrates was based on an erroneous view of a matter which was material to the decision of the case, and the Court would, therefore, send the case back to the Justices to proceed therein according to law. It would be sent back, not for a conviction, but for the re-hearing, and the re-determination of the case by the Justices. They would add to the order an expression of the opinion of the Court that Sub-sec. (4) of Sec. 68 of the 41 Vict. c. 16, did not confine or restrict the place where the inquiries or examination mentioned in it could be made to that place where the work was actually given out. The Justices would then decide the case having regard to this opinion of the Court. Under all the circumstances of the case, he was of opinion that it was not one in which he should make any order as to costs.

SQUIRE v. SWEENEY.

Truck Act, 1831, Sec. 3—Paying a worker otherwise than in current coin of the realm.

Magistrates' case, dated April 30th, 1900, stated by certain of the Justices of the County of Donegal, from the Petty Sessions holden in and for the Petty Sessions District of Dungloe, in said county, on or about March 6th, 1900, setting forth the facts and grounds of their determination dismissing, on the merits, the complaint that defendant, being an employer within the meaning of the Truck Acts, did pay Mrs. Mary McGeehan, an artificer within the meaning of the said Acts, otherwise than in current coin of the realm.

† Palles, C.B. In this case we are of opinion that the reasons that have been given by the majority of the Magistrates for their decision are not correct in point of law; but if, upon the case as sent up to us, there is no evidence sufficient to sustain a conviction, then their determination is right although their reasons be wrong; and the only question we have to decide under the Act of Parliament is whether their determination is right or wrong.

Now, the only question we propose to determine is whether there is any evidence that Mary McGeehan was an artificer within the meaning of the Act of 1831. Artificers who were not within the Act of 1831 were brought into that Act by the subsequent Act of 1887. The class so brought in were "workmen" within the tenth section of the Employers and Workmen's Act of 1875; but it has been held in many cases in England, including several in the Court of Appeal, that the words in that section "engaged in manual labour" governed the word "artificers" in the second section of the Act of 1875; and these Courts have also held that this "manual labour" is something different from "manual work," and is something that, in the opinion of Lord Esher, "tries the muscles and the sinews"; and we have been obliged to hold that a hairdresser was not employed in "manual labour" within the Act of 1875.

Well, the manual occupation that is involved in knitting does not, in my opinion, require that amount of physical energy to bring it within the words "manual labour" as these words have been construed where they occur in Sec. 10 of the Act of 1875; and, therefore, Mary McGeehan cannot be an artificer within the meaning of the tenth section of the Act of 1875, and therefore was not brought into the Act of 1831 by the operation of the Act of 1887.

Now that brings us to the question: Is there any evidence that she was an artificer within the meaning of the Act of 1831 irrespective of the extension effected by the Act of 1887?

By the contract as disclosed upon the evidence, she was not bound to perform the work of knitting personally or any part of it. Her contract, so far as disclosed by the evidence, would have been performed had she had the work done either in whole or in part by others or wholly by herself.

In the result, therefore, the case is exactly within the decision of the Exchequer Chamber on Ingram v. Barnes (1) and Sleeman v. Barrett (2). I shall not say a single word in reference to these decisions by way of criticism or otherwise. They bind us, and because of them we are coerced to say that there is no evidence to sustain the conviction.

For this reason the dismissal must be affirmed with the costs of this case. The order will be so moulded as to exclude any possibility of the costs of the motion in which we were recently engaged being included as part of the costs.

Andrews and Johnson, JJ., concurred.

BUXTON LIME FIRMS COMPANY, LIMITED v. HOWE.

Employer and Workman—Jurisdiction of Justices—Absence of Workman without Leave—Employers and Workmen Act, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 90), Sec. 4; Truck Act, 1896 (59 & 60 Vict., c. 44), Sec. 1.

The jurisdiction of a court of summary jurisdiction under the Employers and Workmen Act, 1875, to hear and determine a dispute under that Act between an employer and a workman is not ousted by reason of the agreement of service being one to which the provisions of Sec. 1 of the Truck Act, 1896, apply.

Case stated by justices for the County of Derby, from which the following facts appeared.

A complaint had been preferred under the Employers and Workmen Act, 1875, by the appellants against the respondent, the particulars of claim annexed to and served with the summons being as follows: "The plaintiffs claim 5s. as a fine or penalty or alternatively by way of damages for that the defendant being a workman under a contract of service with the plaintiffs wrongfully absented himself from work on September 15th and 16th, 1899, being 2s. 6d. for each of such days." The following facts were proved or admitted at the hearing.

On January 2nd, 1899, the respondent entered into the service of the appellants and was employed under an agreement signed by him. By the agreement the respondent agreed to serve the appellants in getting and breaking limestone for twelve months, the respondent being "subject to a fine, or penalty, or drawback of 2s. 6d. for each and every working day on which he shall be absent without leave, except in case of sickness." The appellants agreed to pay wages at a specified rate, and the agreement further provided that, "in the event of the breach of any of the conditions of this agreement on the part of the workman, then, and in every such case, it shall be lawful for the company to dismiss the workman without any notice or without being liable to make any payment by way of damages or otherwise for dismissal without notice, but all wages earned shall be paid up to the time of such dismissal less any amount then due for fines, penalties, or drawbacks for absence as aforesaid, should the company insist thereon." A notice was posted up in the cabin in which the respondent had his meals, of which the following is a copy: "Whereas by Rule 3 of the General Rules of the Buxton Lime Firms Co., Ltd., every contract man employed by the company is bound to do a full day's work every working day except in case of illness or absence by leave. And whereas also every contract man by the terms of his signed contract note is subject to a fine or penalty or drawback of 2s. 6d. for each and every working day absent without leave except in case of sickness. And whereas the loose observance of these conditions of employment has prejudicially affected the company in the carrying out of its contracts with customers and in other ways, Notice is hereby given to every workman that the rules and conditions subject to which he is engaged will henceforth be strictly enforced, and any infringement of them will be considered a breach of contract and punishable accordingly."

On September 13th, 1899, the respondent applied for leave of absence from his work on September 14th, 15th, and 16th, and leave was granted for the 14th, but was refused for the 15th and 16th. When the respondent's application for leave of absence on the 15th and 16th was refused, he replied: "Then I shall take French leave"; and he accordingly absented himself from his employment on September 15th and 16th without the appellants' permission.

The respondent was employed to get stone to supply a stone crusher, and during his absence the crusher was at work and the stone which should have been supplied by the respondent was not crushed, with a consequent actual loss to the appellants of a larger sum than 2s. 6d. for each day he was absent.

The respondent continued in the employment of the appellants and received wages from them; but no demand was made upon him for any penalties under the agreement for so absenting himself from his employment or for damages consequent thereon until he received the particulars of claim attached to the summons.

It was admitted that other workmen were absent from the works on September 15th and 16th, and that in some cases deductions for penalties were made from their wages, and that the amount was not deducted in the respondent's case because of his contumacy when asking for leave of absence and the desire on the part of the appellants to punish him for such contumacy by bringing him before the justices.

On behalf of the respondent it was contended—(1) That the agreement brought the case within the Truck Act, 1896, and that no particulars in writing under Sec. 1, Sub-sec. 2 (b), of that Act had been given, and that such particulars were a condition precedent to the levying of a fine or penalty such as was claimed. (2) That the appellants had their remedy for the respondent's misconduct in their own hands by deducting the penalties from his wages, as provided by the agreement. (3) That the appellants' only remedy was by deducting the amount claimed from the respondent's wages after complying with the requirements of the Truck Act.

On behalf of the appellants it was contended—(1) That if the case were governed by the Truck Act the service of claim in the form of particulars attached to the summons was sufficient notice for the purpose of the Act. (2) That the case was not governed by the Truck Act. (3) That the deduction from the respondent's wages was not obligatory.

The justices were of opinion—(1) That the appellants by their agreement with the respondent had the remedy for the offence in their own hands, and that their proper course was to have deducted the penalty from the next payment of wages, as the appellants had done in similar cases. (2) That the agreement came within the Truck Act, and that the proceedings to recover a penalty under it could only be brought after a strict compliance with the provisions of that Act. (3) That Sec. 1, Sub-sec. 2 (b), of the Truck Act had not been complied with, and that the particulars of claim attached to the summons were not a compliance therewith. They accordingly dismissed the summons.

The question for the opinion of the Court was whether the justices were right in dismissing the summons on the grounds stated in the case.

Ridley, J. I think that the justices have come to a wrong decision in this case, and that the appeal should be allowed. We have to consider the state of legislative enactment on the subject. In the first place, there is the Employers and Workmen Act, 1875, which expressly gives power to a court of summary jurisdiction to determine disputes between employers and workmen; the summons in the present case was taken out under that Act. Then the Truck Act, 1896, contains provisions as to contracts between employers and workmen containing any agreement under which deductions may be made from the wages to be paid, and the Act says that such contracts are not to be valid unless certain conditions are complied with; for instance, the terms are to be contained in a notice, which is to be put up in some place accessible to the workmen; there are other conditions, which, as I understand the facts, have been substantially complied with in the present case. It is provided in Sec. 1, Sub-sec. 2, that the employer shall not make any deduction from the wages unless such deduction is made in accordance with the terms of a contract, and unless particulars thereof are put in writing and delivered to the workman. These conditions were complied with in the present case, and I think that the justices have gone wrong in this way: they supposed that because the Truck Act, 1896, contained the provisions to which I have referred, it ousted the jurisdiction conferred upon justices by the Employers and Workmen Act, 1875, in cases where the contract fell within the Truck Act, 1896. In other words, they thought that the parties must make use of the Truck Act, 1896, in all cases where the contract contained a provision authorising in certain events a deduction from the wages, and that if the employers did not comply with the requirements of Sec. 1, Sub-sec. 2, of that Act, they were left without a remedy. To justify such a construction, the words of the sub-section cannot be construed literally, and the word "receive" must have a wider interpretation than properly belongs to it. The Act was passed to prevent employers from taking matters into their own hands and making improper deductions from the wages due to the workman; but it was not intended in any way to interfere with the powers given to justices by the Employers and Workmen Act, 1875. Had that been intended by the Legislature, some provision to that effect would certainly have been found in the Truck Act, 1896. I think that the fact found by justices, that the agreement came within the Truck Act, and that the proceedings to recover a penalty under it could only be brought after a strict compliance with the provisions of that Act, was wrong. It may be that the agreement comes within the Truck Act, 1896, and I incline to think that it does, but it does not follow that proceedings for the recovery of a penalty can only be taken after compliance with the requirement of that Act; that is contrary to my view of the statute. Then the justices went on to find that Sec. 1, Sub-sec. 2 (b), of the Truck Act, 1896, had not been complied with, and that the particulars of claim attached to the summons were not a compliance therewith, and therefore the claim for the penalty could not be enforced. I think that in so holding they arrived at an erroneous conclusion; they should have said that although the agreement was within the Truck Act, 1896, the dispute had arisen under the Employers and Workmen Act, 1875, and have proceeded to adjudicate upon it; practically they have not adjudicated upon the dispute at all.

Further, it was contended that the appellants were not entitled to recover damages from the respondent because a penalty for a breach of the agreement was provided in the agreement itself. I doubt whether that is the true construction of the statute, and I think that it is not; but I do not desire to give any decision upon that point. I think that the case should be sent back to the justices to determine under the Act of 1875.

Darling, J. I am of the same opinion. I look at the case in this way. Sec. 1 of the Truck Act, 1896, provides that an employer shall not make a contract with a workman for any deduction from his wages, or for any payment by the workman by way of a fine, unless certain specified conditions are observed. Now, here the employers and workmen entered into a contract which provided for the payment of a fine or penalty or for making a deduction from the wages, and therefore that contract would be bad in law if it did not comply with the requirements of the Truck Act, 1896. The workman did something which would have entitled the employer to a fine or penalty which he could have deducted from the wages, because the contract provides for such a deduction in the event of the workman absenting himself from his work without leave. The workman absented himself without leave, and thereupon the employers, instead of making a deduction, issued a summons before justices under the Act of 1875 for the recovery of 5s. as a fine or penalty, or in the alternative as damages.

It was argued that because the amount was a penalty under the Truck Act, 1896, it could not be recovered before justices upon a summons under the Act of 1875. The Truck Act provides that employers and workmen shall not make a contract except upon certain terms and conditions; those terms and conditions were in my judgment complied with in the present case, and the contract was, therefore, in my opinion, good and binding on the parties to it. Sec. 1, Sub-sec. 1, was undoubtedly complied with. Sec. 1, Sub-sec. 2, says that "an employer shall not make any such deduction"—in the present case no deduction was made, so those words do not apply—"or receive any such payment;" as to these words, it was said that if the employer goes before the justices and gets a judgment in his favour and gets the proceeds of that judgment he receives a payment, and must, therefore, comply with the remaining part of Sub-sec. 2, which prevents the employer from recovering "unless particulars in writing showing the acts or omissions in respect of which the fine is imposed and the amount thereof are supplied to the workman on each occasion when a deduction or payment is made." But that argument does not seem to avail the respondent much, for the Act provides that the particulars are to be given when the payment is made, and, if recovery of the money is to be treated as payment under the Act, it follows that it is sufficient if the particulars were given when the payment is made, that is, when the employer gets the proceeds of the order of the justices. If the respondent's case is based upon that contention, it appears to me to be wholly wrong.

I should not be inclined to hold that, because in a contract of this nature there is a provision for a penalty, the employer could not in law recover it by means of legal proceedings. A man might absent himself from his work at a time when his employer owed him nothing; for instance, his wages might be paid on Saturday, and he might stay away on the following Monday, Tuesday, and Wednesday; in such a case I should be sorry to hold that a master could not take legal proceedings for the recovery of the penalty mentioned in the contract. But that consideration would not conclude the present case, for there remains the alternative claim for damages. It was contended for the respondent that the employer had no right to recover damages upon such a summons; I cannot accede to that contention. The Truck Act does not deal with damages: it deals with fines and payments in respect of fines; and neither under that Act nor under the contract has the master given up his right to claim damages for the loss occasioned to him by reason of the workman's misfeasance. I think the justices were misled by not noticing that the Truck Act applied certain conditions to the making of a good contract; even if the parties tried to make a contract, but only succeeded in making a bad one, they would not, in my opinion, give up their rights under the Employers and Workmen Act, 1875; nor do they give them up if they make a contract which complies with the conditions of the Truck Act, 1896. I agree, therefore, that this case must go back to the justices.

Appeal allowed.

GLASGOW v. INDEPENDENT PRINTING COMPANY.

Master and servant—Wages—Payment otherwise than in current coin of the realm—Agreement by workman to accept payment of portion of his wage in scrip of the company by whom he was employed—Truck Act (50 & 51 Vict. c. 46)—Agreement signed by those in common employment with the plaintiff.

On a case stated upon the hearing of a civil bill appeal it appeared that the plaintiff was employed by the defendants as a journeyman machinist at 22s. per week. The case stated erroneously that in October, 1894, the plaintiff signed an agreement, along with his fellow-workmen, to accept "a reduction of 10 per cent. on his wages—20s. a week in cash and 2s. to be applied to purchase shares of the defendant company." The plaintiff was paid 20s. down to April 24th, 1897, when he served notice on the defendants that he would not accept the reduced wages, and from that date until February, 1899, he was paid 22s. a week in cash. In February, 1899, he left the defendants' employment, and brought an action for £12, the difference between the 20s. and 22s. a week from the date of the agreement in October, 1894, to April 24th, 1897:—

Held, by the Queen's Bench Division, who acted on the statement in the case, without seeing the agreement, which was supposed to be lost, that the contract entered into by the plaintiff was for a wage of 20s. and an addition of the purchase money of scrip of the Company at the rate of 2s. a week, and that the case was not within the Truck Acts.

Held, also, by the Queen's Bench Division, that even if the agreement were within the Truck Acts, the plaintiff, by its tripartite character, and the acquiescence of his fellow-workmen (some of whom were outside the Acts), and himself, was precluded from recovering.

In the Court of Appeal the original agreement was produced, from which it appeared that the contract was made on the basis that the plaintiff's wages continued to be 22s., of which 2s. per week was to be satisfied by shares:—

Held, by the Court of Appeal, that the agreement was void under the Truck Acts, and the defendants were liable to pay so much of the plaintiff's wages as had not been paid in current coin of the realm; also that there was nothing either in the concurrence of the other workmen or in the plaintiff's own conduct to prevent him from recovering.

Judgments of Queen's Bench Division.

Sir P. O'Brien, L. C. J. This is a difficult case. It is one too, in which we should proceed with great caution, because the manifestly unmeritorious character of the plaintiff's claim renders the exercise of great care, indeed of what I might describe as severe introspection, essentially necessary, lest the impression of moral injustice, which is immediately created by a consideration of the facts, should in any way prejudice our minds in our endeavour to ascertain the true legal basis upon which our judgment should rest.

The construction of the Truck Acts, upon which the case depends, has produced in England an acute conflict of judicial opinion. In Archer v. James (1), which was argued in the Exchequer Chamber in England, six Judges were equally divided in opinion; and, in the case of Hewlett v. Allen (2), which went through every stage of legal discussion, from the Court of First Instance to the House of Lords, each tribunal differed in their reasons. The Court of Appeal differed in its reasons from the Court of First Instance, and the House of Lords differed from the Court of First Instance and from the Court of Appeal.

What are the facts of this case? They are to be found in the case stated for our determination by my brother Madden, and it is better to give them exactly as he stated them, giving not only the facts, but stating the contentions on both sides, and stating besides, which it is very essential to ascertain, the precise question ultimately evolved by the learned Judge for our determination.

"It appears in evidence" (the learned Judge tells us) "that for some time prior to October, 1894, the plaintiff had been employed by the defendants as journeyman machinist, an occupation of manual labour, at a weekly wage of 22s. In that month the defendants found it necessary to reduce their expenditure, and after some negotiations with their staff the following agreement, which was produced in Court, was drawn up by a committee of the staff, and signed by the majority of the staff, including the plaintiff:—'The Committee agree for themselves, and will recommend to their fellow-workers, for six months from November 1st, a reduction in wages on the basis of 10 per cent. off all wages and salaries of £3 a week and under; and of 20 per cent. on all salaries over £3, the deductions to be credited as subscriptions for ordinary shares. The committee also decide that as in the carrying out of this arrangement into proper effect it will be absolutely necessary that the entire staff should join in it, they will recommend to the Board that the services of any employee not agreeing to it should be dispensed with.'

"Under this agreement plaintiff was paid 20s. at the end of each week, and the remaining 2s. was put to his credit in defendants' books, and from time to time scrip of shares in the defendant company to the amount of the sums then standing to his credit was delivered to the plaintiff and accepted by him. After the expiration of six months the same arrangement was carried on by mutual consent, though no new agreement was formally drawn up, and plaintiff continued in defendants' employment on the same terms down to April 24th, 1897. On that date the plaintiff intimated to the defendants that he would not remain on in their employment at the reduced rate of wages, and from April 24th, 1897, until February 24th, 1899, he was paid at the rate of 22s. a week. On the latter date the plaintiff left his employment of his own motion, without giving notice to the defendants. Plaintiff never demanded the amount stopped by defendants until after he had left their employment. During the period from November 1st, 1894, until April 24th, 1897, the difference between the plaintiff's former rate of wages and the rate at which he was then paid amounted to £12. The defendants, in pursuance of the agreement, delivered to plaintiff scrip for this amount, which was produced in Court. It was contended for the plaintiff that the deduction of 2s. a week was illegal under the Truck Acts; that the payment of wages in shares was a payment 'otherwise than in coin of the realm'; and that plaintiff was entitled to recover the amount so deducted and paid. It was contended for the defendants that the agreement produced and signed by the plaintiff was an agreement to a reduced rate of wage, and not to a deduction from his former wages; and, as such, was outside the Truck Acts. That the plaintiff was estopped by acquiescence. That the section of the Truck Acts prohibiting set-off applied to goods only. That shares were not goods. That payment in shares was payment in cash, and that in any event the plaintiff was precluded at the date at which he brought his action from recovering the wages, if due, by Sec. 5 of the Truck Act, 1896. The question for the Court is whether the plaintiff is entitled, under the Provisions of the Truck Act, to recover from the defendants the difference between the former and the reduced rate of payment. If this question is answered in the affirmative the order of the Recorder should be affirmed with costs. If in the negative, the decree should be reversed, and the civil bill dismissed with costs."

Now, we have the facts—the contentions of the respective parties—and the question which we are to answer in the affirmative or negative according to our determination.

The learned Recorder of Dublin, from whom the case came on appeal before my brother Madden, gave a decree for the plaintiff for the full sum claimed, and he has very fully and lucidly stated in the order which he drew up the reasons upon which he acted. He prefaces his order by stating that the Court was of opinion that these actions (it appears there are a number of them, all of a similar character) were, under the circumstances proved, unjust, inequitable, and ungracious, as the agreement suggested to be illegal was a voluntary proposition of the staff, when aware that the defendant company, for commercial reasons, were obliged to reduce their expenditure, and had full power legally to reduce their staff by dismissal or otherwise, or to reduce the rate of wages.

I entirely agree with these observations of the learned Recorder of Dublin, and would add that the immeritorious character of the plaintiff's claim seems to me to be aggravated by the fact that the Board of Directors of the "Independent Printing Company" were urged by the employees, who were parties to the agreement, which the plaintiff now repudiates as illegal, to dismiss all who would not accept its terms. The plaintiff repudiates that very agreement which originated with himself and other employees without contrivance or pressure on the part of the defendants—an agreement which has been fulfilled to the very letter by the defendants, and the non-acceptance of which by the other employees was urged upon the defendants as a ground for their dismissal—and that, too, although some, as was not denied, of the staff of the Company, who were parties to the agreement, did not come within the definition of workmen or artificers as used in the Truck Acts. They were always to remain bound by the agreement they entered into, although the plaintiff, who subscribed the same agreement, which was to form the basis of the common action of all, is to be permitted to repudiate it, not only with reference to the defendants, but with reference to all his co-contractors, in respect of some of whom, at least, the Truck Acts, admittedly, can give no relief.

However, if the statute allows all this, we must not permit what we may consider deflection from a moral standard to override the requirements of the law.

What, then, does this agreement which was entered into between the "Independent Printing and Publishing Company" and their staff mean? Three views may possibly be taken of the contract—three, but no more than three.

First, it may be said that it was a contract in which the wages were fixed at 22s. a week. This was the view advanced and insisted on by the plaintiff's counsel.

Secondly, it may be said to be a contract in which the wages were fixed at 20s. a week, and that, in consideration of accepting a reduced money wage, an interest in the Company was to be given to the plaintiff, that, in fact, the true wage was the reduced money wage of 20s. a week: and that, in consideration of the reduction, the plaintiff was to get an interest in the Company. In this view the interest in the Company would not be given as a recompense or remuneration for labour or work, but in consideration of an agreement to take the smaller wages of 20s. a week.

The third, the only remaining possible view, is that the agreement was a contract in which the weekly wages were fixed at 20s. a week, plus a tenth part of a share in the Company, the face value of which was £1.

Dealing with the contract on the basis that it fixed the wages at 22s. a week, I am, nevertheless, of opinion that, even on that assumption, the plaintiff is not entitled to recover. He is, by the circumstances of the particular case, precluded from all right to recover. He is estopped from so doing by the nature of the contract he entered into, and by the fact that all parties acted upon and acquiesced in it for years on the faith that each were bound thereby. What would be the result if he were allowed to recover ? This —the Company's funds—his co-contractors' share and interest in those funds, including the share and interest in those funds which belonged to those of the staff who were outside the Truck Acts would be made available to pay to the plaintiff the money now claimed by him in breach of his contract with those others—a contract by which they are bound. The relation of employer and employee does not subsist between the plaintiff and his co-contractors, some of whom are outside the Act. The Truck Acts cannot affect their rights, and it would be to sanction a very palpable fraud if we were to allow the plaintiff to recover as against them. He was, without contrivance or pressure of any sort, party to a contract with them ; and now, when he seeks, after years of acquiescence, to recover out of funds in which they are interested, he is, in my opinion, precluded and estopped from saying that his contract with them is not a good one.

It is quite true that they are not parties to the process ; but it must be always borne in mind that it is out of funds, the moneys of the Company in which they are interested, that he seeks to recover. We have before us the Company, of which those co-contractors who are outside the Truck Acts are members ; and, if we hold that a decree should be given, payment must be made out of the funds in which they are interested as shareholders.

For these reasons, even on the assumption that the wages were fixed at 22s. a week, I am of opinion that the plaintiff must fail.

We are, however, all of opinion that the first view of the contract, that it was a contract in which the wage was fixed at 22s. a week is not the correct view. We are all of opinion that the contract, so far as it related to a money wage, did not exceed the limit of 20s. a week. The original wages were to be reduced to that sum. If the full sum of 22s. a week had continued to be payable, there would have been no reduction ; but the new contract, in our opinion, did not operate as a mere mode of discharging a liability of 22s. a week. The agreement operated as a reduction of the money wage, with something additional, namely, the tenth part of a share weekly ; and it matters not whether the tenth part of the face value of the share is to be regarded as a consideration for the reduction of the wages, and therefore as not coming within the definition of wages in the twenty-fifth section of the statute, or as remuneration for labour, and therefore included in that definition.

The provision that what were described as " deductions " were to be credited as subscriptions for ordinary shares has been relied upon both by Mr. Sullivan and Mr. Dunn, in support of the contention they insisted upon throughout—that the wage was a weekly wage of 22s. ; but, in my opinion, the dominant intention of the resolution, which was the basis of the contract, was " reduction " of wages, and the word " deduction " was used to represent the money portion of the original wages, which the staff had agreed to forego. The plaintiff was to be dealt with on the basis that he was to get a share interest in the Company : that is to say, the tenth part of the face value of a share in lieu of what he had given up, in lieu of the reduction he had consented to make, namely, 2s. a week. The essence of the transaction was not a mode of payment of portion of a continued wage of 22s. a week, but the creation of a new wage of 20s. and an interest in the Company, whether the latter—that is, the interest in the Company—was, as I have already said, to be regarded as portion of the wages or a consideration for accepting a new reduced wage.

Now, if it be the latter, the whole case is easily solved. The plaintiff would in that case have been paid his entire wages ; and an interest in a share given as a consideration for accepting a reduced wage would not be within the definition of wages given in the twenty-fifth section of the statute. But, assuming that the share in the Company formed part of the wages, then it follows, I think, clearly, that the plaintiff is not entitled to recover on the question put to us by the learned Judge. That question is " whether the plaintiff is entitled under the provisions of the Truck Act to recover from the defendants the difference between the former and the reduced rate of wages." Agreeing that the wages were 20s. a week, and an interest in a share, what the plaintiff would be entitled to, in addition to the 20s. which he got, would be the value of the share, which might be greater or less than the 2s. a week ; and, as this value is not ascertained, this question should be answered in the negative.

This view, no doubt, though involving an answer to the plaintiff's claim—and the defendants in this case are abundantly justified in relying on any answer—is founded, more or less, upon the form of the case and upon considerations independent of what the true construction of the Truck Act is.

Assuming the wages to be 20s. a week, and a share or part of a share, how, under the Truck Acts, would the matter be ? I am of opinion that the reasons I have assigned as an answer to the plaintiff's claim on the assumption that his wages were 22s. a week, should prevail. If the true view of the contract be that his wages were 20s. and one-tenth of a share, the plaintiff, for the reasons I have already given, is precluded and estopped from relying upon the provisions of the statute to avoid the contract.

But, apart from any question of estoppel and acquiescence, how does the case stand if the contract fixed the wages at 20s. a week, and the tenth part of a share ?

Would that be a case struck at by the Truck Acts ? What was the policy and object of these Acts ? Lord Herschell tells us, in his judgment in the case of Hewlett v. Allen (1). He there says—" I do not think it can be doubted that the object of this enactment was to strike at the practice which had grown up of employers making their payment in part by the supply of goods, in the sale of which they were interested, which it was thought would place the person employed at an unfair disadvantage, and which it was thought was calculated to result in the person employed obtaining something less than the agreed remuneration for services."

This is the language of Lord Herschell. Now a share is not " goods, wares, or merchandise," and the plaintiff in the present case did not get less than what by his contract he agreed to take, viz., 20s. a week, and a tenth part of a share. But the question remains: Is such a form of wage struck at by the Act ? Take this case. Wages fixed at 20s. a week and the use of a cottage to live in. Is that case struck at by the Act ? One's instincts are startled by such a construction of the statute, but such a case might nevertheless appear to come within the letter of the Act, if not within its spirit. The first section of the 1 & 2 Will. IV., c. 37, which is styled the principal Act, provides that, if " In any such contract the whole or any part of such wages shall be made payable in any manner other than in current coin, such contract shall be illegal, null, and void." And the definition of wages, as given in the twenty-fifth section of the Act, includes not only money, but any other thing given as a reward or remuneration for any labour done or to be done. This definition is as wide as it well can be, and its very large comprehensiveness is indicated by the exemptions contained in the fourth section of the Act of 1887, which provides that nothing in the principal Act shall render illegal a contract with a servant in husbandry for giving him, amongst other things, food or a cottage in addition to money wages as remuneration for his services.

But assuming such a contract to be illegal, another question remains. It is this: What is the servant entitled to recover ? Is he entitled to recover not only the money wage, but the value of anything given in addition to money wages ? In the case I put, Is he entitled to recover, not only the money wage, but the value of the use of a cottage ? Now, there is no express provision in the Act of Parliament for valuing anything ; but is such a function or process impliedly imposed or directed ? It, I think, might with some plausibility be contended that once the first section commanded, as it were, payment in money—that is to say, the fixing of a money wage and nothing else—the following sections proceeded on the basis that nothing but money wages would be so fixed, and dealt with their payment with a view to money wages being paid in money, and in no other way: for instance, that a wage of 20s. a week, which would be ex concessis a lawful wage, should be paid in current coin and not otherwise. No doubt, there is a difficulty created by the definition of the word " wages." " Wages," in the first section, would include something in addition to a money wage, and, if in the third and fourth sections the word " wages " was to be construed as a money wage alone, the word in the different sections would bear a different meaning.

However, the words in the third section are the entire " amount " of the wages, and that would certainly prima facie, mean the entire amount of a money wage. The words are not the amount and value ; and later on in the third section, the words used are that every payment made in respect of such wages " by delivering goods, or otherwise than in current coin," is declared illegal. These words would seem to forbid payment by the delivery of goods when a money wage exclusively was fixed.

The fourth section is the important section upon the subject with which I am now dealing, namely, whether the employee can recover at all except where a money wage is fixed. That section provides that the employee may recover any part of wages not paid in current coin, as servants recover their wages.

This section, if taken by itself, would certainly seem to me to contemplate a case where the entire wages consisted of money wages, and where a balance remained undischarged in current coin. It does not seem, at least prima facie, to contemplate the valuing of something other than current coin, and awarding this as wages, for instance, valuing the shares in the present case, and awarding their value to the plaintiff as wages ; and the fifth section, which deals with a limited set-off, would appear to contemplate a money wage against which there would be strictly speaking a set-off.

Now, I asked counsel for the plaintiff, If the wages were 20s. and a share, what would be the consequence ? The answer was that the case I put would raise a difficulty, and that it was essential to their case that the wages were 22s. a week, an entire money wage, and not a wage partly money and partly a share.

It may be said that the statute would be entirely frustrated if the employee could only recover the money part of the wage when the entire wage was of a composite character, namely, partly a money wage and partly something else such as a share, or, the use of a cottage. This is not so, as a composite wage would be hit by the first section. What Lord Bowen, in his judgment in Hewlett v. Allen (1), calls " the offence against the public," would be committed if a composite wage was fixed, and this offence would be penalised by the ninth section of the Act.

However, upon the facts of this particular case, and having regard to the answer that, as I have before indicated, may be given to the plaintiff's claim, on the hypothesis that the wages were of a composite character, namely, of 20s. a week and a share, it is not necessary to come to a final opinion on the question I have been now discussing, though my present impression is that the employee is entitled to recover only where the deduction is from a money wage.

My brother Andrews has suggested a view, which attracts me, but in reference to which I do not think it necessary to give a final opinion. He pointed out to us that the sixth section contemplates that there may be other defences besides the limited character of the set-off dealt with in that section; and he has referred to passages in Lord Bowen's judgment in Hewlett v. Allen (1), which would indicate that this was so; and he suggests that, this being so, it is only reasonable to hold that, whilst the shares stand in the plaintiff's name, the defendants may set up a defence against a claim for their value, that the plaintiff still holds the very thing he seeks to recover the value of.

This view of the case is certainly plausible, but there is this difficulty. Is it not setting up as a defence the retention of that which the first section prohibits to be given as wages, declaring any contract by which it is agreed to be given as wages to be illegal, null, and void? However, I desire to leave the matter absolutely open as far as I am concerned.

As to the point that the plaintiff is barred by lapse of time, I agree with the argument of his counsel. The section of the Act of 1896, upon which the question arises, is expressly confined to cases arising under that Act, and does not extend to cases arising under the principal Act. The separate identity of each Act is distinctly preserved.

On the whole case, however, I am of opinion, for the reasons I have assigned, that the plaintiff is not entitled to succeed, and that the case which has been stated for our determination by our brother Madden must be answered in the negative, the defendants to get the costs of the argument. As I said at the commencement of my judgment, the case is a difficult one, and its difficulty with me was much enhanced by the fact that the learned Recorder of Dublin, for whose opinion and legal attainments I entertain very great respect, arrived at a different conclusion.

Andrews, J. The question which Mr. Justice Madden has reserved, namely, whether the plaintiff in this action is entitled to recover, under the provisions of the Truck Act, the difference between his former and reduced rates of payment must, in my opinion, be answered in the negative, for in no view of the case, as I interpret the agreement in question, could he, upon the facts as stated, be entitled to recover more than the money value of the shares he has received, and this has not been ascertained; but, as the case is one of considerable importance, and it appears that a number of claims depend upon its decision, I shall consider whether apart from all technicality, the plaintiff, upon the facts as stated, is entitled, in any form of action, to recover anything from the defendants, even upon the assumption that the contract between them was for payment of part of his wages otherwise than in current coin of the realm.

I shall first dispose briefly of the question upon the limitation of the time within which the proceedings referred to in the fifth section of the Truck Act of 1896 (59 & 60 Vict. c. 44) are to be commenced, and which has long since elapsed.

I think it clear, upon an examination of the whole of that Act—and looking at the necessary construction of the words "this Act," as contained in its fourth section—that the words, "this Act," in the fifth section, mean the Act of 1896 only, and that this limitation section has, therefore, no application to the present case; but, even if it were to be deemed applicable to cases within the Truck Act of 1831 (1 & 2 Will. IV., c. 37), I should be unable to hold that its terms included the present case, which, in my opinion, is not one of sums "deducted by, or paid to" the defendants, within the meaning of these words in the fifth section.

Upon the construction of the agreement, as set out in the case, I am of opinion that the rate of the plaintiff's wages theretofore existing was determined, and a new contract at a new and different wage was entered into; and, even assuming (but without deciding) that the weekly crediting under the agreement of the differences between his former wages of 22s. per week, and the "reduced" sum of 20s. per week, as subscriptions for ordinary shares in the defendant company, is to be regarded as part of his wages, what the plaintiff was to receive under the agreement was not 22s. per week, paid by 20s. and one-tenth of a share in the defendant company, but 20s. per week, plus an allocation of one-tenth of such share, according to its face value, which it appears was £1. Now, taking the widest view of it, the mischief against which the Truck Act of 1831 was provided was payment, or part-payment of wages, in such manner that the person to whom they were payable might thereby get (as he often did by payment, or part-payment, in goods) less in value than what he contracted for as his wages. A contract admitting of such payment is what was intended to be, and is prohibited by the first section of the Act of 1831; and I do not regard the present case as coming within the spirit of the Act of 1831, whatever may be said as to its coming within the letter.

I cannot think that it was intended by that Act to make illegal and void a contract for a wage of a specified money amount, with something besides money added, say, for instance, a house or garden, free of rent, or the grazing of a cow. Under such a contract the person employed would receive everything he contracted for, and nothing which could be of less value than what he contracted for as his wages; and, under the contract in the present case, as I interpret it, the plaintiff by receiving 20s. per week, and a weekly allocation of one-tenth of a share in the defendant company, received everything he contracted for, and nothing which was, or could be, of less value. In the second section of the Act of 1831 the context clearly shows that the "wages" therein referred to are the money wages contracted for, and that what is prohibited is any provision in the contract for laying out or expending them in any particular manner. But, assuming for the sake of argument, and without deciding, that, having regard to the definition of the word "wages" in the twenty-fifth section, and to the language of the first and third sections, the agreement in question, in so far as it relates to the tenth of the share, must be held to be illegal and void, and that the "payment" (if it can be so called) of the tenth of the share was illegal and void as a payment—the plaintiff's remedy, in my opinion, under the fourth section, would, at the furthest, be to recover the value in current coin of that part of his wages, viz., the tenth of the share which had been contracted to be paid otherwise than in current coin. The fourth section could not mean that his remedy was to recover the actual tenth of the share, for, on the assumption I have made, the contract to pay by it was illegal, and under the contract he would receive the actual tenth of the share as he has done.

Now, in an action by the present plaintiff to recover the value in current coin of the shares he has received and retained, the defendants would have the right, if it has not been taken away, to defend the action, on the ground that the plaintiff has got and retains the very shares for the value of which he sues, and this would obviously be a complete answer to the action. The defendants' right to rely on this defence has not, in my opinion, been taken away. The fifth section of the Act of 1831 only takes away the right of the defendant in such an action to make any set-off, or claim any reduction of the plaintiff's demand, in respect "of any goods, wares, or merchandise," had or received by the plaintiff, as, or on account of, his wages, or in reward for his labour. The weekly allocation of the tenth of a share cannot come within this category, nor can the shares in the defendant company ultimately received by the plaintiff. This fifth section, therefore, has not taken away the defendants' right to rely on the defence I have referred to, and it has not been suggested that anything else has taken it away.

It will be observed that, on the assumption on which I have been proceeding, all that is rendered illegal and void, is the contract to pay, and the payment of part of the plaintiff's wages by the weekly allocation of the tenth of a share in the defendant company. The mere weekly allocation per se is a perfectly legal act, and so is the reception of it per se. Grant, for argument's sake, that the contract for the allocation, and the part payment of wages by the allocation, were null and void, and that the plaintiff could have refused to be bound by the contract in this respect, and could have insisted on being paid weekly the value of the tenth of the share in current coin, still there is nothing in the Act nor in law, or reason, outside the Act, to prevent him from electing to take and keep the shares, which he did take, and has kept, whereby he has received exactly what he contracted for, and nothing which could be of less value. The weekly allocation was his own proposal, and was made at his own request, and he voluntarily accepted it each week.

The case is free from any suggestion of influence, or pressure by the defendants, and, as I have said, there is no illegality whatever in either the allocation or the reception of the shares per se. On the facts I think it clear that the plaintiff must be held to have elected to waive his action (on the assumption that he had one) and keep his shares, and that this also would be a complete answer to an action to recover the money value now.

It will be observed that he has never rejected his shares, nor repudiated, nor sought to return them.

The case of Hewlett v. Allen (1), though not identical with the present case, affords, in my opinion, valuable guidance for its determination. The decision of the Court of Appeal was affirmed by the House of Lords, and though on different grounds from those which formed the basis of the judgments in the Court of Appeal, these judgments cannot, as I think, be regarded as having been over-ruled. The joint judgment of Bowen, L.J. and Lord Esher, has very instructive comments on the Truck Act of 1831. The learned Lord Justice, in referring (pp. 664, 665) to the provisions which give the right to the workman to recover the arrears of wages not paid in coin, observes that, while the Act prevented the employer from setting up in answer to such action some rights of set-off, of which he might otherwise at law have availed himself, it still left other rights of set-off available to him. Again, referring to Sec. 5, he said (pp. 667, 668): "It will be seen that it extinguishes such right of set-off only in certain cases, leaving rights of legal and equitable set-off untouched in all other instances than those specifically mentioned. . . . The statute draws its line of tutelary shelter here, and a similar though not absolutely identical line is drawn in the Act of 1887. Beyond these lines, all legal and equitable rights of set-off, and all legal and equitable defences, other than payment, are still left open to the employer."

Further on, after saying that the payment in current coin of a portion only, instead of the entire wages may be an offence against the Act (i.e. of 1831), he proceeds on these words:—"Yet when the workman sues to recover the unpaid portion, the employer is not precluded in all cases and every case alike from enforcing every set-off, or legal or equitable defence that he possesses, although in respect of certain specified dealings he is deprived of a particular set-off. The offence against the public may well be complete, and the penalty have been incurred, but it does not follow that the employer is to pay the workman the full arrear left unpaid in current coin, where, though not paid in current coin, the claim of the workman has been released, or satisfied in some other lawful way which falls short of being actual payment . . . and facts which establish a right of equitable, as well as legal set-off, will also be available to the employer, if they are outside the set-off forbidden by the Act."

These observations appear to me to have an important bearing upon the relative positions of the plaintiff and the defendants in the present case.

Kay, L. J., agreed in the main with the judgment I have referred to, and said (pp. 674, 675):—"Particularly I agree that the deduction made in this case [Hewlett v. Allen (1)] was prima facie a deduction contrary to the spirit and the language of the Truck Act, which has been referred to; but in this particular action we have to consider not merely that, but whether the subsequent conduct of the plaintiff in the action has not been such as to debar her from the remedy, which prima facie she had to recover the arrears of her wages under the provisions of the Truck Act."

What was in question in the case of Hewlett v. Allen (1) was a clear deduction weekly from the plaintiff's money wages and the payment of it as a subscription to the funds of a sick and accident club. The House of Lords held this payment to be, upon the facts of that case, payment to the plaintiff within the meaning of the third and fourth sections of the Truck Act of 1831, but it also seems to have been held (p. 392) that even assuming that there was in that case a contract which was made illegal, null, and void, by the second section of the Act, the defendant by making the weekly payments to the club, with the assent of the plaintiff, had discharged his obligations to her.

(1) [1892] 2 Q. B. 662; [1894] A. C. 383.

In referring to the object of the Act of 1831, Lord Herschell said (p. 389) :—" My Lords, I do not think it can be doubted that the object of this enactment was to strike at the practice which had grown up of employers making their payment in part by the supply of goods in the sale of which they were interested, which it was thought would place the person employed at an unfair disadvantage, and which it was thought was calculated to result in the person employed obtaining something less than the agreed remuneration for his services."

His Lordship also referred to the limited character of the set-off, or reduction of demand which is prohibited by the Act (pp. 389, 390), and which I have observed upon.

I do not think it necessary to occupy time in discussing the numerous other authorities to which we were referred during the arguments on both sides, having regard to the guidance which, in my opinion, is afforded by the judgments in the Court of Appeal, and the House of Lords, in a case of so high and so recent authority as that of Hewlett v. Allen (1), and, although the decision as to the rights of the parties in this case cannot be affected by any considerations outside the law applicable thereto, I may be permitted to add that I regard it as satisfactory that the conclusions at which I have felt justified at arriving on legal grounds are consistent with the manifest justice of this particular case, which, as it appears to me, would be lamentably defeated if the plaintiff's contention were to prevail.

Gibson, J. . At first sight this case would seem to be far distant from the mischief dealt with by the Truck Acts, viz., payment of wages in goods, and possible advantage thence derived by the employer at the workman's expense. The staff of a new journal, some of them within the Truck Acts, and some (as counsel admit), like Mr. Allen, the manager of the paper, outside those Acts, in order to save the adventure from shipwreck, and to avoid consequent loss of employment, agree on their own initiative with one another, and with the Company their employers, that all wages should be reduced by a certain percentage, varying according as the wages were under or over £2 a week (the case erroneously states £3). To mitigate the severity of the sacrifice, and also as an incentive to zeal and exertion, the members of the staff are brought into partnership by getting shares in the paper, which are to be acquired by crediting each member with the amount of reduction he has submitted to as purchase-money of the shares estimated at their full value. To ensure complete unity of action, it was agreed that any employee not assenting to the reduction should be discharged. Does such an arrangement come within the Truck Code ?

Before considering whether the Acts apply, we must ascertain, apart from the Truck Code, what is the true meaning of the contract, and what is the real contract wage. The plaintiff's argument proceeds on the view that there was no reduction of wage at all, but only an alteration in the mode of payment, which, so far as relates to the deduction of the percentage and the acquisition of shares, was (it is said) illegal. The defendant's construction is that there was a wholly new rate of wage created ; the former wage was reduced ; and the employees were to get, by way of additional remuneration, shares which were to be acquired by crediting the amount of reduction as if it was purchase-money. A third view has been suggested by my Lord, viz., that the wage was reduced ; that it was the only remuneration, and that the shares were not part of the wage or remuneration for labour, but the consideration for the acceptance of the reduced wage. The agreement (of which the case only purports to give an extract) does not expressly specify the consideration, which must be collected by inference. The arrangement is expressed in loose and untechnical language. Having regard to the definition of " wages " in Sec. 25 of the principal Act, and to the fact that every composite wage, consisting partly of money and partly of goods, prima facie imports that the cash part is reduced in proportion to the estimated value of the goods, I think it best to assume in the plaintiff's favour for the purpose of my decision that the arrangement provided a new remuneration in substitution for the old wage. In any aspect of the case the shares cannot be regarded as a voluntary bonus.

Dealing with the contract as meaning that the plaintiff's wage was not merely of 20s. a week, but comprised something else, I think it is plain that the governing word of the bargain is " reduction. This term the plaintiff s interpretation entirely deletes. No doubt the word " deduction " is also used ; but it is manifest that the 2s. a week was never intended to be payable in coin. The percentage of reduction was only used for the purpose of the book-keeping calculation on which the shares were to be allotted. Just as the shares represented a speculative value quite different from the face value, so the 2s. credited did not represent real cash. The Truck Code does not alter the contract of employment in its essence, and transform the value or rate of the stipulated remuneration. If the contract was broken, the plaintiff, if not within the Truck Act, could only recover as damages the value of the shares, and not the amount of the deduction. The wage of 22s. a week payable in coin which the plaintiff now claims is quite different from the remuneration bargained for. The plaintiff cannot by the instrumentality of the Truck Acts convert speculative paper into cash, and compel payment on that basis.

If the shares formed part of the recompense of the plaintiff's labour, do the Truck Acts apply to the transaction ? and can the plaintiff who holds the shares get payment of their value from the defendants ? The authorities cited in argument all relate to cases where, the wages being reckoned in money, the question raised was as to the discharge of such money wage. The application of the enactment to remuneration of labour in goods of unascertained value was not before the Court for decision in any of the cases. The terms of the Act of 1831, however, are clear, and require the remuneration of labour to be made in current coin, and not otherwise. The definition of " wages " in Sec. 25, and the language of Sec. 4 of the Amendment Act of 1887 place the matter beyond doubt. It is certain that a wage, wholly or partly consisting of goods of amount and value fixed by the contract of hiring, would be contrary to the statute. Recompense of labour by goods, etc., of uncertain value is equally forbidden. The wage must be reckoned in money and paid in current coin, save in certain excepted cases.

Take the case of an artificer employed at 20s. a week with a free house (a demise at a rent is provided for by Sec. 23), and other advantages of unascertained value, such as a supply of milk, etc.—if such house and advantages are part of the remuneration of labour, the employer may be guilty of a statutory offence within Sec. 9. He could hardly escape liability by saying that the money was the only wage, and that the employee had agreed to accept a reduced money wage in consideration of the free house, etc. But, though the employer in such case may have committed an offence, it does not follow that he is civilly liable under Sec. 4. As Bowen, L.J., points out in Hewlett v. Allen (1), the civil and criminal provisions of the enactment do not quite cover the same ground. Sec. 4 enables so much of the wages as shall not have been actually paid in current coin to be recovered. It would seem (like Sec. 5) to deal with wages reckoned in money. It relates apparently to the enforcement of a lawful money wage which the employer has sought to discharge by illegal means. Without straining the language it hardly seems to apply to the recovery of the money value of an illegal wage. There is nothing expressly authorising the Court before which the case may come to convert the unlawful remuneration in kind into payment in coin at a value or price fixed by itself. Can such a power be implied ? It may be said that unless there is such power, and unless Sec. 4 can be brought into operation, an employee, whose wage wholly or in part is composed of goods of unascertained value, is left without civil redress for a clear contravention of the Act. This may be so, but a wage in goods of unascertained value is rare—the reported cases supply no example—and the Legislature, whether from oversight or intentionally, may have confined the civil remedy to the grievance of common occurrence, the payment of a money wage in goods, or otherwise than in coin. As the point is of some general importance, I am unwilling, if the case can be disposed of on other grounds, to decide it now. I shall therefore assume (though I by no means decide) that the plaintiff can sue under Sec. 4 for the value of the shares.

This brings me to Sec. 5, which prevents the employer from making or claiming any set-off or reduction in respect of " goods, wares, or merchandise " had or received on account of wages. But for this section it might be hard to argue that there could be a set-off based on an illegal or void contract. That section, however, may be interpreted as conveying, (a) that, but for its prohibition, there might have been a valid set-off to the extent of the value of the goods supplied, notwithstanding that there had been a violation of the statute by the employer ; (b) that in cases lying outside its words, the right of set-off remained unaffected. The section refers to " goods, wares, or merchandise." Sec. 5 of the Act of 1887 uses only the term " goods." A house would not appear to fall within this language, nor would the phraseology seem to suit shares which are a speculative chose-in-action of fluctuating and uncertain value. The defendants contend that if shares are not " goods," they can defend themselves by an equivalent set-off against a claim by the plaintiff (if he is entitled at all to maintain such claim) for the value of the shares, treated as an unpaid money-wage. The set-off would, like the cause of action, be based on the value, and not on any contract price, the contract being (ex hypothesi) illegal and void. This view of the defendants may be sound, but I feel much difficulty in seeing how there can be a set-off founded on a valid implied contract when the express contract is illegal and void. In two material particulars the case before us differs from Hewlett v. Allen (2). The allotment of shares was here an express part of the contract of hiring, and the shares were the employers' own property. There was nothing like payment in coin to third parties, from which payment the masters could derive no benefit. Much of the reasoning of the Law Lords is addressed to these two considerations. That case was decided on the ground that there was no violation of the Truck Act ; but Lord Herschell was of opinion that, even if the Act was infringed, the plaintiff was bound by payments made by his employers on his behalf with his assent. The payments could scarcely be included in the terms, " goods, wares, or merchandise," and, if the view of Sec. 5, now contended for, is correct, it is strange that the judgment was not based on the simple ground that, as Sec. 5 did not apply, the defendants were entitled to protect themselves by set-off. So far, however, is this from being the case that the only lord who mentions Sec. 5 is Lord Herschell. He refers to it in a cursory manner, the greater part of his speech being applied to show that the payment was not in any way contrary to the statute. I admit, however, that the argument based on Sec. 5 is plausible. The section, on its face, seems to imply that to an action brought in consequence of violation of the previous sections of the Act, a defence of set-off would have been available if it (the section) had not taken away such defence. On this view, the only question would be, to what extent does the section exclude set-off ? I do not think that shares in the defendant company—a form of profit-sharing—could be considered to be such " goods " as the section contemplates. If every set-off is open which is not expressly forbidden by Sec. 5, the defendants can meet, by a set-off, the action so far as it seeks to recover the value of the shares as wages not paid in coin. The point is one of some difficulty, and the tenor of the speeches in the House of Lords suggests doubt whether Sec. 5 can have the very wide scope and effect for which the defendants now contend. The nature of the set-off or credit authorised by Sec. 23 rather tends to rebut the inference that Sec. 5, by implication, permits every set-off which is not thereby expressly forbidden. Whether, however, a set-off is available or not, the decree seems to be plainly wrong. The plaintiff could not, in my view of the contract, recover more than the value of the shares. The decree gives him 2s. a week as an unpaid cash-wage. The question reserved is whether the plaintiff is entitled to that sum ; if he is not, the decree is to be reversed. The answer must be negative. The Court cannot ascertain any other sum based on the value of the shares, varying probably from week to week, as it has no materials before it for making any such calculation.

But other difficulties lie in the plaintiff's way, even assuming in his favour his own construction of the arrangement of 1894, and that there is no set-off.

He has accepted shares in the defendant company, and he is, or is entitled to be, on the register in respect of such shares. The transaction is complete, and his ownership cannot be affected by the illegality of the bargain under which he got them. If the employment was with an ordinary partnership, there would be nothing illegal in fixing the remuneration, partly at a fixed cash-wage and partly at a share in profits. Would a money-wage, with a right to a share in the business after certain periods of service, be unlawful ? In such a case the employee would become himself one of the employers. A limited company or corporation may be subject to somewhat different considerations ; and an employee may conceivably be at liberty to take shares in such company without losing his right to sue or prosecute for a violation of the Truck Act in respect of such shares. Where the dealing is confined to the employer and employee, there is great difficulty in making out that acquiescence, any more than contract, can be a defence. The limited protection given by Sec. 5 of the Act of 1896, in case of acquiescence, is an argument against any such defence being admissible in other cases or generally. In Hughes v. Bonella (3), however, acquiescence seems to have formed the sole ground of the judgment, though no third interests were involved.

The case for binding the plaintiff by conduct rests mainly on the tripartite character of the arrangement to which the other members of the staff were parties. Some of these latter (as counsel concede) are outside the Truck Acts, and against them the contract was legally binding. It is familiar law that a bargain otherwise invalid may become effectual by the concurrence of third parties, and an accord and satisfaction may be validated in the same way. Many examples will be found in the notes to Cumber v. Wane (1). If the agreement might have been illegal and void between the plaintiff and defendants, if they were the only contracting parties, it does not follow that, after it was acted on, it was void between the plaintiff and his assenting associates. It was certainly valid as between members of the staff like Allen and the defendants. The plaintiff and his co-adventurers having accepted shares, the plaintiff now seeks, to the prejudice of the latter, to seize upon the property preserved by the common sacrifice and general average contribution. In violation of the contract and after the position of his colleague has been altered on the faith of that contract, he puts forward a claim which, if successful, must necessarily reduce the value of the shares. He would wreck the vessel just as it may be entering port. Do the Truck Acts enable such a seemingly unjust and unfair attempt to succeed ? The opinion of Bowen, L.J., in Hewlett v. Allen (2), is that there may be acquiescence precluding civil remedy even where the statute is infringed. Lord Herschell seems to have entertained the same view. In this case, not only was there an agreement with third parties for value, but there has been an allotment of shares on the faith of it. All the contractors got shares in the defendant Company, the employers. Can the plaintiff be allowed to sue the Company, that is, the entire body of shareholders, when the result is to confiscate for his own benefit the fruit of his comrades' labour and sacrifice, and prejudice their rights as shareholders ? Unless compelled by authority, I decline to hold that any such violation of a contract, acted on by all concerned for years, can be carried out under the cover of the Truck Acts.

I agree that if the plaintiff is entitled to sue, his remedy is not barred by Sec. 5 of the Act of 1896. That statute relates to prospective contracts, and brings certain new cases within the operation of the Truck legislation. The expression "this Act" throughout refers to the Act of 1896. It must bear this meaning in Sec. 4; Sec. 5 ought to receive the same interpretation. Sec. 12 does no more than make the previous legislation applicable to the new provisions.

To summarize: I am of opinion that the plaintiff's construction of the contract is erroneous: that the contract, if and so far as it made shares part of the remuneration of the plaintiff's labour, was contrary to the Act; that the plaintiff's remedy (if any) was limited to the value of the shares, and that the decree appealed from cannot be supported, as it gives the plaintiff a rate of wage to which he was not entitled under his contract. I pronounce no final opinion whether the plaintiff can sue under Sec. 4; but, if he can, I have much doubt whether, on the facts of the present case, the defendants can protect themselves by set off. But, adopting the plaintiff's own interpretation of the contract, I hold that by his conduct he has lost the right to sue.

Boyd, J. The question submitted to the Court for its decision is "whether the plaintiff is entitled, under the provisions of the Truck Act, to recover from the defendants the difference between the former and the reduced rate of payment." I think this question should be answered in the negative.

Some years prior to 1884 the defendant company had been incorporated as a limited liability company, its staff consisting of several persons, some of whom came within the provisions of the Truck Acts, while others were outside those provisions.

In the year 1894 it became apparent that the company was not a financial success, and that it could not continue its business unless reductions were made in the expenses of the establishment; and this was well known to the staff. Under these circumstances the several persons forming the staff met together and a committee was appointed by them to devise an arrangement whereby they should retain their employment by enabling the company to continue its operations. Accordingly, the committee drew up an agreement for presentation to the company; and this was signed by the majority of the staff, including the plaintiff and others who came within the protection and provisions of the Truck Acts, and by others who did not come within the scope of these Acts. The agreement, so prepared, was furnished by them to the company, and was accepted; and the services of the staff were retained on the terms and on the faith of this agreement. So far, as it appears to me, there was no collusion or contrivance by any of the parties to evade the provisions of the Truck Acts; and the agreement was prepared by the staff and accepted by the company in a bona fide effort to reduce expenses and to provide employment for the staff.

In my opinion, the cardinal point of this agreement was "a reduction in wages," and it provides that "they (the committee) will recommend the Board that the service of any employee not agreeing to it should be dispensed with."

Prior to this arrangement, the plaintiff was in the receipt of 22s. a week as wages, and under the scale fixed under the agreement these wages were "reduced" to 20s. a week, and the wages of the other employees, as well those who were within the scope of the Truck Acts as those who were not, were similarly reduced. Having provided for the reduction of the wages, the agreement then provided that, in consideration of the employees making such reduction, the deductions should be credited as subscriptions for ordinary shares in the company. In my opinion, these so-called "deductions" formed no part of the wages "made payable." If they were, the agreement as to a "reduction" of wages would be a farce. The deductions were not made from the agreed wages, but from the former wage. The deductions were not to be "made payable", as the Act of 1831 provided, but "to be credited as subscriptions" towards the employees becoming part proprietors of the company.

The employees continued in the employment of the company from October, 1894, to April 24th, 1897, under the terms of the agreement; and, on the latter date, as the case states, "the plaintiff intimated to the defendants that he would not remain on in their employment at the reduced rate of wages, and from April 24th, 1897, until February 24th, 1899, he was paid at the rate of 22s. a week." Till after he left the employment of the company on February 24th, 1899, he never repudiated the arrangement made by him and the other employees, and, during the whole of the time he was receiving the reduced wages, he likewise received the scrip for the shares, and retained and still retains the same.

In my opinion, the plaintiff entered into a contract not alone with the defendants, but also with his fellow employees, those within the scope of the Acts as well as those outside the Acts, that, if they accepted reduced wages, so would he; and I think it would be a violation of all principles of law and justice that he should be permitted, after his long acquiescence, now to repudiate his contract. On the faith of his having so contracted he induced others, who cannot avail themselves of his contention in the present case, to alter their position; and it would be a clear fraud on these persons should he be permitted to recover in this action.

I do not think that the arrangement which was made by the employees at their own instance, with their employers, and for their own benefit, comes within the grievances provided against in the Truck Acts.

Judgments of Court of Appeal.

The plaintiff appealed to the Court of Appeal (Lord Ashbourne, C., and FitzGibbon, Walker, and Holmes, L.JJ.), and during the argument the original agreement, as signed by the plaintiff, was for the first time produced, the material portion of which is stated in the Lord Chancellor's judgment.

Lord Ashbourne, C. This case came originally before the Recorder some time ago on a process brought by the plaintiff to recover a sum of £12, the balance of a sum for wages, which he claimed against the defendants. The Recorder, having fully considered all the facts of the case, felt himself bound to hold on the construction of the Truck Acts, that the plaintiff had made out his case, and that the defendants were liable. The defendants appealed, and the case came before Madden, J., on appeal, when the question was fully discussed. Madden, J., did not decide the question, but having regard to the importance of the arguments, he thought it right to state a case for the decision of the Queen's Bench Division. In order to explain the position and make my meaning clear, I shall read some of the paragraphs of the case stated—"It appeared in evidence that for some time prior to October, 1894, the plaintiff had been employed by the defendants as journeyman machinist, an occupation of manual labour, at a weekly wage of 22s. In that month the defendants found it necessary to reduce their expenditure and, after some negotiations with their staff, the following agreement, which was produced in Court, was drawn up by a committee of the staff and signed by the majority of the staff, including the plaintiff—'The committee agree for themselves and will recommend to their fellow-workers for six months from November 1st, a reduction in wages on the basis of 10 per cent. off all wages and salaries of £3 a week and under, and of 20 per cent. on all salaries over £3, the deductions to be credited as subscriptions for ordinary shares.' Under this agreement the plaintiff was paid 20s. at the end of each week, and the remaining 2s. was put to his credit in the defendant's books, and from time to time scrip of shares in the defendant Company, to the amount of the sums then standing to his credit, was delivered to the plaintiff, and accepted by him.

"After the expiration of six months the same arrangement was carried on by mutual consent, though no new agreement was formally drawn up, and the plaintiff continued in the defendants' employment on the same terms down to April 24th, 1897. On that date the plaintiff intimated to the defendants that he would not remain on in their employment at the reduced rate of wages, and from April 24th, 1897, until February 24th, 1899, he was paid at the rate of 22s. a week. On the latter date the plaintiff left his employment of his own motion without giving notice to the defendants.

"During the period from November 1st, 1894, until April 24th, 1897, the difference between the plaintiff's former rate of wages and the rate at which he was then paid amounted to £12."

When that case came before the Queen's Bench Division, composed of the Lord Chief Justice, and Andrews, Gibson, and Boyd, JJ., it was fully argued on both sides. The plaintiff contended that the deduction of 2s. a week was illegal under the Truck Acts, and that the payment of wages in shares was a payment under the Truck Acts "otherwise than in coin of the realm," and that the old wage of 22s. a week was still the wage which was to be paid, 20s. of it in coin, and the residue in shares. The defendants, on the other hand, put forward an equally strong contention, namely, that the old contract of 22s. was gone, and a perfectly new contract was entered into between the parties, namely, an agreement to work for the wages of 20s. a week while in addition 2s. a week was credited to the plaintiff in shares. The Queen's Bench Division, on the way in which the agreement is stated in the special case, as I have read it, held that it was a new contract, the governing word of which was that there was a reduction in the old wage, that it was a new wage that was agreed upon, and that the shares were not given in part payment of a new cash wage, but it was a bonus or a consideration for the acceptance of the new wage, and they reversed the decision of the Recorder, and decided in favour of the defendants.

The plaintiff appealed from that decision, and the case was clearly argued before us by Mr. Dunn for the appellant, and Mr. O'Mahony for the respondents. Up to a certain point in the argument, and it had proceeded a considerable way, the impression upon my mind was in favour of the defendants, and I was disposed to think that the agreement as set forth in the case stated was good. Before, however, the argument closed, at the suggestion of Walker, L.J., the original document which contained the agreement was produced, and it was found that it contained terms, and expressions, and provisions, which had to be considered before a decision could be given. The case then stood over to enable the parties to have an opportunity of considering this new aspect of the case. When this document was looked into, it was found that it altered the view of the case very considerably; the governing word "reduction," which was formerly relied on, no longer appears in the way it was in the case stated, but the word "deduction" occupies a much more prominent position, and must be taken as expressing the recommendation of the committee, which was signed by the parties. The report of the committee states :—"The committee, having fully considered the position and prospect of the paper, are of opinion that rigid economy of every expenditure added to a small proportional reduction in the heavy wages list of the Company up to about June, 1895, will bring the expenditure and income level." It then proceeds :—"The committee think it well that an engagement should be made by which the entire salaried staff should during the next six months take a certain proportion of their salaries in shares of the Company." From the next page it is plain that this proportion of their salaries was looked at as a deduction from the old wage of 22s. a week. The result of this agreement and its construction amounts to this, that the old wage of 22s. was not determined, it was continued, but the method of payment was changed, and instead of 22s. to be paid at the end of the week, the new stipulation was that 20s. only was paid in cash, and the remaining 2s. in shares. It is obvious that this presented the case in an entirely new aspect, and strengthened the argument for the plaintiff, while it placed the defendants in much greater difficulty.

The case turns on the construction of the Truck Act of 1831, which was extended to Ireland by the Act of 1887, and that latter Act enlarged the number of employments to which the Truck Acts should apply. There are some sections in that Act that are expressed with a clearness which cannot be ignored. The first section of the Act of Will. IV., (1) provides that "in all contracts hereafter to be made for the hiring of any artificer in any of the trades hereinafter enumerated, or for the performance by any artificer of any labour in any of said trades, the wages of such artificer shall be made payable in the current coin of this realm only, and not otherwise, and that if in any such contract the whole or any part of such wages shall be made payable in any manner other than in the current coin aforesaid, such contract shall be, and is hereby declared, illegal null, and void."

It is hardly possible to conceive words of greater stringency. The Act then provides in Sec. 3 that "the entire amount of the wages earned by, or payable to, any artificer in any of the trades hereinafter enumerated, in respect of any labour by him done in any such trade, shall be actually paid to such artificer in the current coin of this realm, and not otherwise; and every payment made to any such artificer by such employer, of or in respect of any such wages, by the delivering to him of goods, or otherwise than in the current coin aforesaid, except as hereinafter mentioned, shall be, and is hereby declared, illegal, null, and void." These provisions make the meaning of the Act absolutely clear, that the wages of workmen should be paid in current coin of the realm, and every effort to pay them otherwise is declared to be illegal, null, and void; and considering the clearness of those provisions, and the stringency of the language used in the Act, I have arrived at the conclusion that this agreement was an attempt to pay wages otherwise than in current coin of the realm, and was therefore illegal, null, and void.

Then we have to consider the question—Does that give the plaintiff the right to issue this process in the Recorder's Court for payment of the balance of his wages, although he has been credited with 2s. a week in shares ? That is answered by the fourth section, which provides that "Every artificer in any of the trades hereinafter enumerated shall be entitled to recover from his employer in any such trade, in the manner by law provided for the recovery of servants' wages, or by any other lawful way and means, the whole or so much of the wages earned by such artificer in such trade as shall not have been actually paid to him by such his employer in the current coin of this realm."

Once we arrived at the conclusion that the old rate of 22s. a week was the plaintiff's wage, and that the only new matter was an agreement not to pay the entire amount in cash, but to pay portion by crediting the plaintiff with shares in the books of the defendants, then the fourth section applies, and the right of the plaintiff to recover the part of his wages not paid in cash is clear. It is worthy of note that a subsequent section of the Act of Parliament was deemed necessary to provide that payment of wages might be made in bank notes instead of coin, if the artificer consents. It may be that the Legislature was dealing at the time with men who were forced to take part of their wages in food, or other supplies; but "current coin of the realm" is the sole method of payment in the Act of Parliament. Going on these clear words, I am of opinion that this agreement cannot be upheld, being a contract that portion of the plaintiff's wages was to be paid otherwise than in current coin of the realm.

Then it was argued on behalf of the defendants, that, assuming that there was a violation of the Truck Act, there was acquiescence on the part of the plaintiff in this dealing, so that it would be inequitable for the plaintiff to take advantage of the provisions of the Truck Act, and that he was estopped from raising the question. I do not feel myself at liberty to do away with the clear words of the statute, which declares such agreements to be illegal, null, and void, unless I am coerced by authority to do so. The case of Hewlett v. Allen (2), which came before the Court of Appeal in England, and also before the House of Lords (3), was relied on. I fail to see the analogy between the two cases. There the employer had paid subscriptions again and again to a sick and accident club, with the consent of the employee, and the House of Lords held that such payments were equivalent to payment to the employee herself in current coin of the realm; the greater portion of her wages being paid in coin to the employee herself, and the rest being paid in coin to a club at her request. That is the decision of the House of Lords, consisting of Lord Herschell, Lord Watson, Lord Morris, and Lord Shand. It was, indeed, contended that in the Court of Appeal, Bowen, L.J., gave countenance to the argument that though the Truck Act had been broken, yet the plaintiff had precluded herself by her own conduct, and by her long acquiescence in the payment to the fund of her contributions from recovering them. Great weight must, no doubt, be given to any decision of Lord Bowen's, but his judgment must be taken in connection with the facts before him, and which were entirely distinguishable from those of the present case.

For these reasons I am of opinion that the appeal should be allowed, and the order of the Recorder should be restored. As to the costs, we must remember that a great part of the costs has been incurred because the case was not presented in the fullest manner in the first instance; and, in my judgment, each party should bear his own costs in the Court below and in this Court.

FitzGibbon, L.J. The answer of the Queen's Bench to the question upon the special case stated by Madden, J., on appeal from the Recorder of Dublin, is in the following terms:—That the plaintiff is not entitled under the provisions of the Truck Acts to recover from the defendants the difference between the former and the reduced rate of payment. This difference, which was claimed in the action in which the Recorder gave a decree for £12, was the difference for a certain period between wages at the rate of 20s. per week which were paid to the plaintiff, and wages at the rate of 22s. per week, which he alleged to have been left unpaid under an agreement, the making of which was admitted, but which was alleged to be void under the Truck Acts. The special case purported to quote the impeached agreement. As so quoted, a question of construction arose whether, during the period covered by the claim, the plaintiff's wages had not been reduced to 20s. per week, and we were inclined to sustain the judgment of the Queen's Bench upon this ground. The discussion of the construction of the agreement as quoted occupied a large part of the judgments in the Court below. Fortunately or unfortunately, while the case was at argument here, Walker, L.J., called for the original agreement, and was naturally surprised at being unable to find in it the words which appeared in the case, and on which the argument had so far proceeded. We must now deal with the document itself, the parties having by amendment incorporated it with the special case.

The facts are as follows:—The plaintiff was for a considerable time employed by the defendants as a journeyman machinist, an occupation to which the case finds that the Truck Acts apply. The extension to the plaintiff's trade seems to be made by the Act of 1887. The plaintiff was employed at a weekly wage of 22s. and was one of the large staff who, in their several departments, some within and some outside the Truck Acts, constituted the staff of the Independent Company. That Company was compelled to reduce its expenditure. A committee was formed of the heads of the different departments, to consider the position and prospects of the Company with a view to reducing the expenditure and to enable the Company to carry on its business. The committee presented a report recommending various economies, and also recommending their fellow workers to agree to a graduated reduction of their remuneration. The committee drew up a statement which was to be handed to the head of each department, and the names of those agreeing to it were to be appended. This was afterwards done, and the rights of the parties must now be governed by the signed agreement alone. In order to effect a saving of expenditure the committee recommended, and by signing the document the plaintiff and the other signatories agreed, "that an engagement should be made by which the entire salaried staff should, during the then next six months (afterwards extended), take a certain payment of their salaries in shares of the Company." They agreed that the following proportions of their salaries should be set aside during the six months commencing Monday, November 19th, 1894 (which period was afterwards extended down to the commencement of the action), from all salaries of £1 and under, 5 per cent.; over £1 and under £2 10s., 10 per cent.; and over £2 10s., similarly graduated percentages up to 22 per cent. It was a term of the agreement that the entire staff should join in it, and that the services of any employee not agreeing to it should be dispensed with. The deductions from the salaries were treated as made on account of share capital, and were credited as subscriptions for ordinary shares. This has been done. No dividends have been earned or paid, but in the case of the plaintiff 10 per cent. upon 22s. per week has been credited to him as a subscription to the share capital of the Company, and it is to be assumed that an amount of such share capital equal to the amount of the deduction from his wages claimed in this action is now standing to his credit, under the impeached agreement, in the share ledger of the Company.

The first question is whether this agreement is within the prohibition of the Truck Act, 1 & 2 Will. IV., c. 37, which is an Act, in its title and preamble, to "prohibit the payment in certain trades of wages in goods or otherwise than in the current coin of the realm." Sec. 1 enacts that "in contracts hereinafter to be made for the performance by any artificer of any labour in any of the trades therein mentioned" (of which the plaintiff's trade is one) "the wages of such artificers shall be made payable in the current coin of this realm only and not otherwise, and that if in any such contract the whole or any part of such wages shall be made payable in any manner other than in the current coin aforesaid, such contracts shall be illegal, null, and void."

Upon the document signed by the plaintiff, I cannot doubt, as matter of construction, that his agreed salary or wages continued to be 22s. per week, and that the gist of the contract was that 20s. only should be paid in the current coin of the realm, and that the remaining 2s. per week, 10 per cent. of the whole, should be set aside, and if or so far as that 10 per cent. was paid at all, it was to be paid or satisfied in or by share capital of equal nominal amount but of uncertain value. I must hold that this was a contract to make that part of the wages payable in a manner other than in current coin, and therefore that it was illegal, null, and void.

The next question is whether this part of the wages can be recovered in this action. Sec. 3 enacts that the entire amount of the wages earned shall be actually paid to the artificer in the current coin of this realm and not otherwise, and that every payment made in respect of any such wages other than in the current coin aforesaid shall be illegal, null, and void.

If the allotment of the share capital be treated as a payment of wages, as I think it must be, this section makes it void. The shares being credited as fully paid up to the amount of the 10 per cent. upon the wages, and no dividends having been paid, there are no equities to be adjusted, no liabilities to be considered, and no account to be taken in respect of the credits given to the plaintiff in the share ledger. They are void, and it is not necessary to say anything more about them.

Sec. 4 enacts that every artificer within the Act shall be entitled to recover from his employer, in the manner by law provided for the recovery of servants' wages, or by any other lawful ways and means, so much of the wages earned by such artificer as shall not have been actually paid to him by such his employer in the current coin of this realm. Sec. 5 prohibits any set-off or reduction in any such action for wages, by reason or in respect of any goods, wares or merchandise received by the plaintiff on account of his wages. Sec. 25 includes in the definition of wages, any money or other thing contracted to be paid, delivered, or given as remuneration for any labour done or to be done. The Truck Act, 1896, legalises certain deductions, upon prescribed conditions, and prohibits deductions otherwise made; but neither do the prohibitions nor the permissions of that Act apply to the present case, nor can the limitation, Sec. 5, which deals with the recovery of sums deducted or paid contrary to that Act, be applied to this action. Under the provisions of the existing Acts, I can see no answer to the present action for any part of the amount claimed by the plaintiff which is unbarred by the Statutes of Limitation. By admission of the parties it is to be taken that the amount thus recoverable, if anything, is the amount of the Recorder's decree, i.e., £12, and if that sum is recoverable, as in our opinion it is, the case directs that the order of the Recorder shall be affirmed with costs, and it will be remitted to Madden, J., to have this done. Under the Civil Bills Acts the plaintiff will be entitled to the costs of the decree and affirmance.

Two other arguments were relied on. First, it was said that the plaintiff's right to recover was barred by acquiescence. Acquiescence is no bar to an action founded on the illegality of the thing acquiesced in. In equity, acquiescence cannot form a defence unless there has been some conduct, or change of circumstances on the part of one or other or both of the parties, making it in equity fraudulent for the plaintiff to rely upon his legal right, or upon the illegality of any terms to which he has purported unlawfully to agree. The defence of acquiescence here fails both at law and in equity. The authority chiefly relied upon to sustain it was the judgment of Bowen, L.J., in Hewlett v. Allen (1); but the facts in that case entirely distinguish it from the present, even if the judgment for the defendants is assumed to be validly rested upon acquiescence. The deductions from the wages in that case were paid over to a sick and accident club, in the benefits of which all the employees of the defendant's firm participated. That fund was created for the benefit of the plaintiff herself and of others, and it was held by the Court of Appeal that the deductions from the plaintiff's wages had been disposed of with her consent in a manner which she could not impugn after the lapse of years. The benefit fund had been honestly administered; it was a trust fund held upon a trust which was not illegal, though the fund was made up of moneys collected from persons who had made illegal agreements to subscribe to it. It was assumed that the plaintiff's contributions had been long since appropriated to the purposes for which she made them, therefore she was held to have precluded herself by conduct and acquiescence from recalling those contributions. That case affords no authority against the repudiation by the plaintiff in the present case of the illegal contract to give him scrip instead of cash, both scrip and cash being still in the hands, or under the control, of the original parties to the illegal agreement, and there being now nothing which equity can treat as fraudulent, or which requires to be taken into account if the parties are held to their legal rights, or if their illegal contract and acts are treated as null and void.

The House of Lords affirmed the decision in Hewlett v. Allen (2) upon the simple ground—wholly distinct from acquiescence—that the entire amount of the wages payable to the appellant had been actually paid to her as much as if the current coin of the realm had been placed in her hands, because the amount of the deductions was paid by the employer at her request into the fund to which she authorised their being contributed.

The last point made for the defendants was that the plaintiff could not rely upon the illegality of his agreement nor recover the deductions, because the staff of the defendant Company who joined in the agreement included a number of persons who were not artificers within the Truck Acts, and it was a part of the agreement that any employee, whether within the Truck Acts or not, who declined to join in the arrangement should be dismissed.

This argument might require consideration if any liability had been created or if any rights had arisen which were now at issue between one employee and another, or among the employees inter se, or if any consideration for the agreement as between the plaintiff and the defendant Company could be shown to have moved to or from any third party. But as the case stands the argument amounts only to this—the plaintiff made an illegal agreement, being an artificer under the Truck Acts, and a number of other people who were not within the Truck Acts made agreements in the same terms. The consequences of the illegality of the plaintiff's agreement cannot be affected by that circumstance.

I will add that I am not impressed by the observations reflecting upon the moral aspect of the plaintiff's repudiation of his agreement. Such repudiation is involved in every avoidance of an illegal agreement by a party who has purported to bind himself by it. If the plaintiff was held bound by this agreement, every Limited Liability Company that got into difficulties—indeed whether it was in difficulties or not—could put pressure upon the artificers whom it employed to take part of their wages in credits against capital, and if the Truck Acst are justifiable at all, which it is not for us to question, such a mode of payment would not only be within the purview of those Acts, but might also open the door to mischief, and even to fraud, under the Limited Liability Acts.

The question raised before Judge Madden would possibly have been decided by him, if he had seen the agreement. The case could not have been stated in the terms in which it was, nor could the arguments in the Queen's Bench have run the course they did, if the agreement had been before Madden, J., or the Queen's Bench. Both parties must be held equally responsible for all this, and they must abide their own costs of and incidental to the appeal, both here and below.

Walker, L.J. I concur with the other members of the Court. I have read the judgment of FitzGibbon, L.J., in which I agree. If the argument of the case in this Court had proceeded on the same facts that were before the Queen's Bench, the result might have been different. But we have had the original agreement between the plaintiff and defendants produced before us, and that document makes the case assume a different aspect.

(1) [1892] 2 Q. B. 662. (2) [1894] A. C. 383.

As to acquiescence, I do not think that Hewlett v. Allen (1) applies to the present case. There there was a payment in current coin to a sick and accident club, and the House of Lords held that was the same as a payment to the person employed. The fact that others were brought in and bound by the agreement does not, in my opinion, furnish an answer to the plaintiff's claim, when the agreement itself is illegal in asking the workmen to take payment otherwise than in current coin of the realm.

Holmes, L.J. The amendment made in the case stated during the hearing of this appeal has deprived the respondent of his strongest arguments, and has taken away the grounds upon which, up to the time when the error in the case was discovered, I was disposed to affirm the decision of the Divisional Court.

While agreeing with the view that the arrangement made between the defendant Company and its servants was not within the mischief contemplated by the Legislature in the enactment of the Truck Acts, and while recognising the immeritorious character of the plaintiff's demand, I am unable to give any construction but one to the very plain language of the document which forms the foundation of the case. It runs as follows :—"In addition to this, the Committee think it well that an arrangement should be made by which the entire salaried staff should during the next six months take a certain proportion of their salaries in shares of the Company. They agreed for themselves, and decided to recommend to their fellow-workers that the following proportions of the salaries should be set aside during the six months," etc. The proportions are then stated, and the proposal is that such proportions should be credited as subscriptions to ordinary shares in the Company. Is it not clear from this that the salaries were to remain what they had been before —in the plaintiff's case 22s. a week ; but that for the future the workmen were to receive only part of them in cash, and that the remainder should be credited in the books of the Company as against ordinary shares, for which the workmen were to receive scrip certificates ? I turn now to the Truck Act of 1831, upon which as extended to Ireland by the Act of 1887 this case is, I think, to be determined. It is unnecessary to have recourse to the definition section—the twenty-fifth—to show that the plaintiff's wages were 22s. a week. Without reference to that section it is clear from the terms of the document that the wages were 22s. subject to a condition that portion thereof should be discharged otherwise than in current coin of the realm. Payment by an entry in a ledger and the delivery of a scrip certificate is not payment in any kind of coin. But the first section of the Act of 1831 declares that, if in a contract of hiring within the Act, the whole or any part of the wages shall be made payable in any manner other than in current coin, such contract shall be illegal, null, and void.

Up to this point there is, I think, no room for doubt ; but there is the further question—can the unpaid portion of the wages be now recovered ? The contract having been declared illegal, null, and void in the first section, the third section declares that every payment made to the workman by the delivery to him of goods or otherwise than in current coin except as afterwards mentioned shall also be illegal, null, and void ; while the fourth section gives the workman the right to recover so much of his wages as shall not have been paid to him in current coin.

In the present case no payment in any sense in which payment can be understood has been made by the defendants either to the workman or to anyone else in respect of the portion of his wages sued for, nor can the defendants rely on any set-off in the legal sense of that term. The defendants can only show an entry in a book, the delivery of a scrip certificate, and an agreement to accept the same in part discharge. But the contract is made illegal by the first section ; and if it were possible to regard the rest of the transaction as a payment, it is made illegal by the third. Payment by a bank-note is a good deal more substantial than payment by a credit entry and a scrip certificate ; and yet a contract for payment, or even actual payment thereby, is only saved from illegality by the eighth section. Therefore, I fail to see what defence in the nature of payment, set-off, or accord and satisfaction, is open to the defendants. Something may be learned by contrasting this case with Hewlett v. Allen (2). There it was a term of the hiring that the workman should pay a weekly subscription to a sick and benefit society, proportionate to his weekly wages, which sum had been regularly paid out of the wages by the employers to the treasurer of the fund and applied in accordance with the trusts attached thereto. It was held by the House of Lords that the subscription to the society, having been paid at the instance of the workman, was a payment to the person employed, as much as if the current coin had been placed in his own hands ; and the only difficulty that suggested itself to some of the peers arose under the second section of the statute, which enacted that if in any contract of hiring, any provision should be made directly or indirectly respecting the place where, or the manner in which, or the person or persons with whom the whole or part of the wages should be laid out or expended, such contract should be illegal, null, and void. Some of the peers held that the contract was not within this section, while others were of opinion that even if it was, it was the contract, not the payment, that was made illegal. But nothing then determined touches the present case, where there was no payment to any person of the portion of the wages sued for. In the Court of Appeal, Hewlett v. Allen (2), was decided on the ground of acquiescence ; but the reasoning of the judgment of Bowen, L.J., was not adopted by the House of Lords, and, moreover, it would not apply to the present case. The acquiescence he relied on was acquiescence in the payment of the contributions and in the expenditure of the fund on the objects of the society. There is nothing similar or parallel to this in the present case. It is not alleged that the defendants lost, or the plaintiff gained, anything by the scrip certificate, which is, in my opinion, as illegal and void as the rest of the transaction.

It was suggested in the Divisional Court that the fact that the arrangement was joined in by servants of the defendant Company, not within the Truck Acts, makes it inequitable for the plaintiff to take advantage of the provisions of those statutes. I am unable to understand how this can be made a legal ground of defence. In the first place I do not see how these servants have been prejudiced by what has happened. They entered into a legal contract, and they have received all the payments to which they were entitled under it. They cannot recover more for the past ; and if they are now dissatisfied with the arrangement, or think that the defendants will be unable to carry it out in the future, they can leave the employment. In the second place,

(1) [1892] 2 Q. B. 662 ; [1894] A. C. 383. (2) [1892] 2 Q. B. 662.

I am of opinion that if on the grounds of public policy a certain kind of transaction is declared illegal in the interests of a particular class, and special rights are given to the members of such class as the result of such illegality, these rights cannot be defeated by reason of other persons having been parties to the arrangement which constituted the illegality.

The only other defence put forward is that the fifth section of the Truck Act, 1896, requires proceedings thereunder to be commenced within six months from the date of the deduction ; but I agree with the Divisional Court in holding that this provision is confined to the special deductions by or payments to the employer that are prohibited by that statute, and has no application to the present case.

Employer and workman.—Contract for deductions in respect of fines.—Specifications of acts or omissions in respect of which fine may be imposed.—Truck Act, 1896 (59 & 60 Vict., c. 44), Sec. 1.

By Sec. 1, Sub-sec. 1, of the Truck Act, 1896, an employer may not contract with a workman for any deduction from wages in respect of fines unless (inter alia) "the contract specified the acts or omissions in respect of which the fine may be imposed."

One of the rules of a factory provided that "all workers shall observe good order and decorum while in the factory," and imposed a fine of 6*d. or less upon any worker guilty of an infringement of the rule :—*

Held, that the rule, although not specifying the particular acts or omissions amounting to such a breach of good order or decorum as to justify the infliction of a fine, was a sufficient compliance with the requirements of the section.

Case stated by justices for the city and county of Bristol.

The respondents had been summoned to answer the information and complaint of the appellant, alleging that they, being employers, within the Truck Act, 1896, unlawfully made a contract with a workman for a deduction for or in respect of a fine of 6d. or less from the sum contracted to be paid by them to the workman, contrary to Sec. 1, Sub-sec. 1 of that Act, in that the contract did not specify the acts or omissions in respect of which the fine might be imposed, and the fine imposed under the contract was not in respect of some act or omission which caused, or was likely to cause, damage or loss to the employers, or interruption or hindrance to their business, whereby they were liable to a penalty not exceeding £10.

The appellant was an inspector of factories, and the respondents were corset manufacturers, occupying works which were a factory within the meaning of the Factory and Workshop Acts, 1878 to 1895. The terms of the contract between the respondents and the employees were contained in a set of rules among which was the following provision : " All workers shall observe good order and decorum while in the factory, and shall not do anything which may interfere with the proper and orderly conduct of the business thereof, or of any department thereof ; and shall in all respects obey the lawful commands of the general manager, forewoman, or superintendent of their respective departments. A fine of 6d. (or less at the discretion of the manager) shall be paid by each worker who shall be guilty of any infringement of this rule." A machinist, named Helen Robbins (who was a workman within the meaning of the Act) was employed by the respondents under a contract upon the terms contained in the rules.

The respondents granted to their employees the privilege of having their dinners in the workroom of the factory between 1 and 2 p.m., but the employees were not obliged to have their dinners there, and could dine elsewhere if they wished. The rules of the factory were in force during the dinner hour as well as at other times, and this was known to the employees. One day in November, during the dinner hour, Miss Knight, who was then in charge of the factory, and whose room was immediately underneath that in which the employees were having dinner, heard a considerable noise and commotion going on in that room, and on going there discovered Robbins playing a small harp, to the music of which several girls were dancing, singing, and clapping their hands. Miss Knight, in the course of her duty, reported this disorder, and Robbins and some others were fined 2d. each. Robbins stated at the hearing that she had not been told that it was wrong to dance and sing during the dinner hour, and that she was not aware that there was any harm in it ; but it was proved that a copy of the rules was posted in that workroom and other copies at other places in the factory, and Robbins admitted that she and the other girls would not have done what they did if Miss Knight had been present.

It was proved before the justices that the disorder and dancing caused considerable dust, and that dust would cause injury to the machines at which the employees worked as well as to the material served out to them to work upon. It was further proved that no fines were deducted from the wages of the employees, but a fine-book was kept, and once a week the employees were asked to pay such fines after they had received their wages in full, and a receipt was given for the fine, the one given to Robbins being as follows :—" The sum of 2d. has this day been received from Robbins in respect of a fine for making noise during dinner hour."

The appellant contended (a) that the rule did not specify the acts or omissions in respect of which a fine might be imposed ; and (b) that the fine imposed under the rule was not in respect of some act or omission within the meaning of Sec. 1, Sub-sec. 1 of the Truck Act, 1896.

The respondents contended that the words of the rule sufficiently specified the acts and omissions in respect of which a fine might be imposed, and that the fine inflicted was in respect of an act which caused, or was likely to cause, damage or loss to the respondents, or interruption or hindrance to their business.

The justices found as a fact upon the evidence that good order and decorum were not observed, and that dancing and disorder were likely to cause damage or loss to the respondents and injury to the discipline necessary to be enforced in a factory of that description. They also found as a fact that the rule (which was the only one in dispute before them) constituted a reasonable contract between the respondents and their employees for securing good order and decorum in the factory, and complied with Sec. 1 Sub-sec. (1), (b) and (c), of the Act, and they accordingly dismissed the information. The question for the opinion of the Court was whether on the facts stated the justices came to a right conclusion.

Lord Alverstone, C. J. This case is not free from difficulty, but I cannot see my way to hold that the decision of the justices was wrong. The two questions which arise for our consideration are: first, whether the rule is valid, and secondly, whether the breach was such as to justify the infliction of a fine. I do not dissent from the view of the Attorney-General as to the conditions which must be present in order to justify the infliction of a fine; there must be a contract between the employer and the workman complying with the requirements of Sec. 1, Sub-sec. (1) (a), (b), (c), and (d) of the Act; and, further, under Sub-sec. (2), the deduction must be in accordance with the contract, and particulars must be supplied to the workman.

In the present case the justices found that there was during the dinner hour disorder in this particular room in the factory, that to the knowledge of the employees the rules were in force in the factory in the dinner hour, and that the disorder was reported by the clerk who was then in charge. We have been pressed with the argument that a rule which provides that "all workers shall observe good order and decorum while in the factory" is not a sufficient specification of the "acts and omissions in respect of which the fine may be imposed." But there are many kinds of business, and the expression "good order and decorum" must be interpreted with reference to the requirements of the particular business, and it would be going too far to say that the language of the rule is necessarily too general. In a sense of course it does not specify the particular acts and omissions amounting to such a breach of good order or decorum as to justify the infliction of a fine, but I think it a sufficient compliance with the requirements of the Truck Act, 1896, to say that a fine may be inflicted if the employee does not observe good order and decorum while in the factory.

Then it was contended by the Attorney-General that there was no evidence of anything done by the girl Robbins which could fairly be held to amount to non-observance of the rule; I think, however, that the facts found by the justices prevent this point being raised. It is clearly found that some of the girls were dancing to the tune she was playing on the harp, and that such conduct was not an observance of good order and decorum, and that it was likely to cause injury, by reason of the dust raised, both to the machinery and the materials. We cannot take the isolated case of the girl who played the music and consider it by itself apart from the other circumstances, and say that it was not part of the disorder. We must look at the whole of the circumstances, and if the rule is in accordance with the requirements of the statute we cannot say that there was no evidence of a breach of good order and decorum, having regard to all the attendant facts. I think, also, that we cannot entirely shut out of consideration the fact that the employees were allowed to have their meals in the workroom, where there were much valuable machinery and materials; some regard must be had to the place where the breach of good order and decorum took place. For these reasons I am of opinion that this appeal must be dismissed.

Lawrence, J. I am of the same opinion.

Appeal dismissed.

JONES v. WASLEY.

[Times Law Reports XVIII. 418. March, 1902.]

Master and Servant—Wages—Payment otherwise than in coin—Written agreement—Verbal arrangement—Admissibility—Truck Act, 1831 (1 and 2 Will. IV., c. 37), ss. 1, 25.

A workman was engaged under an agreement in writing at a fixed rate of wages per week. There was also a verbal arrangement entered into at the same time under which, as the justices found, the workman was to be supplied with a certain quantity of cider each day in part payment of wages. On an information for an offence under the Truck Act, 1831:—

Held, that the justices were entitled to receive evidence of the verbal arrangement, and to find that an offence had been committed.

This was a case stated by the justices of the peace for the county of Worcester for the opinion of the High Court on a point of law. The appellant, Mrs. E. Jones, a farmer at Grimley, was charged, on an information preferred by the respondent, with having committed an offence under the Truck Acts, 1831 to 1896, by unlawfully paying to a labourer named Cooper, in respect of his employment by the appellant, certain wages otherwise than in the current coin of the realm. The justices convicted the appellant, subject to this special case, and imposed a fine of £5 and costs.

The following facts were set out in the special case:—About March, 1899, William Cooper, a wagoner, in consequence of an advertisement in a newspaper, applied to the appellant for a situation. He saw the appellant's son, and it was arranged that he should serve as wagoner at 14s. a week, with a cottage and garden rent free. It was alleged by Cooper before the justices that there was also an agreement that he was to receive three quarts of cider a day. This was denied by the appellant's son. A written agreement was drawn up but, it having been lost, secondary evidence of its contents was given, and it was admitted that it contained all the terms above mentioned, except that with regard to the cider. Cooper would not swear that cider was mentioned in the agreement, but stated that, if not, there was a verbal agreement relating to it at the same interview. On two subsequent occasions, when Cooper was proposing to leave the appellant's employment, fresh written agreements were entered into, in which he agreed to remain at a higher rate of wages; and with regard to each of these agreements there was a conflict of testimony as to whether any verbal arrangement had been made as to Cooper receiving a specified quantity of cider a day, the appellant's son denying that such was the case, and Cooper stating that the arrangement was that things were to go on as before. In June, 1901, Cooper having been dismissed from the appellant's service, sued her before the petty sessional Court for wages due, and also for 6s. 8d. on account of cider. He obtained an order for the amount claimed as wages, but the amount claimed for cider was disallowed on the ground that for the purposes of the case the written agreement was conclusive as to what the terms of the agreement were. Evidence was given before the magistrates to the effect that most of the workmen employed on the appellant's farm were supplied with cider, but that those who did not have it did not receive any additional wages in consequence; and the appellant contended that she could have discontinued the supply at any time. It was also proved that Cooper usually had three quarts of cider a day, but that if he did not take his allowance he received no equivalent in money or otherwise. In these circumstances the justices found that the cider supplied to Cooper between the dates mentioned in the information was supplied in part payment of wages under a verbal arrangement or understanding existing between the parties at the time when the last written agreement between the parties was entered into, and convicted the appellant. The question for the opinion of the Court was whether they were right in receiving and acting upon evidence of a verbal arrangement to supply cider in part payment of wages, and in allowing such evidence to prevail in spite of the existence of a written agreement which was admittedly not modified by any subsequent arrangement, verbal or other, and which, whilst containing other terms in relation to the employment of Cooper, was wholly silent on the subject of cider.

The Court, without calling on counsel for the respondent, dismissed the appeal.

The Lord Chief Justice, in giving judgment, said it was contended on behalf of the appellant that where there was a written contract as to wages to be paid you ought not to look at a verbal arrangement made between the parties, even if it was found by the magistrates to be an undertaking to supply something other than money in payment of wages. If that contention was to prevail it would reduce the concluding words of Sec. 25 of the Act of 1831 to a practical nullity, because there might be many cases in which parties would enter into a perfectly proper contract in writing to pay wages in current coin of the realm, and then defeat the object of the statute by a verbal agreement. It was in order to get over this difficulty that the wide provision in Sec. 25 was introduced. A real gift, however, made by an employer out of kindness to his servants was not to be treated as a payment of wages. He, therefore, came to the conclusion that the evidence was properly received by the magistrates, and the appeal must be dismissed.

Mr. Justice Darling and Mr. Justice Channell concurred.

OWNER v. HOOPER.

This was a case stated by the justices for the county of Gloucester, and raised the question whether the deduction of a sum for the insurance of a master against liability for injury to workmen can be held to be a payment of wages otherwise than in current coin of the realm contrary to Sec. 3 of the Truck Act, 1831.

It appeared that on March 27th, 1903, the appellant, who is an inspector of factories, supported before the justices a summons issued upon his information against the respondent, who is a walking-stick and umbrella manufacturer, charging him with unlawfully making a payment declared illegal by Sec. 3 of the Truck Act, 1831, by failing to pay to one George Gardiner in current coin of the realm the entire amount of wages earned by him. The facts proved were as follows:—For several years since the passing of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, the respondent had been in the habit of paying his workpeople fortnightly in full; but at the time of the payment a slip of paper was handed to each workman, on which was written a sum of money equal to 2d. in the pound on the amount of wages paid. The workmen thereupon handed the sum noted in the slip to the respondent's cashier. It was proved that the workpeople understood that this payment was to provide for insurance premiums paid by him to cover his own liability under the Workmen's Compensation Act. It appeared that the respondent made a profit by the transaction, paying for insurance at the rate of 8s. per £100 of wages and deducting from the wages at the rate of 16s. 8d. In the case of George Gardiner £2 5s. was paid and 4½d. returned. The magistrates held that, although the case might fall within Sec. 3 of the Truck Act, 1896 (as to which they were not called upon to express an opinion), the transaction did not constitute a payment of a part of the wages due otherwise than in coin of the realm under Sec. 3 of the Truck Act, 1831. Accordingly they dismissed the summons.

The Lord Chief Justice said that, whether the respondent was entitled to act as he did or not, it could not be said that he violated Sec. 3 of the Truck Act, 1831, by making any payment of wages otherwise than in cash. The insurance was made by him for his own benefit, to protect him against his own liability, and did not represent any payment made to the workmen in lieu of cash. The appeal must be dismissed.

Mr. Justice Wills concurred.

Mr. Justice Channell. I agree. It is clear that the wages have not been paid otherwise than in cash. Either they have been paid in cash or not at all.

POPLAR UNION v. MARTIN.

[July, 1904. L.T. XCI. 550.]

Poor Law—Pauper—Wilfully refusing or neglecting to maintain himself—Vagrancy Act, 1824 (5 Geo. IV., c. 83), s. 3.

In considering whether or not a person being able wholly or in part to maintain himself has wilfully refused and neglected so to do within Sec. 3 of the Vagrancy Act, 1824, because he has refused work outside the workhouse for which he would receive board and lodging and a small weekly wage, the Court must consider the conditions upon which the work has been offered, and whether the refusal to accept such work or such conditions was reasonable or not.

Case stated on an information charging the respondent for that he being a person able wholly or in part to maintain himself by work or other means did wilfully refuse or neglect so to do, by which refusal or neglect he became chargeable to the common fund of the Poplar Union.

The facts were as follows :—

The respondent was an able-bodied man of thirty-nine years of age, and on February 23rd, 1904, was admitted to the Poplar Workhouse, and on April 13th following he and ten other pauper inmates were taken by the labour master to the farm colony established by William Booth at Hadleigh, in Essex, for the reception and employment of destitute men.

Under the terms of an agreement between the appellants and William Booth the respondent could have started work at the colony on probation, receiving as remuneration his food and lodging free and 6d. a week in the nature of pocket money, and if the respondent had after two or three weeks been employed upon brick work he could have earned 4½d. a yard for digging clay, at which rate of pay it is possible for some men to earn 30s. a week. He was told to go to work in the brickfield at the colony. It was not possible to do more than guess at the remuneration which he might have earned later on.

These terms were explained to the respondent, and he was asked to sign an undertaking to conform to the rules of the colony, but he refused to work upon the terms or to sign such undertaking, and left the colony.

On April 18th, 1904, the respondent returned to the Poplar Workhouse, and again became chargeable on the rates.

It was contended on behalf of the appellants that the respondent had rendered himself liable to conviction as an idle and disorderly person under Sec. 3 of 5 Geo. IV., c. 83.

The magistrate decided against this contention on the ground that the respondent could not legally be required to work for anyone on the terms offered, which as to the money wages were for a time no wages at all, and as to the food, etc., a violation of the Truck Acts. He was of opinion that the words of the section above referred to ought to be construed with reasonable limitations and reasonable regard to the class of work to which the person charged had been accustomed, and also to the rate of wages ordinarily to be earned by persons engaged in similar employment, and he therefore held that the respondent had not been proved to be a person able wholly or in part to maintain himself. The facts proved did, indeed, bring him within the literal meaning of the words of the statute, but the consequences of construing the statute literally seemed to him to be such that a limited interpretation must be put upon the statute.

He appended some of the possible consequences which influenced his decision, inasmuch as the respondent would not be represented on the hearing of this case :

(a) Any employer of labour outside the workhouse could under threat of proceedings under this statute compel persons who had entered the workhouse to work for him at merely nominal wages or even for half their food, inasmuch as the remuneration offered, however small, must be sufficient to maintain the person " in part."

(b) If men are sent outside the workhouse to work for any employer on any work, no matter how unsuitable to them, they would be liable to conviction under this statute as idle and disorderly on refusing or neglecting to do such work, whereas in the workhouse they can only be convicted for refusing to work if the work is such as is suited to their age, strength, and capacity. They have also in the workhouse the benefit of the regulations laid down by the Local Government Board, whereas outside the workhouse these cannot be applied.

(c) A man to whom employment might be offered abroad or in a colony might similarly be liable on refusal to conviction under this statute.

The question on which the opinion of the Court was desired was whether the magistrate upon the above-mentioned statement of facts came to a correct determination and decision in point of law, or whether he ought to have convicted the respondent and dealt with him as an idle and disorderly person under Sec. 3 of 5 Geo. IV., c. 83.

Lord Alverstone, C.J. If the only course open to us had been that we must direct a conviction in this case, I certainly should have had the greatest possible difficulty in dealing with it. Speaking only for myself I cannot think that it is sufficient to satisfy the obligation of a person able to maintain himself by work or other means wilfully refusing and neglecting so to do wholly or in part to prove somebody has offered him some kind of work on some terms which he is not willing to accept, without the magistrate going on to consider whether or not the refusal under the circumstances to take the terms that were offered to him was sufficient evidence to show that his refusal was unreasonable. I do not want to criticise the learned magistrate's reasons, but I think certainly some of them with regard to the opportunity that would be given to persons outside to stand and compel labourers to come and work for them at certain terms seem rather far fetched. On the other hand, if under the words "ought to be construed with reasonable limitations and reasonable regard to the class of work to which the person charged had been accustomed and so to the rate of wages ordinarily to be earned," if he has considered those matters solely in connection with the refusal by the man to accept those terms, not being unreasonable—in other words, it not being a wilful refusal because the terms imposed on him were not fair terms—then I think those are considerations he may have in his mind in dealing with the particular question I have indicated. I think, therefore, the case must go back to the magistrate in order to decide whether or not there has been a wilful refusal or neglect on the part of this man to maintain himself wholly or in part. He must consider whether or not, under those circumstances, the offer made to such a man is an offer the refusal of which shows a wilful determination not to maintain himself in part. I should like to say that I entirely concur in what my brother Phillimore has said, that, if the condition of work is that a man must bind himself for a definite time so that he would not be able to go away and take work elsewhere, or that he should have to submit himself to matters that a man may properly take objection to, those should be regarded with regard to the question of whether there has been wilful neglect to maintain. The case must go back to the magistrate to rehear with this direction. If necessary, the prosecution can bring further evidence before him ; but I certainly do not think that the magistrate should have ordered a conviction upon the evidence, it being only that he would not accept the Salvation Army's terms.

Kennedy, J. I am of the same opinion, and I quite share my Lord's views of the impossibility of convicting upon the evidence before us. It seems to me, with the greatest respect to the learned magistrate, the statute has not imposed any very great difficulty upon those who, like the learned magistrate, have great experience in these matters of life in saying that the test is to be, Can the man, being able wholly or in part to maintain himself, be said wilfully to have refused or neglected to do so ? That is the condition of conviction. There are many circumstances—it would be absurd to try to enumerate even the majority of them—which, to my mind, would justify a magistrate, although the man is able-bodied, in saying, "I refuse to convict this man of wilfully refusing or wilfully neglecting." One of them, I think, would be, speaking for myself —and I understand my Lord takes entirely the same view—if a man, being put in the pinch of a particular necessity to ask for poor relief, was met by an alternative of signing an agreement of service for any length of period at a rate of wage which it might be possible to say would help to maintain him and not charge the ratepayers with his keep, but which would bind him to serve, possibly at an uncongenial trade and occupation, for an indefinite time and lose chances of bettering himself ; if a man declines under those circumstances to sign such an agreement, if I were the magistrate I should be slow to say he was wilfully refusing or neglecting. In the same way, if it were a condition of the employment that he should go to religious or other services to which by conscience he was averse, I should think it would be very good grounds indeed for saying, "I decline to convict you if the only opportunity of work shown you is work under those conditions." Thirdly, suppose a man whose ordinary occupation had been something of delicate manual industry had, by stress of that industry, or otherwise, been obliged to come on the rates ; if to that man was offered some employment which would practically destroy, or, at any rate, practically injure, his opportunity of earning his livelihood in the skilled industry to which he was accustomed—which, in fact, would ruin his chances for the future—I think that is a matter again that might properly be considered by the magistrate. With great respect, I should not, as stated by him, feel myself pressed by the suggestion that the work was merely novel work—work to which he had not been accustomed—nor even by the suggestion that the rate of wages was less than that ordinarily earned by persons in similar employment. As Lindley, M.R., pointed out in Attorney-General v. Merthyr Tydvil Union (82 L.T. Rep. 662), which was cited by the learned counsel who has appeared before us, it is not a case entirely between a man and his own interest in getting the same wage as the other persons—the man must be regarded as a person who is coming upon the rest of the folks in the form of the ratepayers to support him, and therefore mere novelty and mere getting a low wage in itself I should be slow to consider circumstances which would prevent my saying that the refusal to accept the work was a wilful refusal within the statute. It seems to me the magistrate ought to consider all the circumstances, and if you look at some of the reasons given for the result by the learned magistrate, and if you read the statute, as it seems to me it ought to be read, as asking the magistrate to say on the facts, Did this man wilfully neglect or refuse? I cannot conceive how any consequence such as is suggested could follow, that a man, being sent to work outside the workhouse, no matter how unsuitable the work might be, would be liable to conviction under the statute if he refused to do such work. If the work from any reason, either inherent in the work itself or in its condition, was work which a man might reasonably refuse, you could not say he was wilfully refusing so that the magistrate would be entitled to convict. As it is, I am not satisfied that the magistrate has considered the matter in the plain and simple aspect, but I think he has brought in some considerations which I should not treat as proper considerations, or as decisive of this matter against a conviction.

Phillimore, J. I am of the same opinion. What the magistrate had to determine was whether this man wilfully neglected or refused to maintain himself. The fact that he was offered work by which he could have earned food and shelter and some small amount of money besides is not enough proof that he has refused to maintain himself, because the work may have been offered on unreasonable terms. But, if the work is offered on reasonable terms, his refusal to accept it may have been very good evidence on which a magistrate can hold that it is a refusal to maintain himself wholly or in part. I do not want to go into unnecessary details fettering the magistrate, but it would seem to me that to a person in the condition of a pauper in the charge of the parish any remuneration which would give that man shelter and food and the possibility of renewing his clothes when worn out, if not coupled with extraneous objectionable terms, would be work offered on reasonable terms. Any extraneous objection to the terms, such as undue length of tenure, rigorous conditions of conduct, or anything of that kind, might be very good ground on which the magistrate could find the terms offered were unreasonable. Finally, I should like to say (we have only heard the case out upon one side) that I have been utterly unable to see for myself how the terms offered to the respondent in this case could be said to be a violation of the Truck Act.

Case remitted.

SQUIRE v. MIDLAND LACE CO.

[April, 1905. 2 K.B. 448.]

Master and Servant—Wages—Deductions in respect of Damaged Goods—"Workman"—Employers and Workmen Act, 1875 (38 and 39 Vict. c., 90), S. 10; Truck Act, 1896 (59 and 60 Vict., c. 44), S. 2.

The respondents, a firm of lacemakers whose premises were a factory within the meaning of the Factory and Workshop Act, 1901, were in the habit in common with other lacemakers of handing finished lace after its removal from the machines to women called "clippers" for the purpose of having superfluous threads and material removed. The clippers, who were not employed exclusively by any one firm, undertook to get lace clipped, and applied to the manufacturers for lace which they took home with them for that purpose. The lacemakers had no control over the clippers, who might and often did employ others to assist them in the work; the clippers might execute the work themselves or give it to others to execute, or might return it unexecuted. The clippers were responsible in case of the non-return of the lace, and were paid at the end of each week according to the work done; they were required to pay for damage done to the lace in clipping.

Lace was handed by the respondents to two clippers; one was an outsider who had never worked in the respondents' factory, and did the clipping at home herself; the other was employed daily in the factory, and after it was closed at night she occasionally took the work home to do, and was assisted by her daughter. The lace handed to the two clippers having been damaged, a sum of 6d. was in each case deducted from the amount due to them at the end of the week; the conditions of Sec. 2 of the Truck Act, 1896, as to the making of deductions in respect of damaged goods were not complied with, and the deductions were illegally made if the clippers were workwomen within the Act:—

Held, that, as the clippers were not bound by the terms of their contracts to execute the work or any part of it themselves, they were not workwomen within the meaning of Sec. 10 of the Employers and Workmen Act, 1875, and, therefore, were not entitled to the protection of Sec. 2 of the Truck Act, 1896.

Case stated by justices for the city of Nottingham.

Two summonses had been issued against the respondents. The first summons charged that on June 13th, 1904, being the occupiers of a certain factory within the meaning of the Factory and Workshop Act, 1901, and being employers within the Truck Act, 1896, they did unlawfully make a deduction from the sum contracted to be paid to a "workman," to wit, Mrs. Annie Lizzie Flinders, in that the deduction was not made in pursuance of such a contract as is required by Sec. 2, Sub-sec. 1, of that Act. The second summons charged a like offence in like terms on June 23rd, 1904, as to Mrs. Amy Lamb. At the hearing the following facts were admitted or proved.

The appellant was one of His Majesty's inspectors of factories; the respondents were lace manufacturers and occupiers of a factory within the meaning of the Factory and Workshop Act, 1901, and would have been employers within the meaning of the Truck Act, 1896, if the last-mentioned Act had applied under the particular circumstances of the cases. After lace has been removed from the machines it has to go through the process of being clipped—that is, superfluous threads and material have to be removed. In the City of Nottingham there are a large number of women known as "clippers," who carry on the business of clipping, undertake to get laces clipped, and with that intent apply to the manufacturers for lace and take it home to be clipped. Clippers are not employed exclusively by any one firm or for any definite time, but are independent, and may and do take laces from different firms. They may and do employ other persons to assist them, the firms having no control whatsoever over them. Clippers may refuse to take work, and, having taken it, may execute it themselves or give it to other persons to execute, or may return it unexecuted and the manufacturers may refuse to give them work as they please. Clippers are responsible in case of non-return of the lace. They are paid at the end of each week, when the account is made up according to the amount of work done. The lace is examined, and if any damage has been done to it the clipper is required to pay damage in respect of it. This course of business has been in vogue in Nottingham for considerably over twenty-five years, and clippers are generally well aware of it.

Annie Lizzie Flinders sought to obtain lace for clipping from the respondents, and some was handed to her. She took it home, and subsequently returned it clipped but damaged; and on June 13th, 1904, a sum of 6d. was deducted from the amount due to her for clipping. The lace was given out to her only as an outworker. She had never worked in the respondents' factory, and she did the clipping at home herself.

Amy Lamb, under similar circumstances obtained laces from the respondents and returned them damaged; and on June 23rd, 1904, the sum of 6d. was deducted for damages in respect thereof from the amount due to her. She had been employed daily in the respondents' factory for more than a year, and occasionally after the factory closed at night she took work home to do. She knew that her home work was not considered as part of her work at the factory, and also that deductions were made from her wages for damaged goods. Her daughter assisted her in the clipping, and did part of the damage in respect of which the particular deduction was made.

It was contended for the respondents that the appellant had failed to prove in both cases any contract of service; that the term wages had been wrongly used, and the payments were simply money for work done; that there was no contract to execute the work personally, and that neither Mrs. Flinders nor Mrs. Lamb was a "workman" within the definition in Sec. 10 of the Employers and Workman Act, 1875.

The justices were of opinion that neither Mrs. Flinders nor Mrs. Lamb was a "workman" within the meaning of the Truck Acts, and dismissed both summonses.

The question of law for the opinion of the Court was whether upon the facts the determination of the justices in either or both of the cases was right.

Kennedy, J.* This is an appeal on a case stated by two of the justices of Nottingham, against their dismissal of a summons against the respondents for an alleged unlawful deduction from the sum contracted to be paid by the respondents to a workwoman, Mrs. Annie Lizzie Flinders, contrary to the provisions of the Truck Act, 1896, Sec. 2, Sub-sec. 1, and against their dismissal of a like summons in the case of another workwoman, Mrs. Amy Lamb. The justices were of opinion that neither Mrs. Annie Lizzie Flinders in the one case nor Mrs. Amy Lamb in the other case, was a workwoman within the meaning of the Truck Acts, and on that ground dismissed both summonses. After carefully considering the findings of fact stated in the case, by which we are bound, we find ourselves unable, in view of the language of the Acts of Parliament which apply to these cases and of judicial decisions which were given upon a practically identical statute, and which are binding on this Court, to hold that the determination of the justices was erroneous in point of law.

The definition of workman (which includes a workwoman) is contained in Sec. 10 of the Employers and Workmen Act, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict., c. 90). We many summarise it, for the purposes of this case, as including any person, not being a domestic or menial servant, who being engaged in manual labour has entered into or works under a contract with an employer, the contract being a contract of service or a contract personally to execute any work or labour. The material facts in relation to the employment of "clippers" in the lace trade at Nottingham generally are set forth in Paragraphs C to H of the case. [The learned judge read the paragraphs.] The further particular facts in regard to the two "clippers" whose cases form the subject of the present appeal are these. Mrs. Flinders never worked in the respondents' factory. She applied for and obtained work as a "clipper," and did the clipping herself at home. Mrs. Lamb was regularly employed in the respondents' factory during the day, and occasionally took home clipping work, which she knew was not considered part of the work at the factory; her daughter helped her with the clipping work at home. In neither case were the respondents aware of the person or persons who actually did the work. It was further stated by counsel that the clipping work was entered in the wages book and the women were paid weekly, subject to deductions from their pay for damaged work.

* It may be noted that the case of Grainger v. Aynsley, 6 Q.B.D. 182, was referred to by counsel for the appellant and was therefore before the Court, though not referred to in their judgment.

We feel ourselves precluded by authority from considering upon this statement of facts whether we might not give to Sec. 10 of the Act of 1875 an interpretation sufficiently liberal to include these two persons as workwomen entitled to the protection of the Truck Acts. The basis of the decision of the Exchequer Chamber in the leading case of Ingram v. Barnes (1), affirming the judgment of the majority of the Court of Queen's Bench (2), unquestionably is that to be a "workman" or "artificer" within the protection of the Truck Acts the person who contracts to do work for an employer must be a person absolutely bound by the terms of the contract to work with his own hands in the performance of it. The fact that he may work, or will probably work, with his own hands in the performance of the contract is insufficient. The principle of Ingram v. Barnes (1) was distinctly recognised in the judgment of the Court of Common Pleas in the later case of Pillar v. Llynvi Coal Co. (3), in which case Montague Smith, J., delivering the judgment of the Court said: "The result of that decision is that a man is not an artificer within the Act unless the employer has by the contract of hiring a right to require his personal work and labour in return for wages—of course as wages are defined by the Act."

In the present case the justices have found the employment of these women clippers to be the employment of persons who may execute the work or give it to other persons to execute. In fact Mrs. Flinders herself executed at home the work she got; so did Mrs. Lamb, with the assistance of her daughter. But neither of them was bound by the terms of the contract with the employer to do any part of the work personally; and this, as we have already said, appears to be established by the judgments of the Exchequer Chamber in Ingram v. Barnes (1) to be essential in order to constitute a workman under the Truck Acts. It is true that Ingram v. Barnes (1) was decided, not in regard to the Employers and Workmen Act, 1875, Sec. 10, but upon the interpretation of an earlier Act (1 & 2 Will. IV., c. 37); but the learned counsel for the appellants was unable to point out to us, and we have been unable to discover, any real or material distinction in the somewhat different wording of the two Acts in regard to the definition of "workman."

We must therefore dismiss this appeal. We do so with some reluctance, having regard to the facts disclosed in this case as to the nature of the employment and the position of the women clippers, who, though they do sometimes employ assistants, are evidently, as a class, wage-earning manual labourers, and not "contractors" in the ordinary and popular sense, or persons who "speculate on the state of the labour market"; and we venture to express the hope that some amendment of the law may be made so as to extend the protection of the Truck Act to a class of workpeople practically indistinguishable from those already within its provisions.

Appeal dismissed.

This case raises the question whether deductions made by an employer from wages earned by a workman of a lawful debt due from the workman to the employer are illegal, as being contrary to the Truck Act, 1831.

Collins, M.R., said: This is an appeal from an order made by Bucknill, J., at chambers, whereby he granted an interlocutory injunction in an action brought by workmen against their employers for non-payment in full of certain wages alleged to be due to them. The plaintiffs sought to recover the amount of certain deductions which had been made on the payment of those wages, and they claimed a declaration that such deductions were illegal and an injunction to restrain the defendants from making any further deductions of the same kind. When the case first came before Romer, L.J. and myself as an interlocutory matter, we came to the conclusion that it could not be conveniently dealt with in that way, and, if it were so dealt with, it could only be by discharging the injunction and leaving the real question in the case to be determined at the trial. Both parties, however, were desirous that this Court should deal with the merits of the case as a whole, and it was accordingly arranged to treat the case as a final appeal and to let it be dealt with by a full Court of three judges. To bring about that result the plaintiffs were obliged to throw over the greater part of their suggested cause of action and to confine themselves to claiming a declaration by the Court on the question which both parties desired to have decided, namely, whether a set-off against wages insisted on by an employer at the time of the payment of wages, was a violation of the Truck Act, 1831. We felt that there would be a difficulty in making the declaration which the plaintiffs asked for, even if we should be of opinion that such a set-off was a violation of the statute, because, even on the view of the plaintiffs, who asked for it, the declaration would not be ancillary to the putting in suit of any legal right. But with a view to meet the pressure which was put on us by both sides rather than from an opinion that the case could satisfactorily be dealt with by making such a declaration, we agreed to hear the case and determine it, as far as possible, on its merits.

The question arises in this way. The employers had a ground of complaint against their workmen in respect of a breach of the contract between them, which gave the employers a remedy sounding in damages. This remedy they put in suit before a Court of summary jurisdiction under the Employers and Workmen Act,

1875, which provides that such matters may be dealt with by such a Court, with the result that the magistrates gave judgment against each of the workmen for an amount of 30s. payable by fortnightly instalments, and by their order they appointed as the dates of payment of the instalments days which coincided with the usual days for the payment of the men's wages. On the next occasion when the wages came to be paid, the employer set off the sum of 10s. which by the exigency of the judgment of the magistrates was payable to them by each of the workmen on that day, against the sum which was payable by them as wages to each of the workmen. It is alleged that this was a violation of the Truck Act, 1831, notwithstanding the fact, which the plaintiffs' counsel were compelled to admit, that under the terms of the Act, the very sum, which it was said to be a violation of the Act for the employers to retain, could have been set-off by the employers in proceedings instituted by the workmen to recover wages due to them. Notwithstanding the preservation by the Legislature of this right of set-off, it was alleged that it was contrary to the provisions of the Act, if an employer availed himself of it at the time when he paid his men their wages, though he could by authority of the statute avail himself of it next day in proceedings by the workmen to recover those wages. I do not think that anything ought to be treated as an offence in this country under a statute, unless the statute in plain terms constitutes it one. Now, has the Truck Act, 1831, constituted it an offence for an employer to withhold from a workman on payment of his wages an amount in respect of which he, the employer, has a legal right of set-off against the workman—namely, the amount of a judgment obtained by him against the workman ? It has been emphasised in a series of cases that the object of the Truck Act, 1831, is what is expressed in its title and preamble. It is intituled, "An Act to prohibit the payment in certain trades of wages in goods, or otherwise than in the current coin of the realm." The preamble is : " Whereas it is necessary to prohibit the payment in certain trades of wages in goods, or otherwise than in the current coin of the realm." This therefore is the main end and object of the Act. Sec. 1 accordingly provides that in all contracts for the hire of any artificer the wages shall be made payable in the current coin of the realm, and not otherwise. That clearly gives effect to the main object—namely, the prohibition mentioned in the preamble. Then Sec. 2 provides that the contract must not contain any stipulations as to the manner in which wages shall be expended. That is another provision calculated to give effect to the same main end. Then comes Sec. 3, the section with which we have to deal in this case. It provides as follows : " The entire amount of the wages earned by or payable to any artificer, in respect of any labour by him done, shall be actually paid to such artificer in the current coin of this realm, and not otherwise ; and every payment made to any such artificer by his employer of or in respect of any such wages, by the delivering to him of goods or otherwise than in the current coin aforesaid, except as hereinafter mentioned, shall be and is hereby declared illegal, null, and void." It is sought by the plaintiffs to get out of the terms of that section that which appears to me, having regard to its place in the series of sections, and the central purpose of the Act, not to be contained in it, namely, an absolute obligation on the employer, where wages have been earned by a workman, whether he has a set-off or not, to pay the workman the whole amount of the nominal sum which but for any such set-off would be payable as wages. It is said that a failure to do that is contrary to the provisions of the Act. The plaintiffs shrank from contending that it is a criminal offence ; but they say that they will be satisfied if it is declared to be contrary to the Act. When the words of the section are looked at, they seem to me merely to constitute a provision calculated to carry out the central purpose of the Act, namely, that wages should not be paid otherwise than in money. They deal with the mode of payment, not with the amount to be paid. The section seems to point to the possibility of the employer not being bound to pay the whole amount of the wages earned by the workman, for it speaks of the amount of the wages earned by, " or payable to," any artificer. We ought not to reject the words " or payable to." They seem to me to show what the Legislature had in view. First it has to be ascertained what the amount of the obligation of the employer to the workman is—what sum he has to pay for wages. That is spoken of as " wages earned by or payable to " the workman. When that amount has been ascertained, the section provides how it shall be paid, namely, in current coin of the realm, and not otherwise. That seems to me to be prima facie the natural meaning of the section. But the matter does not stand there. Following out the provisions of the Act, we come to the rights and remedies given in contemplation of a breach of its provisions. Sec. 4 provides that the workman may recover from his employer in the manner by law provided for the recovery of servants' wages, or by any other lawful ways and means, the whole or so much of the wages earned by him as shall not have actually been paid to him in current coin of the realm, thus showing that the Legislature contemplated the recovery of the wages by the workman in a civil proceeding, in which prima facie the employer would be entitled to set off against the workman such a debt as that here in question, and to the extent of that debt the workman could not recover the wages. Then we come to Sec. 5, which expressly deals with the question of set-off, and provides that in any proceeding for the recovery of wages by the workman the employer " shall not be allowed to make any set-off, nor to claim any reduction of the plaintiff's demand, by reason or in respect of any goods, wares or merchandise had or received by the plaintiff as or on account of his wages or in reward for his labour, or by reason of or in respect of any goods, wares or merchandise sold, delivered or supplied to such artificer at any shop or warehouse kept by or belonging to such employer, or in the profits of which such employer shall have any share or interest." That again is another provision ancillary to the main object of the Act, and emphasising the fact that the Legislature do not intend to interfere with the existing law, except so far as is necessary in order to carry out that object, namely, that wages shall not be paid otherwise than in money. It leaves untouched the right of set-off, except in cases where a set-off would contravene the main purpose of the Act. It appears to me that by necessary implication that section involves a statutory recognition and sanction of all rights of set-off as against wages which are not struck at by the Act, for it shows that the Legislature contemplated the right of set-off as against wages as still existing, notwithstanding the previous provisions of the Act, and proceeded only in certain cases to interfere with it. Then comes Sec. 6, which debars an employer from suing a workman for the price of goods supplied to him on account of wages. The only other section to which I need refer is Sec. 9, which provides that, " Any employer of any artificer, who shall, by himself or by the agency of any other person or persons, directly or indirectly enter into any contract, or make any payment, hereby declared illegal, shall for the first offence forfeit a sum not exceeding ten pounds, and for the second offence a sum not exceeding twenty pounds nor less than ten pounds, and in case of a third offence, any such employer shall be and be deemed guilty of a misdemeanour, and, being thereof convicted, shall be punished by fine only, at the discretion of the Court, so that the fines shall not in any case exceed the sum of one hundred pounds." So that the only offences in respect of which the Legislature has created any machinery for enforcing the Act are those of entering into a contract,or making a payment, declared by the Act to be unlawful, i.e., a contract to pay or a payment of wages otherwise than in money; and the section does not make it an offence to withhold money due for wages on account of a legal set-off, or provide any penalty in respect of such withholding. The Truck Act, 1831, has been followed by other Acts, by which fresh matters arising have been dealt with, but I do not think that any of the provisions of those Acts has dealt with the matter now in question.

The provisions of the Truck Act, 1831, have been made the subject of decision from time to time. Cases have arisen in which, there having been some previous arrangement between an employer and a workman, whereby the employer was to be entitled to make certain deductions in respect of facilities given to the workman, as for instance, for the use of machinery in the hosiery trade, or in respect of fines, the employer has claimed to withhold sums earned as wages on account of such deductions; and the point has been taken in those cases that what was done amounted to a payment declared illegal by the Act, i.e., that paying an amount arrived at by means of such a deduction was an unlawful payment. But it was pointed out that a payment could not be treated as an illegal payment because the amount paid was arrived at after a deduction, that not being a breach of the Act, which dealt with payments, not with deductions. I will refer to the first case on the subject, namely, Chawner v. Cummings (1). Lord Denman C.J. there said, in giving judgment: "In order to form a correct judgment upon the nature of this agreement and of these deductions, it is necessary to attend to the provisions of the Act with some particularity. It was directed, as is well-known, against what has been called generally the truck system, or, as the title of the Act is, against the payment of wages in certain trades in goods or otherwise than in the current coin of the realm. The prohibition extended to bank-notes, because the eighth section expressly legalizes payment by them under certain circumstances. The same purpose is declared in the preamble, and in the same terms, and is pursued in the earlier sections of the Act. The first section declares all contracts illegal, where the wages are made payable in any other manner than in the current coin. The second section avoids all contracts where there is any provision as to the place or manner in which the wages, or any part are to be expended. Sec. 3 makes all payments, except as aforesaid, illegal and void; and the fourth section contains the proviso already referred to, that the artificer may recover his wages as if such prohibited payments had not been made; and the fifth section, also before noticed, takes away the right of set-off in such cases. Now it is to be observed that payment otherwise than in money is alone prohibited. Deductions or charges are nowhere mentioned or alluded to before the twenty-third section, hereafter to be considered. Then are these deductions in the nature of payment at all? It seems to us to be the mode of calculating the amount of wages, and nothing more." The same principle was followed in subsequent cases. In deducting the amount of a set-off allowed by law, and sanctioned by the judgment of the magistrates, from the amount of wages earned, all that was done was to calculate the amount payable to the workman for wages, and the payment of the amount so found to be due in coin cannot be said to be a violation of the Act. The offence created by the Act is not non-payment, but making a payment contrary to the Act, i.e., otherwise than in money. The simple principle so laid down in Chawner v. Cummings (1) seems to me to have always been followed since, and never to have been questioned. The fact that, with regard to a particular trade, namely, the hosiery trade, an Act was passed in 1874, making deductions other than those specified in the Act illegal in that trade, only seems to emphasise the conclusion that such deductions are not forbidden by the Truck Act, 1831.

It seems to me that the matter would be perfectly clear but for the fact that Bowen L.J., in the course of a general disquisition on the Act in the case of Hewlett v. Allen (2), made some observations which I think may be put forward as opposed to the view I have expressed, and as suggesting that there is an absolute obligation imposed on the employer by the Act to pay the whole amount of the wages earned, even where he has a set-off against them. But, when one reads these observations with the context, and comes to appreciate the point of view from which they were made, I do not think that the learned Lord Justice really meant to say that it would be a breach of the provisions of the Act to pay only that which might turn out to be payable on account of wages, having regard to a right of set-off possessed by the employer, though, taken apart from the context, his words might be capable of that interpretation. He nowhere in terms deals with the point now in question, and I do not think that it can have been present to his mind, for I perceive that, in summarising the provisions of Sec. 3, he makes no reference to the words "or payable to" in the section. He does no doubt use expressions which appear to point to the view that a deduction of a sum from wages by the employer might be contrary to the Act, though the employer would have a right to set off the same amount in a Court in an action for wages against him. But these expressions were not necessary to his decision. He held in the particular case, that, though the amounts deducted, which had under an agreement between the plaintiff and her employers been paid to a sick and accident fund, could not, by reason of the Truck Acts, be treated as lawfully paid, yet the plaintiff was precluded by her acquiescence in such payments from recovering the amount of the deductions. The House of Lords affirmed the decision, but they appear to have entirely negatived the suggestion that such deductions as had taken place constituted any offence against the Act. They held that, the payments having been made to the fund with the assent and at the request of the plaintiff, there had been a legal payment to the plaintiff of the whole amount of her wages, and they in no way seem to have countenanced or indorsed the contention which forms the basis of the plaintiffs' argument in this case. When I scrutinise the passages referred to in the judgment of Bowen L.J., I do not come to the conclusion that he meant to countenance that contention, or that he intended in dealing with the Act to differ in any way from the interpretation put upon it by Lord Denman C.J. in Chawner v. Cummings (1). I do not think his mind was really addressed to the question whether there was anything in the Act to debar an employer on paying wages to a workman from availing himself of a legal set-off. That being the state of the authorities on the subject, there appears to be no authority really against the construction of the Act which I have endeavoured to express, as being prima facie the proper construction of it, but on the contrary the authorities appear to be in accordance with it. The result is that it cannot in my opinion be said to be an offence against or violation of the statute for the employers to avail themselves on payment of the workmen's wages of a legal set-off such as that sanctioned by the judgment of the magistrates in this case; and, assuming the case to be one in which it would, as a matter of procedure, be proper for us to make a declaration of the kind asked for by the plaintiffs, it appears to me that on the true construction of the Act the plaintiffs are not entitled to the declaration for which they apply. For these reasons I think the appeal should be allowed.

(1) 8 Q. B. 311. (2) [1892] 2 Q. B. 662; [1894] A. C. 383.

Romer, L.J., read the following judgment :—So far as concerns the relief actually sought in this action the plaintiffs do not dispute that the defendants are entitled to the set-off claimed by them. And in my opinion this is not a case which would justify an injunction being granted as sought by the plaintiffs. Nor is the Court bound to make any declaration as claimed by the plaintiffs. But both parties have asked us to express our views on a question that has been argued, and I proceed, therefore, to give my opinion so far as it appears to me within my province to do so in the present action. I can give that opinion and my reasons for it very briefly. In my opinion the Act of 1831 did not constitute as a punishable offence the mere non-payment of part of a workman's wages, where the master, who is (apart from any special provisions of the Act) entitled to a set-off in respect of an ordinary debt due to him from the man equal to the amount of wages retained, claims a set-off and a right of retainer in respect of that debt, the debt not being one in respect of goods, wares, or merchandise, a set-off which is prohibited by s. 5 of the Act. Nor, indeed, can I see that the Act makes a punishable offence any mere non-payment of a man's wages when they fall due, merely because the master had not the means of paying or neglected to pay the same exactly when they became payable. Of course I am only dealing with the Act of 1831, which governs the present case, and am not considering special legislation dealing with a special trade, like the Hosiery Manufacture (Wages) Act, 1874, the provisions of which are significant when compared with the provisions of the Act of 1831. I come to the conclusion I have indicated with regard to the Act of 1831 by a consideration of its clauses taken as a whole, and in particular of ss. 1, 2, 3, 5, and 9, which, in my opinion, ought to be considered together. It appears to me that s. 9 was intended to specify what should be deemed punishable offences under the Act, and that, apart from those offences, if a workman did not obtain payment of his wages, the only remedy contemplated by the Act as available to the man and to enable him to obtain payment is by civil action or proceedings. And even if this were not so, yet, so far as concerns a case where a master does not pay part of the wages, because he has a set-off not invalidated under s. 5, it appears to me, having regard to the provisions of that section, it is not right to hold that the Act, which contemplated an action, suit, or other proceeding being taken by the man for his wages, and only prohibited a special set-off being set up as against him by the master, could have contemplated that it would be a statutory offence for the master to claim at the time when the wages became payable a set-off, which is not prohibited, and which he could effectually set up as against any subsequent civil proceeding by the man to enforce payment. It appears to me that under this Act, if the master sets up, as he may without committing any punishable offence, when the wages become payable, a right to set off such a debt as we are considering in the present case, then the man can do nothing except commence a civil action or other civil proceedings in which the set-off will be a good defence. It follows that in the present case no declaration can be made in favour of the views of the respondents, and that the appeal should be allowed. After what the Master of the Rolls has said I do not think it necessary or useful to refer to the various cases cited before us.

Mathew, L.J., read the following judgment :—The question which we have to determine under the arrangement come to between counsel, to which the Master of the Rolls has referred, is whether the workmen have an absolute right under the Act of 1831 to be paid their wages in cash, or whether the employers may deduct the amount of an admitted set-off and hand the workmen the balance. It was contended for the employers that the Truck Act did not apply. The statute, it was said, did not deal with non-payment. The object of the legislation was not to enforce payment, but to prohibit and to punish payment not in money but in goods. It was argued for the workmen that the Act went much further and was intended to make a failure to pay in current coin an offence for which proceedings of a criminal character might be instituted. It was argued that to dispose of the case the true construction of s. 3 of the Act of 1831 had to be ascertained, and the counsel on each side relied with equal confidence, though not with equal success, upon its provisions.

I am of opinion that the view of the meaning of the section indicated in previous decisions is the correct one—namely, that the statute does not apply to cases of non-payment. The workman who does not receive all that he has earned has the right to enforce payment in the ordinary way, and is not intended to have the right to prosecute his employer for breach of contract. Any other construction would lead to the unreasonable result that the employers of the workmen specified in the Act would be subject to a serious and vexatious liability not imposed on other employers. The same considerations apply to the question of set-off. There would seem to be no reason why the Legislature should impose on one class of employers a disability to which other employers are not exposed. This action was brought by the workmen to recover the balances alleged to be due to them, and they applied for an injunction to restrain the employers from making any further deduction. The answer of the defendants was that they had a set-off in respect of the wages which were unpaid. This would seem to be an adequate reason for refusing the injunction. But it was argued for the workmen that, although it could not be disputed that there was a set-off, still it was not available at the time when the wages became due. The duty of the employers, it was urged, was to hand over the whole amount and to take steps to enforce their set-off at some future time : in other words, that the statute postponed the employers' right to pay themselves by deducting the amount admitted to be due from the workman. I am unable to adopt this reasoning, and I find nothing in the Act of 1831 or the latter statutes to justify this contention. I agree that the appeal must be allowed.

Appeal allowed.

([1906] A.C., p. 136.)

Employer and Workmen—Truck Acts—Deduction from Wages—Set-off Debt due from Workman to Employer—Truck Act, 1831 (1 & 2 Will. 4) c. 37, s. 3.

The Truck Act, 1830, does not allow an employer when paying wages to a workman to make any deductions except those expressly sanctioned by the Act. Therefore he cannot deduct money which a court of summary jurisdiction has ordered the workman to pay to the employer in respect of breaches of contract to work.

The decision of the Court of Appeal (1) reversed.

The appellants, who were workmen in the service of the defendant company, were entitled to wages payable on January 30, 1904. Having absented themselves from work shortly before, each of them had been ordered by magistrates in petty sessions under the Employers and Workmen Act, 1875, to pay to the defendant company 30*s.* by instalments of which 10*s.* was due on January 30. In the case of the appellant Williams, which was typical of the rest, he had earned £3 13*s.* 2*d.* and received £3 2*s.*, the difference consisting of an agreed deduction of 1*s.* 2*d.* for doctor, and the 10*s.* which was not agreed. The appellants having brought an action against the company for damages, a declaration, and an injunction, an order for an interim injunction was made by Bucknill, J., at chambers. In the Court of Appeal (Collins, M.R., and Romer and Mathew, L.JJ.), it was agreed that the relief claimed should be limited to a declaration that the 10*s.* was improperly deducted. The Court of Appeal reversed the decision of Bucknill, J., holding that the deduction was legal. Hence the present appeal.

March 1, Mr. S. T. Evans, K.C, and Mr. Bailhache (Mr. John Sankey with them) for the appellants. The Truck Act, 1831, s. 3, uses plain unmistakable language: it requires payment of the entire amount of the wages in coin. In Hewlett v. Allen (2) Bowen, L.J., enforces the strict literal interpretation of the words "The statute insists (in all but the excepted cases) on actual payment in coin. Payment in account will not do. Payment in goods will not do. Nothing is to discharge the wages debt except actual payment in current coin." Later the Lord Justice says: "The employer cannot, for the purpose of compliance with the statute, be both payer and payee. To hold otherwise would be to make the statute idle." Chawner v. Cummings (3), which is relied upon by the respondents, is really in the appellants' favour. After observing "that payment otherwise than in money is alone prohibited," Lord Denman, C.J., in respect of the deductions for frame rents which were then allowed, said: "Then, are these deductions in the nature of payment at all? It seems to us to be the mode of calculating the amount of wages, and nothing more." The same principle was applied in Archer v. James (4), where it was pointed out that such deductions contracted for by the workmen did not come out of wages. In those cases the contract of labour was carried out by the employer. Not so here. There must be a written contract even to justify deductions for medical attendance, and such deductions—there having been no contract—had to be repaid in Pillar v. Llynvi Coal and Iron Co. (5) and see Ex parte Cooper (6). In Lamb v. Great Northern Railway Co. (7) A. L. Smith, J., said: "The Legislature seems undoubtedly to have started by making all drawbacks illegal" except those authorised by s. 23. In Smith v. Walton (8) was held that deductions for damaged goods were payment otherwise than in current coin, and that a penalty was incurred under s. 9; Willis v. Thorp (9) was under the Hosiery Manufacture (Wages) Act, 1874, and fines were allowed to be deducted as not being prohibited under that Act. But the principle is well expressed by Mr. Benjamin, Q.C. in his argument for the employer: "The master can deduct nothing which does not depend upon the will of the workmen; he cannot, therefore, deduct for things like frame rent or standing; but a fine is a thing which a workman may or may not incur at his will." The stringency of the obligation to pay in coin in increased by the words "payable to" in s. 3.

Mr. Bankes, K.C., and Mr. Lush, K.C. (and Mr. A. J. Ashton with them) for the respondents.

The Truck Act, 1831, was aimed at the mode, not the amount, of payment, and prohibits payment in equivalents. The words "earned by or payable to" contemplate the case where the wages earned are larger than the amount payable, and imply that deductions besides those specified may be allowed. Section 5 prohibits certain specified sets-off, and implies, therefore, that all others are allowed. There can be no distinction between sets-off in an action for wages and in the payment of wages. The Act simply declares that the amount payable must be paid in coin. The employer owes only what he can be made to pay by process of law: he does not owe the wages without deducting the set-off. It would be a rare anomaly if the employer can set off in an action but not in payment. The respondents are not seeking to pay an unauthorised sum, only refusing to pay the sum claimed. It is not the delay or omission to pay, but only the mode of payment which is dealt with. The employer might refuse to pay and under the Act there is no offence created for refusal to pay ; the Act does not deal with non-payment. If the appellants brought an action to recover their wages it is clear that these instalments would be deducted by the Court. It is exactly the same as if the master had lent his servant a sovereign ; he would be entitled to stop it out of wages. A. L. Smith, J., in Lamb v. Great Northern Railway Co., was only referring to the kind of "drawbacks" referred to in the Act—payment by equivalents. In Redgrave v. Kelly (2) deduction of fines was held not to be an offence. This is an a fortiori case, as the fines there were imposed by the employer as a term of service, here by an Order of Court ; see also Beetham v. Crewdson (3). In Archer v. James (4) the judgments are really in favour of the respondents. Bowen L.J.'s judgment in Hewlett v. Allen, (5) taken as a whole, is not adverse to the respondents, and the speeches of Lord Herschell, L.C., and Lord Watson are wholly irreconcilable with the appellants' contention. Lord Herschell expressly justifies sets-off, except those which are prohibited, and Lord Watson holds that advances of money by the employer are not recoverable by the workman. The Act is penal and must be construed strictly, and there is nothing express or implied to make unlawful the deduction of moneys due upon a cross judgment.

Mr. S. T. Evans, K.C., in reply.

The House took time for consideration.

Lord Loreburn, L.C. :—My Lords,—I do not propose to enter upon a consideration of the authorities that were cited to us in the course of argument or dealt with in the Court of Appeal, as I understand that my noble and learned friend Lord Davey intends to refer to them. But I have come to the conclusion that the judgment appealed from ought to be reversed, and a declaration given in the sense asked for by the plaintiffs. The facts lie in narrowest compass. [His Lordship stated the facts given above.]

The question is whether the employers, when they paid the wages on January 30th, were in law bound to pay in coin the total due for wages, or were entitled in law to deduct 10*s.* due from the workmen to the employers, and pay merely the balance in coin. This turns upon the true construction of s. 3 of the Truck Act, 1831. Now, I find in that section an explicit enactment that "the entire amount of the wages earned by or payable to a workman" shall be "actually paid" to him in the current coin of this realm, "and not otherwise." The section does not say when it is to be paid, for the common law will settle that as soon as the agreement of service is ascertained. The section does say that when paid it shall be paid in coin of the realm, and not otherwise. I cannot think this means that it shall be paid as to part in coin and as to the remainder in account. Our attention was directed in argument to the word "payable" ; we were invited to hold that the obligation to pay in coin applied only to the entire amount of wages payable after deducting cross-claims. In this case it was argued only £3 2*s.* was payable, because, on striking an account, that was the balance due. A reference to s. 23 shows to my mind that this would be a wrong interpretation even if the language of the Act admitted of it. Section 23 provides, with elaborate care, and under strict safeguards, the cases in which debts due from the workman may be deducted from the wages due to the workman when the employer is paying the wages. These provisions would be wholly unnecessary if an employer were already authorised by s. 3 to deduct anything that the workman owed him and to pay in coin merely his balance. The word "payable" may have been inserted because otherwise the law could have been evaded by making wages payable in advance, before they had been earned. Or it may have been inserted because there might be deductions authorised by s. 23 which would not diminish the wages earned but would diminish the sum payable for wages. However that may be, it appears to me that an obligation rests upon the employer under the Truck Act, 1831, s. 3, to pay in coin (for we are not concerned with bank notes in this case) all the money payable as wages, and that in ascertaining how much is payable as wages he can subtract nothing except the deductions expressly sanctioned by s. 23. The deduction of 10*s.* for fines was, therefore, in the present case illegal. Mr. Lush argued that this construction would be very anomalous. He urged that, if the employer did not pay the wages at all and were sued, he would be entitled then to set off in the action anything due to him except such sums as fall within the prohibition of s. 4. It would be strange, said Mr. Lush, if an employer could, by breaking his contract and forcing litigation, obtain an advantage denied to him if he fulfilled his contract. No doubt this would be an anomaly, as are the Truck Acts themselves, and some other Acts which interfere in a limited degree with freedom of contract. It is necessary to distinguish between the clauses of the Act relating to set-off in an action and those relating to stoppage or deduction when the wages are paid. Possibly the legislature thought a Court might be trusted to strike a balance in the rare cases where the dispute came into Court, but that the vast multitude of weekly or other payments which never come near a Court ought to be regulated by a simple and wholesome rule —namely, that they should be paid wholly in coin save for certain carefully specified exceptions. This is, however, a mere conjecture. It is enough to say that, assuming the Act of Parliament has so provided, the fact that the provision is anomalous does not permit us to disregard the plain meaning of the words used. Accordingly, I advise your Lordships to reverse the judgment of the Court of Appeal and enter judgment for the appellants, with a declaration in the sense prayed.

Lord Macnaghten. My Lords, I have had an opportunity of reading in print and considering the judgment which has just been delivered, and I entirely agreed in it.

Lord Davey. I agree with the judgment of my noble and learned friend on the woolsack, and with the reasons which he has given for his judgment. The learned Judges in the Court of Appeal rested their decision mainly on the ground that it was neither an offence nor a violation of the statute to give effect to a legal right of set-off. Set-off in an action I understand. It is a right given by statute to a man who is sued for a sum of money to defend himself by claiming a debt due to himself from the plaintiff in satisfaction or reduction of the debt for which he is sued. But set-off outside the Court means nothing more than a claim of deduction and retention, and the question comes to be whether the deduction of a cross-debt which might be the subject of a set-off in an action is a legitimate deduction, or whether the express enactment that the entire amount of the wages shall be actually paid in current coin can be so qualified. I agree with my noble and learned friend that there can be but one answer to that question. By s. 23 and s. 24 certain deductions are permitted to be made, or, to use the language of the marginal note, "particular exceptions to the generality of the law" are made under strictly defined conditions, and no other deductions or particular exceptions are, in my opinion, authorized. The learned counsel for the respondents argued that the employer was not bound by the Act to pay in full, and non-payment was not an offence under the Act. Be it so; but this was not a case of non-payment or repudiation by the master of his debt, but of retention of a part of the workman's admitted wages in payment of a debt to himself, and was intended to be payment or satisfaction pro tanto of the workman's wages. Lord Justice Bowen stated the exact point in Hewlett v. Allen (1) when, commenting on the third section, he said that payment in account will not do, and that the employer cannot for the purpose of compliance with the statute be both payer and payee, while, on the other hand, he held that set-off in an action was only prohibited in the cases mentioned in s. 5. It is sufficient to look at the account printed on page 10 of the appendix, which was handed to one of the appellants, to see that this is nothing more than payment in account, which I agree with the Lord Justice will not do. I will only add that I can see very good reasons why the Legislature should not allow a deduction to be made by the employer himself, although it might be the subject of set-off in an action where the amount and propriety of it could be impartially investigated. Mr. Lush boldly said that there was a clear and consistent current of authority in favour of the respondents, and it was too late for this House to revert to the views of the appellants. My Lords, the exact contrary of this statement appears to me to be nearer the truth. Not a single one of the numerous cases which were cited, in my opinion, supports the argument of the respondents, and a great deal is to be found in the judgments of the learned Judges which is against them. In Chawner v. Cummings (2) the plaintiff was presumed to have contracted upon the usual and well-known terms in the trade, and certain customary deductions which had been made from his nominal wages were held not to be in the nature of payment at all, but the mode of calculating and ascertaining the actual amount of his wages. Archer v. James (3) was a similar case, and was decided, in the first instance, on the authority of Chawner v. Cummings. In the Exchequer Chamber three Judges held that Chawner v. Cummings was wrongly decided, and three other Judges, on the other hand, approved the decision, and held that the deductions in question on the case before them were in the same category, and were elements only in calculating the real amount of the workman's wages. But there is not a word in any of the judgments which supports the contention that, when the amount of the wages is ascertained, the employer can discharge himself by set-off or payment in account. In Pillar v. Llynvi Coal and Iron Company (4) it was only decided that deductions of the character authorised by s. 23 could not be made unless there was a contract in writing as required by the section. In Smith v. Walton (5) the workman having damaged a piece of cloth through negligent workmanship, the employer delivered to him the damaged cloth, and deducted from his wages the value placed by the employer on the cloth. The question arose on an information against the employer for making an illegal payment. The Court reversed the decision of the magistrates, who refused to convict, Mr. Justice Lindley saying that, whether there was a payment in goods or a set-off, the respondent had infringed the Act. The decision in "Ex parte Cooper (6)" has no bearing on the case before the House. Lamb v. Great Northern Railway Company (7) was a decision on the amending Act, 1887, but the judgment of Mr. Justice A. L. Smith contains dicta on the construction of ss. 2, 3, 4, and 23 of the Act of William IV. which are in the appellants' favour. The judgment of Lord Bowen in Hewlett v. Allen has already been referred to. That case, however, was decided on the ground that the plaintiff had authorised and directed certain payments to be made by the employer on her behalf, and was confirmed in this house (8) on the same ground. My Lords, the writ in this action claimed payment to each of the appellants of the sum of 10*s.* deducted by the respondents. In the Court of Appeal, by some arrangement between the parties, the appellants confined their claim to a declaration that such deduction was illegal. The Master of the Rolls expressed some doubt whether the Court ought to entertain a suit for declaration not ancillary to the putting in suit of any legal right. I share that doubt: but as the case has been fully argued and both parties appear to desire the decision of the House upon it, I am not disposed to say more. I am of opinion that the order appealed from should be reversed, and, the appellants and respondents having consented to the hearing in the Court of Appeal being taken as the trial of the action, it be declared that the deduction by the defendants on January 30, 1904, of the sum of 10*s.* from the wages due to the appellants respectively from the respondents at that date was unauthorised and illegal, and it be ordered that the respondents pay to the plaintiffs their costs of this suit, including the costs of the appeal to the Court of Appeal, and also the costs of this appeal.

Lord Robertson. My Lords, but for the judgment of the Court of Appeal I should have thought the imperative terms of the Act conclusive of this question.

I entirely adopt the reasons given by my noble and learned friends the Lord Chancellor and Lord Atkinson for the reversal proposed.

Lord Atkinson. My Lords, the third section of the Truck Act of 1831 as printed in the revised edition of the statutes runs as follows : "The entire amount of the wages earned by or payable to any artificer . . . in respect of any labour by him done . . . shall be actually paid to such artificer in the current coin of this realm and not otherwise ; and every payment made to any such artificer by his employer, of or in respect of such wages, by the delivering to him of goods, or otherwise, than in current coin aforesaid, except as hereinafter mentioned, shall be and is hereby declared illegal, null and void."

Some comment was made on the use in this section of the words "or payable to any artificer." I think these words are introduced for the purpose of meeting a case where some deduction or stoppage authorised by ss. 23 and 24 of the statute has, in fact been made, and the workman is only entitled to receive the balance of his wages remaining due after that deduction.

It has been urged on behalf of the appellants that such a deduction as that made in this case does not come within the mischief aimed at by the Truck Acts ; that those statutes were merely designed to prevent the payment of workmen's wages in equivalents for cash as distinguished from cash itself. It may well be that this was the main purpose and object of this legislation, and that in this particular section the language used extends beyond the mischief aimed at, and reaches comparatively harmless transactions or practices not within the spirit of the statute. Still, there is no ambiguity in the words of the section used. They are precise and clear, and require that the entire amount of the wages earned shall be "actually paid in the current coin of this realm, and not otherwise." It cannot, I think, be contended that the withholding by the master from a workman of a portion of the wages earned by the latter against his consent is, or could be, held to be a payment by the master to the workmen of that very same portion. It is, in fact, the very opposite of payment. It is a refusal to pay, for the not unnatural reason that an equivalent sum is due to the master by the workman. The requirements of the statute have therefore not been observed in this case. The wages earned have not been paid.

The drawback or stoppage, or deduction, or whatever it may be termed, actually made is not one of those authorised by ss. 23 or 24, yet it is sought to justify the course taken on this ground that inasmuch as in any action brought by the workmen to recover his wages the master would be entitled to set off the debt due to him in reduction of the workman's claim, it is absurd and anomalous to hold that the master cannot before action brought, make a deduction in respect of the claim which, after action brought, he can successfully rely upon by way of set-off. No doubt, at first sight, there would seem to be much force in this argument, but a little consideration will show that there may be good reason even for this anomaly. The whole principle upon which this legislation is based is that the workman requires protection, that if not protected he may be overreached ; and it is quite consistent with that principle to hold that in any such action brought by him to recover his wages, he may be liable to have the sum found on investigation before the legal tribunal to be due to him by his master diminished by the sum found by the same tribunal on the same occasion to be due by him to his master, and yet at the same time to prohibit the master from, as it were substituting himself for the legal tribunal, investigating his own claim against his workmen in his own office and deciding in his own favour. In this particular case no doubt the sum sought to be deducted is the amount of a judgment debt, and the danger referred to could not arise ; but the argument as to the anomaly which I have mentioned dealt with the general scheme and machinery of the statute, and it was in respect of its general application that I consider it open to criticism.

The several authorities cited appear to me to support rather than refute the contention of the appellants. They may, I think, be roughly divided into two classes, namely, those cases like Chawner v. Cummings (1) in which charges were made by the employer for the use of the instrument by which the workman did his work and earned his wage ; and those like Hewlett v. Allen (2) in which payments were in effect made by the master out of the wages by the authority of the workman for certain purposes not prohibited by the Truck Acts. In none of these cases was it contended that the master had the right to deduct here relied upon. On the contrary, the effort of the master in each of these cases was to justify the drawback on grounds entirely different from and inconsistent with those relied upon in this case.

In the first class of cases it was successfully contended that the charges made by the master were not deductions properly so called from sums due for wages earned, but were sums to be taken into account in ascertaining the amount of wages actually earned ; and in the second class of cases the so-called drawbacks or deductions were justified on the ground that these sums in truth and in fact represented portions of the wages earned paid in current coin of the realm at the request of the workman to his duly appointed agent.

All the reasoning upon which the several tribunals in the cases cited based their respective decisions would have been unnecessary, and indeed beside the point, if the Truck Act, had conferred upon the master the right here contended for, namely, the right to deduct from the workmen's wages whatever the master could set off in a suit brought by the workman against him to recover these wages.

It may well be that the appellant has no merits, and that a decision in his favour will enable him to violate his duty with impunity and evade the payment of his just and legally established liabilities ; but if that be so, the fault must lie on that "tutelary shelter" to use Lord Bowen's words, which the Legislature has thrown up around the workman, without taking sufficient care so to mould and fashion it that it could not be open to abuse.

I think this appeal must be allowed, with the declaration made in the sense prayed for.

(Irish Reports, K.B.D. [1906] Vol. II).

Master and servant—Contract of employment—Weekly wage for specified hours—Bonus for full-time work—Failure to put in full time—Deduction of bonus—Truck Acts (1 & 2 Wm. 4, c. 37; 59 & 60 Vict. c. 44, s. 1).

A workwoman was employed at 8s. per week of 55½ hours, with a bonus of 2s. per week for full attendance, and that alone. Printed rules, posted in the factory, of employment, admittedly read by the workwoman, provided, inter alia, that "any person absent without reason, and not assigning satisfactory reason, shall lose bonus." The workwoman being absent for a quarter of a day without sufficient reason, 2s. 4d. was deducted from the weekly sum of 10s. which would otherwise have been payable to her. No question being raised as to the 4d. (representing the quarter of a day's wages) :—

Held, that the deduction of the 2s. bonus was not an offence under the Truck Acts.

Case stated for the opinion of the Court at the instance of the complainant, Miss Lucy A. E. Deane, Inspector of Factories, in respect of a adjudication by the magistrates at Newry Petty Sessions on April 25th, 1906. The defendant was Abraham Wilson, a partner in the firm of Abraham Wilson and Co., and the charge against him was set out in the summons as follows:—"For that on or about the 10th day of February, 1906, at Edward Street, Newry, in said district and county, you being the employer of a certain workwoman, to wit Theresa Dixon, did, contrary to the provisions of the Truck Act, 1896, unlawfully make a certain deduction of 2s. from the wages of the said Theresa Dixon in respect of a fine, in that such particulars in writing as are required by the aforeside Act were not supplied to the said Theresa Dixon on the occasion when the deduction was made, whereby you are liable to a penalty of not less than £5 and not exceeding £10." The magistrates dismissed the charge on the merits; but, upon the application of the complainant, consented to state a case, which they did as follows:—

At the hearing of the said complaint it was proved, on the part of the complainant, that the said Theresa Dixon was a workwoman in the spinning factory of Abraham Wilson and Co. at Edward Street, Newry. She deposed that she had been employed in the factory for a lengthened period, in fact since childhood. She also admitted that she had read the printed rules of the factory, and that they were posted up in the works. The third rule was—"Any person being absent without reason, and not assigning satisfactory reason, shall lose bonus or be discharged, or may be prosecuted according to Act of Parliament, as may be considered necessary under the circumstances."

The said Theresa Dixon proved that when she served full time in the factory she received the sum of 10s. for the week of 55½ hours. However, when she was out a quarter day (and did not thereby serve full time), there was a deduction from this sum (10s.) of 2s. 4d. This deduction was made on or about the 10th February, 1906. The witness admitted that she had been out the quarter day during the week then being paid for. She did not go to work on one of the mornings of the week untill 9.45 o'clock—after the breakfast hour. She should have been at the factory, to keep full time at 6.30 o'clock a.m.

For the defence it was proved by Messrs. James Wilson, a partner in the Company, and E. J. Kilbraith, bookkeeper of the firm, that the wages of Theresa Dixon (and others at the same work) were 1s. 4d. per diem.

However, for some years past, in order to obtain a full attendance of the workwomen in this factory, the management decided to give a bonus of 2s. per week for full attendance, and for that alone.

The quarter day's wages (at 1s. 4d.) which were not earned, and the bonus (for full time week) were not paid to Theresa Dixon on 10th February, 1906.

It was contended by the complainant that under 1 and 2 Wm. 4, c. 37, s. 25 (extended to Ireland by 50 and 51 Vict. c. 46) the bonus was "wages" within the meaning of the statute quoted; that the deduction was a "fine" and that an offence had been committed (when the statutes were together construed) under 59 and 60 Vict. c. 44, s. 1, clause 2 (b).

The Justices were of opinion—(1) That the minimum penalty (claimed in the said summons) of £5 under 1 and 2 Wm. 4, c. 37, s. 9, was expressly repealed by 47 and 48 Vict. c. 43 before the extension by the latter statute (50 and 51 Vict. c. 46) to Ireland; that the statute then existing and in full force and virtue, depleted of the minimum of £5 for a first offence, was the Act they had to administer; that under the statutes quoted there was now no minimum penalty for a first offence; (2) That the "wages" of Theresa Dixon were 1s. 4d. per diem, and that there was no deduction made from the wages on the 10th February, 1906, save for a quarter day, when she was admittedly absent from the factory—a wage which she did not earn; that the 2s. per week was given as a bonus or prize in special consideration for full time of 55½ hours kept by the worker each week; that it would not be computed as "wages" as it was not given for excellence of nor for extra work, but was a premium for full time, and that therefore no fine had inflicted.

The Solicitor-General (Mr. Redmond Barry, K.C.) and Mr. Dudley White, for the complainant:—

The 2s. was a sum that the employees was contractually entitled to receive on completing a certain number of hours work in the week and consequently was wages. The words "sum contracted to be paid" in section 1 of the Act of 1896 were used in view of the experience of years and the devices of employers to evade the previous Acts. This is a penalty for not doing full time.

(1) Before Lord Chief Justice Lord O'Brien and Mr. Justices Andrews and Kenny.

Mr. Chambers, K.C., and Mr. F. Redmond, for the defendant :—

A fine is punishment. This was a contract that if the employee worked for a certain number of hours she was to get 10*s.* and that if she did not work for so many hours she was to receive only 8*s.* The Truck Acts never affected the amount of wages to be paid ; they dealt only with the mode with which wages were to be paid. The 2*s.* never became wages, because it was never earned, and could never have been sued for.

(They referred to—Squire v. Bayer and Co. (1) ; Williams v. North Navigation Collieries, Limited 2 ; Buxton Lime Firms v. Howe 3 ; Employers and Workmen Act, 1875, section 4).

Andrews, J. The offence charged against the defendant in the summons in this case is that, being the employer of Theresa Dixon, a workwoman, he, contrary to the Truck Act, 1896, made a deduction of 2*s.* from her wages, in respect of a fine, particulars in writing, as required by that Act, not having been supplied to her on the occasion on which the deduction was made.

The argument proceeded on the construction of the Act, which I shall consider apart from any technical objection to the form of the summons.

The Act (59 & 60 Vict. c. 44) provides by section 1, clause (1), that an employer shall not make any contract with any workman for any deduction from the sum contracted to be paid by the employer to the workman . . . . . for, or in respect of any fine (unless under certain specified circumstances, which I shall assume do not exist in this case), and the Act further provides by section 1, clause (2), sub-clause (b), that an employer shall not make any such deduction unless particulars in writing, showing the acts or omissions in respect of which the fine is imposed, and the amount thereof, are supplied to the workman on each occasion when a deduction is made. No such particulars were given in the present case. The 4th section provides that if any employer enters into any contract contrary to the Act, or make any deduction . . . . contrary to the Act, he shall be guilty of an offence against the Truck Act, 1831, and shall be liable to the penalties imposed by section 9 of that Act as if the offence was an offence in that section mentioned.

The offence with which the defendant is charged is thus by the Act of 1896 made an offence under the Act of 1831, which that Act did not itself make provision for. Before determining that a new offence created by Statute has been committed, it ought to appear that the facts relied on in support of the charge clearly establish the offence so created.

The facts in the present case are that for a working week of 55½ hours the sum which the worker would under her Contract of Service be entitled to receive from the defendant as her employer, would be 10*s.*, if she worked for the full time of 55½ hours ; that her wages were at the rate of 1*s.* 4*d.* per day, making 8*s.* for the week, with an addition, called a bonus, of 2*s.* per week for full attendance, and for that alone.

During the week ending the 10th of February, 1906, she did not give full attendance, having remained off work for a quarter of a day. Fourpence, which represented the quarter day's wage, was not paid to her. This non-payment has not been alleged to have constituted an offence under the Act, and I understood it to have been admitted that it did not constitute an offence under the Act. The 2*s.* which the worker would have been entitled to, if she had given full attendance, but which she never became entitled to, was not paid to her, and the question is, did this non-payment constitute an offence under the Act ? In my opinion it did not, and I think the magistrates' determination "that the charge be dismissed on the merits" was correct in point of law. I am unable to hold that the non-payment of the 2*s.* which was not earned and never became due was a deduction from the sum contracted to be paid to the worker. There was no contract to pay it unless it was earned. If she had not worked at all during the week, though the contract for service remained, she would not have been entitled to any payment, and could it be said that when being entitled to nothing, she was paid nothing, the non-payment was an offence under the Act ? Further, even if this non-payment of the 2*s.* which she did not earn could be possibly held to be a deduction from the sum contracted to be paid to her, it could not, in my opinion, be held to be a deduction for or in respect of a fine. The non-payment took nothing from her to which in any view she had become entitled, or to which when the week ended she could ever have become entitled. It was simply withholding payment of what she had not earned, and never could earn. I do not think that the Act was ever intended to apply to such a case which, in my opinion, is not within its letter or spirit. I can see nothing unfair or unreasonable in a contract with a worker to pay him so much a day for each day he works, and if he works full time for a week to give him, at the end of the week, an additional sum, in consideration of his uninterrupted work. Such a contract is beneficial to both the employer and the employed. Under it the worker gets an additional payment to which he would not otherwise be entitled, and the employer gets, what may be very important for him, uninterrupted work. To hold that non-payment of such an addition, when not earned, was an offence under the Act, would, in my opinion, be to deprive the employer of a fair and reasonable means of securing uninterrupted work. The non-performance of one worker's work in a factory may in many cases cause injurious interruption of the work of others, where work may be dependent upon the work of the defaulter, and thus cause a much greater injury to the employer than the mere loss of the work of the defaulter. I think the acquittal of the defendant was right, in point of law, and ought to be affirmed.

Kenny, J. The questions for our decision in this case arise on a "case stated" by the justices at Newry Petty Sessions on the hearing of a summons by the complainant, a factory inspector, against the defendant, Abraham Wilson, who is described in the "case" as a partner in the firm of Abraham Wilson & Co., Ltd. If the Company be one incorporated under the Company's Acts I presume that Mr. Wilson is a director—not a partner. The charge contained in the summons is that the defendant, being an employer of a workwoman named Theresa Dixon, did, in contravention of the Truck Act, 1896, unlawfully make a deduction of 2*s.* from her wages in respect of a fine, without supplying to her such particulars in writing as are required by Section 1, Sub-section 2 (b) of the Truck Act, 1896 (59 & 60 Vict. c. 44).

The facts, as found, are these:—Theresa Dixon was a workwoman in the defendant's spinning factory in Newry. Her wages were 1*s.* 4*d.* a day—and for some years past the defendant's Company, in order to obtain a full attendance of their workwomen, had been giving a bonus of 2*s.* a week for full attendance—and, according to the evidence of the defendant's witness, for that alone. Full attendance meant 55½ hours a week, absence from work even for a quarter of a day involved the loss of the whole 2*s.* at the end of the week in addition to a deduction from the daily wage proportionate to the period of absence. The defendant's printed rules were posted up in the factory and the workwoman admitted that she had read them. One of them was as follows:—

> "Any person being absent without reason and not assigning satisfactory reason shall lose bonus—or be discharged or may be prosecuted according to Act of Parliament, as may be considered necessary under the circumstances."

In the first week in February last, the workwoman was absent for a quarter of a day, and at the end of the week she received, in respect of her week's work, a sum of 7*s.* 8*d.* instead of the 10*s.* (made up of the 8*s.* and 2*s.*) to which she would have been entitled had she put in the whole 55½ hours. The sum of 2*s.* 4*d.* not received by her represented the bonus of 2*s.* and the unearned wage of a quarter of a day, namely 4*d.*

The complainant contended before the justices that the sum payable for full time was part of the "wages" of the workwoman, and that the 2*s.* withheld by the defendant's Company was a "fine" within Section 1, Sub-section (2) (b) of the Truck Act, 1896.

The justices were of opinion that the "wages" were 1*s.* 4*d.* a day, and that there was no deduction made from the said wages save for the quarter day—that the 2*s.* a week was given as a bonus, prize, or special consideration for full time of 55½ hours a week, and that the 2*s.* would not be computed as wages. They accordingly held that there was no "fine" inflicted and dismissed the summons.

The correctness of the magistrates' decision depends on the construction of the Truck Act, 1896. The latter, together with the Truck Acts, 1831 and 1887, form a code, but it was admitted by the Solicitor-General that we are not concerned with the terms of the Act of 1831 inasmuch as it does not purport to deal with "fines," and the complainant's case here is dependent on the retention of the 2*s.* being regarded as a fine. The Act of 1831 is however important as showing that the evident intention of the legislature was to insure as far as possible that workmen should receive their wages in actual cash. Wages were by the 25th section deemed to include any money or other thing had or contracted to be paid, delivered, or given as a recompense, reward, or remuneration for any labour done or to be done, and the Act made void all contracts that stipulated for a payment of wages—as so defined—otherwise than in coin of the realm and all stipulations respecting the manner in which such wages were to be expended. But the Act did not deal with deductions from wages save by enacting that in an action for recovery of the latter the employer was not to be at liberty to set off a claim for goods received by the workman on account of wages or supplied to him at any shop belonging to the employer. The Act of 1896 for the first time introduces provisions in regard to "fines"—but more important still, it abandons the word "wages," and in its place uses the expression "sum contracted to be paid by the employer to the workman." These substituted words were, I have no doubt, intended to be, and I think they probably are, wider in their scope than the term "wages"—but whether that be so or not, it does not in my opinion affect the question we have to decide, which is, was the non-payment of the 2*s.* "a deduction for or in respect of a fine?" The 2*s.* a week in a certain event does become part of the "wages," and it no doubt is a sum contracted to be paid—but, on the evidence, its payment is altogether conditional. The 1st section of the Act provides that an employer is not to make a contract with any workman for any deduction from the sum contracted to be paid, for or in respect of any fine or make any such deduction, unless subject to certain conditions and restrictions, and Section 4 makes any contravention of the terms of section 1 an offence, and prescribes a penalty. The Act contains no definition of a "fine," nor does it supply any test for arriving at its statutory meaning. The ordinary and popular meaning of the word "fine" imports a penalty for an act of commission or omission. It is possible to impose it in at least two ways, namely, by the exacting of a payment or by a deduction. There is no question here of the exacting of a payment. If it be by deduction, there is necessarily a process of subtraction from some integer to which, but for the imposition, the individual would be entitled. According to the evidence the workwoman is paid a daily wage of 1*s.* 4*d.* She is entitled to that sum conditionally on her giving an entire day's work. If she fails to give a full day's work she receives only a part of the 1*s.* 4*d.* proportional to the time she has worked. The remainder of the 1*s.* 4*d.* in such a case is unearned, and consequently not payable. The wages whether fully earned or not are payable once a week. At the end of the week the workwoman may be entitled to be paid for six full days or for a shorter period. If she has worked for only 5½ days could it be said for a moment that the half-day's wage in respect of which payment is withheld, is in the nature of a fine or penalty? It represents unearned money and nothing more. The 4*d.* withheld in this case was never earned and never payable. In what material respects does it differ from the 2*s.*? The latter was also conditionally payable. It too had to be earned before the workwoman could claim it. No doubt if it was earned it might be regarded as portion of the sum contracted to be paid and undoubtedly it would be recoverable. But it must be earned in accordance with the contract. The workwoman here had not a weekly wage of 10*s*. She had a daily wage payable weekly. If this 2*s*. so withheld was a fine—apart from the Act of 1896—what was it deductible from? Suppose she worked one full day and no more. She would be entitled to receive 1*s*. 4*d*.—or if her evidence as to 10*s*. being the weekly wage—then 1*s*. 8*d*. In that case how is the 2*s*. to be deducted? Is she to receive no payment at all, or is a proportionate part of the 2*s*. to be deducted, or is she to receive the full day's wage without any deduction? The contention for any one of those possibilities would be absolutely opposed to the contract between the parties, and to my mind establishes that this 2*s*. withheld is a mere bonus and not a fine. According to the contract, the right to it might be lost on the very first day of the week by the woman's absence for say a quarter of a day. Consequently it was never earned. Its non-payment is simply the contractual result of the woman's failure to work for a certain stipulated period.

It was suggested in the course of the argument that this arrangement for a bonus to those workpeople who would work their full week of 55½ hours was really a device or contrivance for evading the provisions of the Act of Parliament. I cannot for a moment think so. Mr. Chambers put it to us very strongly—and I am sure in complete accordance with the course of things and methods of work in the great North of Ireland factories—that each department and each particular class of machinery are dependent for their regular and continuous working and the amount of manufactured stuff they can turn out, on the absolute co-ordination of all the departments. I can well understand that position, and fully appreciate the dislocation that would ensue and the effect which the stoppage of the machines for want of a sufficient number of operatives, or any other reason, might have upon the output of the factory or any section of it. I believe the offer of a bonus in the present case for punctual and regular attendance to be a perfectly bona fide effort on the part of the Company to ensure the latter—that it in no respect savours of a device or contrivance to evade the provisions of the Truck Act—and that the non payment of the 2*s*. cannot be regarded as a fine. The magistrates were therefore, in my opinion, correct in the determination at which they arrived.

Andrews, J. The Lord Chief Justice, who is unable to be present, has authorised me to state that he concurs in the judgment of the Court.

MINUTES OF EVIDENCE

TAKEN BEFORE THE

TRUCK COMMITTEE.

FIRST DAY.

Wednesday, 2nd May, 1906.

PRESENT.

The Right Hon. THOMAS SHAW, K.C., M.P., Lord Advocate for Scotland, (Chairman).

EDWARD A. BROTHERTON, Esq., M.P.
FREDERICK CAWLEY, Esq., M.P.
MALCOLM DELEVINGNE, Esq., of the Home Office.
J. RAMSAY MACDONALD, Esq., M.P.
FREDERICK MADDISON, Esq., M.P.
Mrs. H. J. TENNANT.

THOMAS EDWARD BETTANY, Esq. (Secretary).

Mr. H. H. S. CUNYNGHAME, C.B., Legal Assistant Under-Secretary of State, at the Home Office, was called; and examined.

Mr. H. H. S. Cunynghame, C.B.

2 May 1906.

By the Chairman.

1. Will you please state what is your position with regard to the subject remitted to this Committee?—Truck is one of the subjects dealt with by my department, and I have had to do with it during the whole time since I came to the Home Office in 1893.

2. I understand you have for the purposes of this Committee, and also at other times, gone into the whole question of the development of the law of Truck, both by statute and under case law. I gather you have kept a watch upon that development?—Yes, I have had to write memoranda on it from time to time, some of which have been published in Parliament and used in various other ways.

3. We have been furnished as members of this Committee with what is described as an official copy of a memorandum on the Truck Acts. Is that your production? Yes. I helped in it; in fact, I may be considered mainly responsible for it.

4. I refer to the document dated Home Office, March 31st, 1898?—Yes. There was an idea of having penny pamphlets upon difficult branches of the law, and I think the idea was a good one.

5. I suppose this pamphlet or memorandum was intended for the instruction of both employers and employed, by giving them a kind of bird's eye view of their rights and obligations under the various Acts?—Yes.

6. We are rather anxious to get, with your skilled help, some narrative of the development of the legislation upon this subject, as a foundation upon which we can proceed in making any recommendations to the Home Secretary. But I fancy there is hardly much use in going much into the historical aspects of the matter anterior to the Act of 1831?—The first Truck Act of which we have any record is dated 1464. It is the 4 Edward IV., chapter 1. It describes how, previously in the occupation of cloth-making, the workers have been driven to take part of their wage in girdles and other articles. The Act deals with that evil, and in one of its clauses requires the giving of the true weights of the materials made up. This shows that such matters were in dispute, even at that early time. Truck on the one hand, and the true weights of materials given out, were the subjects of legislation as early as 1464. There are about twenty subsequent Acts with which I need not burden the Committee, but I could furnish you with a list of them, if you like, down to the Act of 1831. They mostly follow one another with greater and greater precision.

7. Have you materials at hand now for giving such a list?—Yes, I can furnish such a list.

Many of these Acts have, of course, been repealed.

Many of these Acts repeat over and over again the same thing. One of these Acts, dated 1714 (George I.), sets forth that all and every person in any way employed or concerned in the said woollen manufacture (to which most of these Acts relate) shall be paid for all work done, and shall not in lieu of payment in money have imposed upon them or delivered to them any sort of goods or wares in lieu of payment for such work. That is the operative part of that Act. There is another Act, dated 1725 (12 of George I.), and it is in that Act that so far as I know the word "Truck" first appeared.

8. Can you tell us what is the context which introduces that word?—It provides that payments for labour shall not be made "either in goods or by way of Truck," or in any other manner than in money as aforesaid, contrary to the true intent and meaning of the Act, etc.

By Mr. Maddison.

9. Can you tell us what is the exact meaning of the word "Truck"?—I think it means to exchange, but I have not pursued the point closely.

By Mr. Ramsay Macdonald.

We have a Scotch expression "Trock," which means "Dealings."

By the Chairman.

11. The Scotch expression is to "Troke." The English equivalent for the word I think is to traffic. They may be etymologically connected in that way?—What was being aimed at, was to prevent an exchange of labour for goods.

12. One point which occurs to my mind upon reading in full the passage you have quoted, is that it deals specifically with the exchange of goods and then deals with Truck as if that were something different?—It was apparently intended to prevent employers paying for labour in goods, or exchanging goods for other goods made by the workman.

13. I think the last Act you refer to was that of 1725. What is the next step?—I think we may now go at once to the Act of 1831, which repealed and replaced all previous legislation on the subject. Perhaps the Committee would like me to take my own method of putting some of my points before them.

14. Yes, please give us your observations in the way that you think would be most helpful to the Committee?—It is this Act of 1831 that has from the beginning given rise to immense difficulties of interpretation. The points to which I should like to call attention are in the preamble and in sections, 2, 3, 4, 6, and 25. I will deal with these various sections. I think the members of the committee have a copy of the Truck Act of 1831 before them, and can follow what I am going to say. The preamble sets forth that it is necessary to prohibit the payment in certain trades of wages in goods or otherwise than in the coin of the realm. It therefore enacts that wages of artificers, etc., shall be made payable in the current coin of the realm only, and not otherwise, and that any contract under which the whole or part of that wages shall be made payable in any manner other than in the current coin as aforesaid, shall be declared illegal. That clearly forbids any contract to pay wages otherwise than in coin. Section 3 provides that the entire wages shall be paid in coin, and not otherwise. Section 4 provides that artificers may recover back wages not paid in coin. Section 6 provides that no employer of any artificer shall be entitled to maintain any action or suit in respect of goods, wares, or merchandise, sold or delivered to the artificer at any shop kept by the employer. Section 25 is important and it is one in connection with which great difficulties have arisen. It contains the definition of wages. In view of the difficulties which arose a Truck Commission was appointed in 1871, and that Commission made certain recommendations in which they find generally that something more was needed, but nothing seems to have been done until we come to the action of Mr. Bradlaugh and Mr. Crawford in 1887, ending in the Act of that year, which was in substance Mr. Bradlaugh's Bill. The Bill was a good deal mauled in committee and, as is the case with many other Bills, it came out in a somewhat different form from that in which it entered committee. It did some good, but it rather added to the confusion. I don't think it is at all a clear measure. It is a great pity that the old Act was not repealed and replaced by a fresh one well considered. In the provisions of the Act of 1831, as amended by that of 1887, it is provided that in all contracts for hiring, wages are to be made payable, and the entire wages are to be actually paid, in coin; that no contract is to be made as to how a workman shall lay out or expend his wages; that no workman is to be liable in debt for goods bought at any shop in which his employer is interested, and that no interest is to be charged on advances of wages. There are various exemptions. These Acts prohibit the making of Truck Contracts, or of payments or deductions in respect of them, and two remedies are provided, one being a penalty on the master and the other that the workman may recover in a civil action money illegally deducted. The fact that there are two remedies has given rise to some confusion, for the judges have held, and I think rightly held, that you may have a case where a penalty would be leviable and yet where the workman could not recover the money. The workman has never quite understood that. He has usually thought that if a workman brought a civil action he would get practically the same decision as if proceedings had been commenced against the master for the penalty. But when you come to the civil action, all sorts of other doctrines come in, as to whether there has been assent, etc. There have therefore arisen two branches, one consisting of cases that arose out of prosecutions, and another which arose out of actions brought by workmen. And a quotation applicable to the one was not always applicable to the other.

15. With regard to the prosecutions, the fines, of course, went into the exchequer?—Yes. In addition to what I have said, the very law differed. The Act has occasionally in its turn made a thing null and void, and other sections penalised the master. So you have to look minutely into the section, in order to discover what these unhappily drawn Acts provide. They were not consistent from first to last, and have in consequence given rise to much difficulty ever since. My next point is that the Acts do not interfere with wage contracts, but only with the mode of payment of wages. That may perhaps not be strictly true in one sense, for you cannot interfere with the mode of payment without to a certain extent interfering with the contract. The intention of the legislature, however, was not to raise wages by Act of Parliament, but to forbid certain modes of paying them, and that fact is necessary to be borne in mind when we come to deal with the cases. Again, what is forbidden is a deduction from wages or an illegal payment of wages, not a deduction made in order to arrive at wages. Therefore, it is legal to deduct charges for gas or materials supplied, from the nominal money wage, in order to arrive at the real wages. In that connection perhaps I had better deal at once with the case of Chawner v. Cummins, which arose in 1846, and the still more interesting case of Archer v. James and another. I recommend these cases, especially the latter, to the Committee. The judgments are so ingenious in their argument that it is almost a literary and intellectual gratification to read them.

By Mr. Ramsay Macdonald.

16. Are these included in the Parliamentary Blue-book?—Yes. Perhaps I had better go to the leading case—I think it is the leading case—upon the law of Truck, namely, Archer v. James. That case illustrates how easy it is for a layman or for an artisan to think that the law has laid down one thing, whereas when we come to read the judgments, it is clear that whatever Parliament intended to do it has done something else. The case here was one of set off. The plaintiff, an artificer, was employed by the defendants, manufacturers of hosiery goods at Nottingham, as a framework knitter, in making stocking heels out of wool supplied by the defendants. The defendants regulated the amount of work to be done by the quantity of wool which they gave out each week. The plaintiff worked in a room in their factory, with the defendants' frames and machines, he finding mainly the labour. The plaintiff was paid for his work weekly on the basis of 7d. per dozen heels, subject to about 3s. 9d. deduction per week for the use of the frames, machines, room, gas, etc. He sought to recover these deductions as a violation of the Truck Act. Were they illegal under these Acts? One would have said at first, roughly, that the deductions seemed to be contrary to the Act, several sections of which prohibited deductions from wages.

By the Chairman.

17. You are now referring to the 1831 Act?—Yes. The contention would be that the firm had no right under that Act to give him gas or the use of a frame in payment for his work. Justice Keating took that view, and his arguments will be found upon page 29 of the Parliamentary Blue-book. He says, "The question in the present case seems shortly to be this; was any other thing than money had by the workman and given by the master as a recompense, reward, or remuneration for any labour done. In other words, were the benefits represented by the 3s. 9d., namely, the use of the frames, light, etc., given by the defendants to the plaintiff in exchange for and as part of the earnings of his labour or not? That they were in fact given by the master to the workman, and had by the workman from the master is as unquestionable as that they are not current coin and were not given for nothing. For what then were they given except for the labour of the workman? Clearly as it seems to me for nothing else. The workman had nothing else to give for them but his labour, and gave nothing else. I am, therefore, unable to perceive how it can be successfully contended that the plaintiff was not paid his wages as above defined otherwise than in money." In other words, Justice Keating treated as the wages the amount that was to be paid for the stocking heels without any deduction, but Baron Bramwell took an entirely different view.

18. Before you pass from that, may I remind you that Justice Keating pointed out that the 3s. 9d. per week was a fixed deduction, whereas the amount of labour rendered might be a variable quantity?—What I wanted to show was, now, the way in which Justice Bramwell answered Justice Keating, and Bramwell's view has been supported ever since. A reading of his judgment shakes one's confidence in the other view, and makes one feel that he was right. What Baron Bramwell says in effect is that the use of frames and the gas, etc., are not supplied as a reward of labour, but as a means of labour, which is a totally different thing, and that what the Act of 1831 was intended to forbid was the giving of goods, etc., as the reward of labour. If you give certain things as a means of labour, you may deduct them, and the cases seem to support that view.

19. To support Baron Bramwell's view?—Yes. And, speaking as a lawyer, I think it is the right view. What should have been forbidden was the deduction of anything from a named sum of money, in order to arrive at the wages, and in that form these deductions would have been impossible. I don't know that it would have been desired to go quite so far in those early days, when industry was only in the transition stage from working in private houses to working in factories, and when many things were supplied, sometimes by the workman and sometimes by the employer, which were charged for, or included in wages. The definition of wages in Section 25 as the reward of labour prevented the judge's saying that a sum of money deducted for gas, etc., was anything more than a deduction from a nominal sum in order to arrive at wages. If your Committee wish to recommend a change of law in that respect, care would have to be taken not to get on the wrong tack. If the legislature enacts that wages shall only be paid in coin, then fines and all sorts of things would be left legal, and might be deducted not as from wages, but in order to arrive at the wages. I do not think it possible for any lawyer looking at the section in question, and reading the case of Archer v. James, to do otherwise than come, perhaps reluctantly, to the conclusion that the decision of Baron Bramwell was right. The Act itself had destroyed the chance of preventing deductions of that character.

20. Does not most, if not the whole, of the difficulty, arise from the wording of the definition of wages in Section 25?—That is exactly what I think.

21. I refer especially to the expression, "or other thing" in that section. If something else than money was to be part of the wages, I don't see how it would be possible to resist the conclusion that, notwithstanding the provision of Section 3, which says that wages are to be paid in current coin, Section 25 permits the payment in current coin, plus some other thing?—That is perfectly true. If gas is one of those "other things" so might the stool be upon which he sits at his work. There would be no end to it, and an employer would not be able to supply anything to a workman.

22. I am not quite prepared to say after reading the clauses, but I would like your view upon it, whether the mind of Parliament was actually made up in 1831 to having wages paid in money alone. I refer especially to the definition in Section 25. No doubt we have developed a great deal in the ensuing seventy-five years?—I quite agree with your view. I don't think the mind of Parliament does appear to have been made quite up to that extent. I think the judges have always been nearly right in saying that primarily the Act of 1831 was directed against the payment of the reward of labour in the form of goods, and that it was not intended to go much beyond that. We have subsequently progressed very much.

Mr. H. H. S. Cunynghame, C.B.

2 May 1906.

23. Without unduly interrupting your narrative, may I remind you that the frame rent question appears to have produced a special statute of its own, in 1874?—Yes, would you like me to deal with that now?

24. I think it would be convenient, as it comes in historically at this point?—The case of Archer v. James was preceded by the case of Chawner v. Cummins in 1846, and they both dealt with deductions for frame rent, and things of that sort, in the soft goods trade. The report of the Royal Commission in 1872, to which I have already alluded, contained a whole section upon the hosiery trade, and shocking cases were made out of extortion upon the part of some employers. It was shown, and we could go into the facts if necessary, that they were charging much too high a rent for these frames, that in some cases the rents in the course of a year or so paid the whole cost of the frames. Exceedingly unfair rents were deducted, and this caused a great agitation; ultimately the Hosiery Act of 1874 was passed and it is remarkable that only in this Act was it attempted to deal with deductions for materials and goods supplied by the master in order to enable the workmen to work.

25. In Section 1 of the Act of 1874 there seems to be dawning a somewhat firmer resolve on the part of Parliament as to payment of wages in coin alone. It prescribes that the earnings of labour shall be actually and positively made payable in the current coin of the realm, and not otherwise, without any deduction or stoppage save and except for bad or disputed workmanship. The words "actually and positively" are a rather peculiar expression to find used in an Act of Parliament?—With regard to that section, what I should like to say is this, that the man who drew it had apparently not got the case of Archer v. James thoroughly in his mind. He could not have appreciated it, or he would never have used the phrase about the full and entire amount of all wages, etc. He should have said the full and entire amount of the money contracted to be paid in order to arrive at the real wages. In the case of Archer v. James it was held that the reward of labour was only what the worker got after the deductions in question had been made. The draughtsman in this case seems to have been fond of piling up epithets which did not really strengthen his case. The words "actually and positively" do not seem to me to add anything to the effect of the provision.

26. The use of the word "nett" in the clause seems rather, does it not, to imply a positive prescription by Parliament that in that trade nothing is to be reckoned as wages except a nett sum of money?—I think that word is the best phrase in the whole section. The addition of such words as "without any deduction or stoppage of any description whatever" is rather a piling up of epithets and only confuses. Again, many of the words in the 7th Section defining wages are redundant.

27. A dilemma seems to be created when Section 7 defines wages as any money or other thing had or contracted to be paid. What does that "other thing" mean except goods?—That is among the difficulties which have more than anything else in this matter rather tied our hands all these years.

28. There may be a difficulty in equating Sections 7 and 1 of the Act of 1874, but it occurs to me that the strong language used in Section 1 shows that by that time Parliament did intend, "actually and positively," to quote its own phrase, to make nett wages the only real wages?—Yes, in the hosiery trade that is perfectly plain.

29. Perhaps by adopting the old-fashioned definition of wages Parliament in this case may have rather lapsed from its good intention, but that good intention seems to be clearly made out in the earlier portion of the Act, namely, that it was working up towards the idea of nett wages?—Yes. My next point on the general principle is this, that it is good legal payment of wages to pay them to another person at the workman's request although possibly such an act might constitute an agreement as to how wages are to be expended, and hence be illegal.

Mr. H. H. S. Cunynghame, C.B.

2 May 1906.

30. Have we now passed from the 1874 Act?—Yes, I am now dealing with the main Acts, which raise difficulties of a different description. If a workman sent his wife to get his wages and they were paid to her, that would be considered equivalent to a payment to the workman, but a point arises as to whether if the employer at the request of the workman pays the wages or any part of them to a shop where the workman owes money, not the employer's shop, would that be a legal payment to the workman. Would it be equivalent to a workman drawing a cheque upon his employer? There is no doubt that under the Truck Acts of 1831 that is a perfectly good payment. Payment could be pleaded in such a case on the ground that payment to anyone at my request is payment to me. If a workman agreed to belong to a benefit society and owed money to that society, and the employer at his request paid part of his money to that society in discharge of the debt and deducted it from his wages that would not be a true deduction from wages at all, but it would be a payment. It would be a payment made to his creditor at his request. Difficulties upon that point led to the case of Hewlett v. Allen, which is reported in page 56 of the Parliamentary Blue-book, and there is also another case which has only been decided about a month ago by the House of Lords. Perhaps I might deal at once with these cases in illustration. The case of Hewlett v. Allen began in 1892; the plaintiff was a confectionery worker and when she entered the service of the defendants she signed an agreement by which she bound herself to conform to all the rules and regulations of the firm. One of the rules was that all the employées were to become members of the Sick and Accident Club, and the rules of the club provided for a weekly subscription to the club funds proportionate to the wages of each contributor. A deduction was accordingly made each week from the plaintiff's wages and paid over to the fund. On leaving the defendant's service the plaintiff sued to recover the amount of such deduction except so much as represented her contribution for medicine or medical attendance. The club was called "The Amicable Griffins' Sick and Benefit Society." In the County Court judgment was entered for the plaintiff, but the Divisional Court reversed this judgment and directed judgment to be entered for the defendant, whereupon the plaintiff appealed. The case is an interesting one and raises a point which the legislature apparently did not contemplate being met by the Act. What the employers did was when a sum of money became due from the plaintiff to that sick club they paid out to the club on her account at her request. It was not a sick club in which they were pecuniarily interested. Now comes the delicate point: had the Truck Act been violated? In one respect it appears that it certainly had, because here was an agreement as to the manner in which wages should be laid out and expended, but although that might have given rise to a prosecution, this was an action by the plaintiff to recover back the money, and to such an action as that the plea of payment would be a good answer. Therefore, although the employers had broken the Truck Act and rendered themselves liable to a prosecution or to punishment under the criminal section of the Act, yet when the woman sought to recover the money they were able to plead payment, as they had paid the money at her request and by her authority to the person to whom she owed it. Every penny of her wages had been paid, partly to her and partly to the society.

31. Is your view confirmed by the Judges that there was a breach of the Truck Act on its other side?—The various Judges both above and below, differed in their judgments and reasoning. It is one of the most confusing cases, and although I cannot reconcile the various judgments, I have endeavoured to give what I believe to be the gist of the matter.

32. I appreciate the importance of the point, and I understand your view of Hewlett v. Allen is that on account of the contract that the plaintiff entered into she could not successfully recover money which had been paid away on her account and at her request to this Sick Benefit Fund?—Yes, to those to whom she owed the money and who could have sued her for it. A plea of set-off would not have sufficed, but a plea of payment was a good plea, just as if she had sent her husband with her authority to get her wages.

33. On the other hand you incline to the view that notwithstanding there was a contravention of the Truck Act?—Yes.

34. In what respect?—Because she and her employers had agreed as to the manner in which the wages should be laid out and expended, which is one of the things forbidden under the Act.

35. Does it mean that she had no right to complain of what had been done by her own request?—I do not think we can go quite so far as that. It is not everything done at the request of a woman in contravention of the Truck Act that will prevent her recovering. I think as the Act is drawn it was impossible to say that the payment to the Amicable Griffin Society was not a payment, and consequently every penny that the plaintiff had earned had been actually paid in coin.

By Mrs. Tennant.

36. You say that she owed the money and that therefore payment can be pleaded, but can it be said that she owed it under a contract declared by one of the sections to be illegal?—The contract between her and the Amicable Griffin Society was not illegal. If I agree with you that you shall spend some of your wages in a certain shop and if that contract is a breach of the Truck Acts, it is not the contract that you make with the shop itself that is the breach; the Amicable Griffin could have sued for the money. The difficulty was that if the Amicable Griffin had attached that money in the employer's hands, the employer would have had no defence, although they might have sued her to recover judgment for that money. I have endeavoured to gather the gist of the matter from the judgment of Lord Justice Bowen, but I must invite the Chairman to read the case for himself and he will correct me if I am mistaken.

By the Chairman.

37. I see that Justice Bowen read the judgment of Lord Esher and himself. It was apparently a joint judgment?—Yes. The case came before Mr. Justice Day in the Court below, and then in the Court of Appeal it came before Justice Bowen and Lord Esher, who agreed. The case afterwards went to the House of Lords, where judgments were read by Lord Herschell, Lord Watson, Lord Morris, and Lord Shand. It is excedingly difficult to reconcile all these judgments with one another. What the whole really amounts to seems to be this; that whilst it might have been illegal for that agreement to be made, yet in this particular case it was impossible to treat the payment to the Amicable Griffins, who were creditors of the plaintiff, as otherwise than a payment to her.

38. Is your view confirmed by the sentence in Lord Watson's judgment, in which he says that the case must be disposed of on the same footing as if each contribution had been advanced by the defendants under express authority from the appellant?—Exactly. In contrast with that I may next refer you to the case of Williams v. North's Navigation Colliery, which began in April, 1904. The facts in that case were very simple. It had been decided by a magistrate's court under the Employers and Workmen Act that a certain sum of money was due from the workman to the employer by way of damage for breaches of contract, and the employers set that off against wages. They said, "Here is a certain sum in cash due from the workman to us and we owe him a certain amount of wages. Why may we not deduct the one from the other?" The workman denied their right to deduct that sum. The Court below held that the employer was wrong and gave decision for the workman. That decision was not maintained at the next stage, but when the case went to the House of Lords it was ruled that there was a difference between this case and that of Hewlett v. Allen. A set-off was held to be quite a different thing from a plea of payment. The man must be paid his wages, and the deduction of something on account of a perfectly valid decision as to what he owed was not a payment to him. The Appeal Court held that the employers had no right to set off against wages payable to the workman any sum of money due from the workman, although they might have had a right to pay the money to another person at the request of the workman. That is an important decision according to the workman's view of Truck, because it shows clearly that no deductions may be made from wages. Presently, when I come to deal with fines, we will see what would have been the effect, perhaps, if that case had been decided earlier. The question of fines, to my mind, is one of the most difficult of all. When you say to a man, "I will pay you £1 a week, but if you do something I will fine you," is his wages £1 a week minus the fine, or is it £1 a week with the fine deducted? Let me put it in that way——

39. Before you approach that point I would like to put this to you. In Hewlett v. Allen it was part of the facts of the case—apart from the law altogether, a very important part of the facts—that the payments that had been made to that Sick Benevolent Fund were payments of a quasi-compulsory nature, because it was substantially a condition of the man having employment that those payments would be permissible, in fact, that the workman would join the fund. I do not suppose that that in any way affected—I can hardly imagine how it would affect—the judgment of the legal situation? —I think that a number of the judges felt that they were being compelled to a decision which was not at all in accordance with what Parliament intended. Everybody felt that it certainly was not intended that these workmen should be practically compelled to join the Amicable Griffins.

40. Will you let me put my point to you in another way? It depended, as we have concluded, substantially on the doctrine that by the law of agency these men had been in a situation equal to paying away by express instructions a certain amount. Would it have made any difference, in your judgment, to the case of Hewlett v. Allen if effect had been given to this consideration: that there could be no express instructions, no proper doctrine of agency, because the conditions of employment initially rendered the person who was supposed to give the instructions, absolutely helpless?—I do not remember that that point was taken. It is a very good one. I quite see the point you mean.

41. I am dealing with it, of course, on what we might call the political or general aspect?—You mean that the employers were not to be heard to say that they had received such instructions, they were stopped from saying that they had received such instructions, because such instructions would be in pursuance of an illegal agreement. I think that would have been a capital argument.

42. From the political point of view, the point of view that we are more particularly anxious about, you will observe that the doctrine of agency can hardly be said in full terms to apply to a case where the condition of employment is such that the worker is absolutely precluded from giving such instructions, because it is a condition of getting into the employment that such instructions are supposed to be illegal?—I quite see the point. It is most difficult to make good sense of the whole of those different decisions—to harmonise them. I think your point is an excellent one.

43. I wanted to have that point put before my colleagues on the Committee, because we may have to consider, at a subsequent stage, whether we can interfere with or rectify a position which, on the argument I have stated, seems somewhat abnormal?—We shall all implore you, I am sure, to recommend some such alteration of the law as will render it impossible ever to raise such an argument as that. I am sure that the keynote of the whole thing is, the payment of wages, and what you will have to do is to consider carefully what is meant by the payment of "wages" throughout the whole of these Acts.

44. I should like you once more to let me put this situation to you. The workman approaches the employer and asks for employment. The law of the land is that the employer must pay wages in full. But the workman cannot get employment from that employer except under conditions in which, ab ante, as the lawyers would put it, a certain deduction has already been made from the wages which are to be received, namely, the deduction which is set up by the contribution to a sick benevolent fund. Do you think that that is in accordance with the policy of the law. Is it not the policy of the law to leave both parties free, at the start of the contract, to agree to certain deductions from the payments to be made?—I am not altogether sure of that. I think there are indications throughout these Acts, and notably in the Hosiery Act, that, in a hesitating way, the law intended to say that these two parties were not on quite an equal footing in contracting, and intended to give some protection—I purposely do not say benefit—but some protection to the workman against some form of inequitable or ill-understood agreement. I think the law did intend to go beyond its usual scope and to do that; but, because the draughtsmen of these Acts never seem to have made up their minds what it was they did intend to do, over and above simply leaving it to the law of contract, this confusion has arisen. They had a vague notion that something was to be done, and they did it, I think, in a very imperfect and halting way.

Mr. H. H. S. Cunynghame, C.B.

2 May 1906.

45. We are much obliged to you for elucidating that point. Now, will you proceed?—Then, my fifth point is that the workman's right to recover back money illegally deducted is not necessarily co-extensive with the liability of the employer to a fine for the improper deduction. The civil and criminal remedies stand on a somewhat different footing. That has been sufficiently illustrated by the case of Hewlett v. Allen, if I have interpreted it rightly. Then, the last proposition I put forward is, that an employer has not, as against wages, the usual right of set-off which belongs in general to debtors. That is decided by the case of Williams v. North's Navigation Collieries. He must pay the wages, without deduction in full; he has got no right of set-off. Then, the next point I will deal with is, Are fines legal under the Truck Acts? That point actively arose when I was here, and it was the most distracting point you could imagine. The question may be looked at from one of two points of view. Suppose, for instance, you had a fine of 2d. for being late; to be perfectly moderate, and so as to raise no question of exaggeration, suppose there is a fine of 1d. for being late; suppose that everybody concedes that that is a reasonable fine; of course, many people contend that fines are in essence unreasonable—but that is another matter; suppose it is conceded that a fine of 1d. for being late is reasonable and fair, and it is agreed to by both parties; then came the question; Is that legal under the Truck Acts? In Archer v. James it was laid down that you could only arrive at wages after making certain deductions for gas; could you say the same thing about fines; when a woman had contracted to work for 7s. 6d. a week with a fine of 1d. if she was late, what was her wage; what was the reward of her labour contracted to be paid? You could look at it from two points of view. You could say, the reward of her labour was to be 7s. 6d.; on the arising of a certain event she was to become liable to pay something to her employer which he might legally deduct or set off. Or from the other point of view you might say, No; the true wage is 7s. 6d., and anything that is properly deductible by way of fine is not something that has been earned at all; it is not part of the wage; it is not part of the reward of her labour, so that the true wage would not be 7s. 6d., but would be 7s. 6d. less the 1d., for that is all she was to get if she was late. This point, I may say, distracted our minds here, and the more so because there were no very clear cases on the matter. We unearthed a case that had never been reported in the books, but of which the Treasury had had a shorthand writer's note taken, and you will find it printed in my memorandum. It is the case of Redgrave v. Kelly, in 1889. There Mr. Justice Mathews, in a well-reasoned judgment, laid it down explicitly that fines were legal. However, one does not feel so satisfied with that judgment as one does with some of the others. I am inclined to think that if an employer agrees with a workman that 7s. 6d. a week is to be paid and that there are to be certain fines, the true wage is 7s. 6d., and not 7s. 6d. minus the fines. But, whatever may be our view of the cases, I implore the Committee to recommend such changes in the law as will make any question of that sort quite impossible to be raised. It again emphasises the necessity of in these Acts defining what is meant by "wages." The more the Committee go into this matter they will find that to be the crux and the main difficulty of the whole question.

46. In Redgrave v. Kelly, I observe that it was practically an ex parte argument; there was no contradiction?—

Mr. H. H. S. Cunynghame, C.B.

2 May 1906.

Quite so; it is not a very satisfactory case from that point of view. Then I have referred you to the case of Willis v. Thorp, in 1875. That was a case under the Hosiery Act. I do not think I need trouble the Committee by referring to that case now; I am dealing with main principles; but it is another illustration of the inefficient draughting of these Acts. Then there is the case of Squire v. Bayer, I want to mention that, because it seems to me that that was a case of a most cruel and improper fine. It seems that during the dinner-hour some of the work girls danced, and they were fined for doing an act tending to damage the employers. The judges held that the fine was legal, because the magistrates below had held that this dancing had created some dust, which it was not proved had injured, but which it was said might have injured, the fabrics, and therefore it was an act contrary to good order, and an act in respect of which a fine might be levied. I put that forward as illustrating a case of a thoroughly bad fine. Why, in the plantations the masters are delighted to have their negroes dancing to the tambourine. These unfortunate girls were enjoying a little dancing, probably a very good thing for them and for their efficiency as workers; and, whatever might be the law, I call it most heartless to impose a fine for such a thing as that. I should certainly urge on the Committee that a fine of that sort should be rendered impossible in future.

47. May I point out to you that in Squire v. Bayer the rule which was held to have been invaded was of a very vague and general description. It was to the following effect: "All workers shall observe good order and decorum while in the factory." What happened was that one of the young women played on a harp and another danced to the tune?—Yes. I think it was a "Jew's harp," with a comb and piece of paper.

48. A fine was imposed in consequence, and ultimately it was affirmed that the whole of that transaction was legal?—Yes. We have had a number of other cases of fines, which will be explained to you in detail by the inspectors who will be called before you. Then, the next point I have down is, deductions for spoiled or negligent work. This again is a very difficult point indeed. Suppose a case of a mere non-payment of wages that have not been earned because the work has not been properly done; where does that end, and where does a true fine properly begin. A girl enters into a contract with an employer to make 100 rosettes at so much a rosette. It is provided that if she spoils a rosette a deduction shall be made in respect of that from her wages. You can almost treat that as a non-payment of what has not been earned. Suppose she is employed to make 100 rosettes; she makes 99, and spoils one: she has never really earned the remainder. I do think the deductions for spoiled work come very near indeed to non-earned wages. But the moment that such deductions go beyond the value of the actual wages not earned—if for instance you begin to make the deduction for the spoiling of one out of 100 rosettes bigger than the mere deduction of the one-hundredth part of the wages for the 100 rosettes—then you are on different ground altogether. You are coming to something in the nature of damages—perhaps perfectly proper damages, but still, damages to be recovered by the employer against the workman. Therefore in dealing with deductions for spoiled work, one has to bear in mind, I think, always, the difference between a deduction which merely represents money not earned, and something which goes beyond that, and is in reality damages to the employer for insufficient work. But then it may be said, suppose the workwoman does not make the hundredth rosette, what damages has the employer got? The answer would be—however small a thing it may seem—"There has been my capital lying idle, and I am entitled to something for that." Of course, we are dealing now with very small points, but I am simply bringing out as well as I can the theoretical differences. It has always been an immense difficulty in our department here to distinguish in one's mind between that which was in reality a non-payment for work not done (which of course it is very difficult to oppose being put on) and something in the nature of a claim for damages by the employer. When you come to the latter, I think it should always be regulated. I do not think that employers should be allowed simply to deduct anything they please for alleged damages done to themselves, but great care should be taken properly to circumscribe their rights in that respect. Now, sir, I am in a position to come to the Act of 1896. That Act was prepared when I was here, and I had some share in the preparation of it. It deals with three distinctly different things First, it deals with materials provided by the master for the workman for his work. You will notice that the draughtsman of the Act of 1896 took care to keep Archer v. James in mind.

49. In what way?—It says in Section 3—"(1) An employer shall not make any contract with any workman for any deduction from the sum contracted to be paid by the employer to the workman"—you will observe that the word "wages" is not used there—"or for any payment by the employer to the workman for or in respect of the use or supply of materials, tools or machines, standing room, light, heat, or for or in respect of any other thing, to be done or provided by the employer in relation to the work or labour of the workman." When that was drawn, Archer v. James was distinctly had in mind. You will notice that it is "any deduction from the sum contracted to be paid by the employer to the workman"; those words were carefully used, and the word "wages" was not used. An endeavour was made to provide that in every single case of the character of that which arose in Archer v. James, in the case of any deduction made from the nominal wages of the workman, there should be proper notice, and the deduction should not exceed the true value to the employer, and should be a fair and reasonable charge. You will see that in the first section there is the provision, "An employer shall not make any contract with any workman for any deduction from the sum contracted to be paid by the employer to the workman, or for any payment to the employer by the workman, for or in respect of any fine." There again, you have an endeavour to meet Archer v. James; I do not know whether it does it, but I think it does. It has been held that, whatever way you choose to read the word "wages" into the Act of 1831, fines must comply with these requirements. Whether fines ought to be done away with altogether is another matter, which I will deal with presently.

50. The Act of 1896 then substituted for the confused term "wages" the phrase "the sum contracted to be paid by the employer to the workman."?—Yes. I am not sure that that is a solution of the matter, and that you will not find something wrong in the definition; still, it is better than "wages."

51. Anyhow, one sees the mind of Parliament?—Exactly; and I can answer for it that it was intended that the doctrine in Archer v. James should not be allowed to neutralise the benefit of these clauses. I should like to say this at once; the Act of 1896 was undoubtedly a great benefit to the working classes, particularly to the women, but I should very much have preferred to have a clean sweep of the old Acts, and a new statute altogether. Then, the next point is, deductions or payments in respect of damaged goods. The words in Section 2 are: "An employer shall not make any contract with any workman for any deduction from the sum contracted to be paid by the employer to the workman, or for any payment to the employer by the workman for in respect of bad or negligent work or injury to the materials or other property of the employer." We have not had much difficulty in the courts on the wording of these sections. The real difficulty we have had is, the difficulty of getting the magistrates always to see that fines may be oppressive and deductions unfair having regard to the low wages of operatives. We have had case after case upon that. On the whole, I think the Act has stood water pretty well. Of course, it is not for me to go into the reasons which motived the action of the Government in those days in preferring to leave the phraseology of "deductions or payments in respect of fines," "deductions or payments in respect of damaged goods," and "deductions or payments in respect of materials"; I cannot criticise or suggest why they did it; but, admitting that fines were necessary (upon which I shall have something to say presently) this was an attempt, at all events, to make them certain, and to provide that they should be reasonable. I think there are further restrictions that are needed, and those I will deal with later.

52. The two main restrictions in these sections which are fronted always, in each subsection, by the word "unless," are first that they are to be in writing, and secondly, that they are to be reasonable?—Yes; that is the gist of the whole Act, put into two or three words.

SECOND DAY.

Friday, 4th May, 1906.

PRESENT.

The Right Hon. THOMAS SHAW, K.C., M.P., Lord Advocate for Scotland (Chairman).

FREDERICK CAWLEY, Esq., M.P.
MALCOLM DELEVINGNE, Esq.
J. RAMSAY MACDONALD, Esq., M.P.
FREDERICK MADDISON, Esq., M.P.
Mrs. H. J. TENNANT.

THOMAS EDWARD BETTANY, Esq. (Secretary).

Mr. H. H. S. CUNYNGHAME, C.B. was recalled; and further examined.

Mr. H. H. S. Cunynghame, C.B.

4 May 1906.

By the Chairman.

53. What point were you on at the close of last meeting?—I was on the last page but one of my proof, nearly at the bottom—down to the end of No. 6, and I was going on to the seventh heading. But if you will allow me before going on with that I would like to say one word about two points that were raised by Mrs. Tennant and by yourself about Hewlett v. Allen. I do not want to go into it at any length, but only to say these two things. The question of the illegality of the contract is to be found dealt with in Lord Bowen's judgment, and he finds that as between the Amicable Griffins and the woman the contract was perfectly legal. The other point seems to me a very important one, and it was this, as I understand it, that it would not be right to allow the employers to take and urge an illegal contract made by themselves by way of deducting from her wages money that they had paid improperly in consequence of an improper contract with her. The only answer that on reflection I can see to that is this: I submit it to your better judgment, whether it is not very much like a gaming contract, in which neither side can recover. They could not recover against her because they would have to plead an illegal contract, but in this case she was the plaintiff, and she was, it seems to me, somewhat in the position of a person endeavouring to recover money paid in pursuance of a gaming contract, and she would be unable to get it back. So that they were both in a quandary.

54. I know that crosses one's mind naturally as the kind of argument to be used in a Court of Law about it, but I must be allowed to say before we go any further that it is rather a serious way to put it, because it emphasises upon the one hand the total illegality of the contract, and I wish to say further that it is far from satisfying my mind that it would be a sound method of treating the subject. However, the point does not seem to have been dealt with, and I only casually allude to it, because you have been good enough to address yourself to it?—It must be remembered, too, that in that case some of the judges held that the contract itself was not against the policy of the Acts. That is a principle which, with great respect to them, I can hardly agree with, for reasons which I will give in a minute when I come to Section 23. But, first, I would say a few words as to the persons to whom the Act applies. I am not going to labour that, but it clearly applies only to manual labourers, whatever they are. It is only persons who work with their hands and not with their heads. A great many cases arose, and about ten, I think, have been decided on that point. I do not know how far it will be considered important to go into these cases. They run very fine. I will give an instance. Take the case of a 'bus conductor. Is a 'bus conductor a man who works with hand or head? It puzzled the judges a good deal too. They said at any rate as he did not lift people in and out of the omnibus he must be regarded as a money taker or clerk, whereas the driver, who did work with his hands—pulling the reins—would be a labourer, so that you get to the condition of things in which if you have a Truck Act you will have to apply it for the benefit of the driver and not the conductor, both working on the same omnibus. The above example merely illustrates the fact that it may be necessary for the Committee to consider how far the definition of the people to whom the Act applies requires consideration. I will not deal more with those cases, because I should only weary you with it, but they illustrate the struggles the judges have had to try and find out the proper application of the Act.

55. Would it be convenient for you to interpolate into your evidence at this stage a reference to those cases by name?—Yes, I could do that quite easily.* On the other hand there is another question which is much more important about the persons to whom the Act applies, and that is out-workers. The original Act contemplated the Act only applying where there was a relation of employer to workmen. That is, I take it, in the sense in which the person employing could be said to be a master, as it were. Then the question arose there about a person taking home work to be done. Can the man who gives it out be said to be his master, as it were, or is not he rather in the nature of a sort of purchaser? Inasmuch as you could not say that it was a personal contract, that is to say, when you gave out work that the person to whom you gave it out must with his own hands perform it, but that he was at liberty to get it done by his son or uncle or aunt, or a stranger for that matter, the judges decided that it must be held that that state of things did not constitute such an employment as was contemplated by the Act. Consequently, from the very beginning the Act was held not to be applicable to out-workers. That was endeavoured to be remedied by the Act of 1887, Section 10, but so restricted was the drafting of Section 10 that it did not remedy the evil. It only provided for cases where goods were sold, which would mean cases where property passed.

By Mr. Ramsay Macdonald.

56. Might we have the section?—It is Section 10 of the Act of 1887. You will see that the principle of dealing with out-workers was quite recognised by the law. There is no doubt about the desire to do it, but they did not do it effectively.

By the Chairman.

57. You are referring to the earlier portion of the section?—That is it.

58. That reads: "Where articles are made by a person at his own home, or otherwise, without the employment of any person under him except a member of his own family, the principal Act and this Act shall apply as if he were a workman, and the shopkeeper, dealer, trader, or other person buying the articles in the way of trade were his employer, and the provisions of this Act with respect to the payment of wages shall apply as if the price of an article were wages earned during the seven days next preceding"?—Yes. That would not apply where you did not get a buying. There must be the buying there; that is to say, there must be a transference of property. The consequence is that if you only give out work to be done you cannot be said to buy your own property back; the article is yours. It is quite true that if you only provide the wool, and he makes it into stockings, it may be just possible the contract may be one of purchase, but I call attention merely to the probable limited effect of that section at all events.

* The most important of these cases are:—Morgan v. London General Omnibus Company, 12 Q.B.D. 201 and 13 Q.B.D. 832; Cook v. North Metropolitan Tramways Company, 18 Q.B.D. 683; Hunt v. Great Northern Railway Company, 2 Q.B. 189, deciding that an Omnibus Conductor, a Tramcar Driver, and a Goods Guard respectively are not "workmen" within the meaning of the Act.

Mr. H. H. S. Cunynghame, C.B.

4 May 1906.

59. By the use of the word "buying," that is ?—Yes, by the use of the word "buying." It seems to me an unfortunate word to have used there if you meant to include all out-workers.

60. I quite agree ?—I am only entitled to say that though those opinions which I give on the Truck Act are my personal ones, I know I am justified in saying that it is certainly considered here to be very desirable to clear up that difficulty and to apply the Act to out-workers. Your Lordship is aware of the case of Squire v. The Midland Lace Company, which really put an end nearly to out-workers as coming under the Act. I will not go into that case further unless your Lordship wishes. It simply decided that where work was given out to be done, the relation of employer to employed did not exist. It is a very curious thing that one important case on that point was not cited before the Court. It is one case that they ought to have cited. I do not know what to say with regard to it. It may be doubted whether that is quite good law, but whether it is good law or not it ought to be cleared up, I think. I should have ventured to think that out-workers were included in the Act. I do not know that I need go into that case at greater length.

61. Have any cases reached the House of Lords on the out-workers question ?—Nothing of more authority than that. That case went to the Court of Appeal on that point, and that is the last one.

By Mr. Delevingne.

62. That went only to the High Court ?—That went only to the High Court, but at all events we endeavoured to apply it. We made a final attempt to apply it to out-workers and we failed.

By the Chairman.

63. Would it be convenient for you if I just asked you this question. Although the first part of Section 10 clearly applies to the situation of articles being made by a worker for someone else in his or her (the worker's) own home, has a result of the application of the judges' minds to that section been so to work upon the term "buying articles" as practically to evacuate the sense of the statute altogether ?—What I think may be put is this, that previous cases have decided that the Act of 1831 did not apply to contracts or to contractors. Then the question would arise, did Section 10 make any difference—had it cured the evil ? I am inclined to think it had not, except in the case strictly of buying.

64. But now you see that just brings out the point of my question. Is there any doubt in your mind when you look at the earlier portion of Section 10 that at all events the mind of Parliament was addressed to the question of endeavouring to find a remedy for the case of the out-workers ?—Clearly. It seems to me clear that it was intended that it should apply.

65. Has the legal construction been found to be such as to make it necessary that we must conclude to the best of our judgment what must have been the mind of Parliament? —I think so certainly, but I want to say this, that I do not know that you can clearly come to a conclusion on the decisions of the judges. It seems that in the original Act the word "employer" was not happy in its application, and the judges were in great difficulties.

66. I am fully alive in all I say to the difficulties which would necessarily arise in a judicial construction of the Act. The only thing is as to the view you put. I want to be satisfied in my own mind that the effect of the decisions has been such as upon the whole to convince us that substantially the intention of Parliament has not been carried out on account of the language which Parliament employed ?—Yes, I think that is so, and the way of putting it is this: Look at the Mill Act. When you look at that Act and read through it you will see the very case of the wool people to whom the work was given out. In those days it was the normal way of carrying on an industry, and from history it is to be concluded, I think, that it was intended by the legislature to be so applied that when a man was not a mere vendor, but was in any sense a workman, he could be protected. Then the next point I had in my mind, and which I hope to deal with, was the bonus system. That is a very interesting and delicate point of law which has just been fought out in Ireland. We failed on that. There were some girls who were employed to work in a factory for wages. There again the question arose as to what the "wages" were in the case. They were to get after the rate of 10s. a week if they were punctual, but only after the rate of 8s. a week if they were once unpunctual. Here then the question arose, was the wage 8s. a week for work and 2s. for being punctual, or 10s. a week, and not get the 2s. if they were not punctual. The court dealt at once with the whole question of wages, and I will read the judgments presently. The whole question of what was wages was raised. The facts were that a girl was late one morning. She was locked out for a few hours. She lost a proportion of her wages, because the wages were to run proportionately to the time employed. If you worked half a week it was half wages. It was not a lump sum, but a running sum. The amount of wages deducted represented the time she was locked out, namely, 4d. But when it came to paying her they gave her 8s. minus 4d., and took the whole 2s. off. You may assume for the purposes of our argument here that the Act of 1896 so far as it could be complied with was at once complied with. A point arose on that, but assuming that they had given notice and done everything necessary under the Act of 1896, the question arises does this arrangement amount to an agreement for a fine ? There is no doubt in common sense everybody sees it must be a fine surely, because you may call a thing a bonus if you like, but you cannot ride a coach and six through the whole of the Act of 1896 simply by calling things bonuses. There are two ways of looking at it. The most skilful way of putting the argument would be to say there were two sums due, both of them wages. You must maintain they were both wages, because they were the reward of labour. You did not give the sums for nothing. According to this view the wages consisted of two things, 8s. for a week's work, or a proportionately less sum for an incomplete week, and then, in addition to that, 2s. more of wages on condition of your never being late. The employers would then say, "We pay 8s. and keep back 2s. Why ? Not because the 2s. is a deduction from wages, but because the employées have earned the 8s. but have not earned the 2s."

By the Chairman.

67. You are referring to the argument, I gather ?—I am referring to the argument. The above is I think what the employers might have argued, but what was argued before the Irish magistrates was that the 2s. was not wages, and the magistrates took that view. I submit it is erroneous. If the 2s. is not wages I should like to know what it is. I think on that point they will be overridden. I hope they will, because it is perfectly plain it is a clear evasion of the Act. If you are allowed to do that, instead of saying your wages are 7s. 6d. a week, and for being late we will fine you 2d., you will be allowed to say your wages shall be 7s. 4d. with a bonus of 2d. if you are in time. But I cannot believe that the courts ever will allow a juggle with words to take place, because case after case has decided that you cannot, by calling a thing something in a court of justice, make it what it is not. If I were conveying real property to a person I could not, by calling it a lease, make it other than a freehold.

68. You would say, I suppose, in a case like that, supposing there had been no bargain at all and the worker had done his duty, he ought to be paid, and if he did the bargained wage would have been 10s. ?—Yes, certainly, and it was shown to the magistrates that the average wage of the district was about 9s. 6d.

69. But take it that no bargain was made about deductions or bonus or anything, but that the bargain is just that persons shall do their duty and that they did their duty and got 10s. ; is not all this bonus arrangement equivalent to this, that if you do not do your duty we will take 2s. off you ?—I think so.

70. I mean there is nothing more in it than that, apparently ?—I think not.

71. That seems to me to be the whole thing in a nutshell ?—The appeal will be heard in a Superior Court in Dublin. We do not know exactly how the magistrates have drawn the case, and owing to the peculiarity of the definition of wages which I have endeavoured to draw attention to the argument will turn in a way a good deal on the way it is handled. I mention that case merely to say that I think it is to be hoped that your Committee will recommend such steps as effectually in your judgment will put an end to any cases of that sort. They are very tiresome for the Department to have to administer. It has given us, of course, a great deal of trouble. The case was argued extremely well by the lady inspector.

Then, my Lord, the next point is exceptions under Section 23 of the Act of 1831. There are just a few words that I think ought to be said about those exceptions. It was intended by the Act to allow certain payments in goods or kind to the workmen, and those were set out in Section 23, and it is very curious to see how wide those exceptions were. For instance, tools are mentioned in them; but Archer v. James decided that tools are not within the Act at all; but if not within the Act at all, how could they require exemption in Section 23? It is things of that sort that make me think that the draftsmen of these Acts intended to go no further than the Act itself carried them, because if Archer v. James is right, and the mere deduction for something done for the workman to enable him to work is not within the Act you need not then take the trouble to except it under Section 23. It is that Section 23 that has been one of the great troubles, because we consider it is contradictory to some of the previous sections. The whole section to my thinking is a mass of contradictions and difficulties. If you will allow me to go into some of them I can show the sort of muddles there are in it. There is, for instance, an audit provided; but it does not say who is to audit or what is to be done if the auditor determines they have been improperly made.

72. That is not under Section 23, is it?—No. There is an audit under the Act of 1887, I think. It was patched up by the Act of 1887. The audit was put into that Act. But the proviso of the Act goes on to say: "Provided always that such stoppage or deduction shall not exceed the real and true value of such fuel materials, tools, implements, hay, corn, and provender, and shall not be in any case made from the wages of such artificer, unless the agreement or contract for such stoppage or deduction shall be in writing, and signed by such artificer."

73. Will you take Section 23 of the Act of 1831 in your hand, and just give us the points. You can give them as briefly as you like, but you might just give the points on which you say confusion has been imported into the law?—In the first place what strikes me is that the things selected out here are very arbitrary; for instance it says: "Nothing herein contained shall extend or be construed to extend to prevent any employer of any artificer or agent of any such employer, from supplying or contracting to supply any such artificer any medicine or medical attendance." That is narrow. Supposing you went to a home of rest to be cured, that would be medical attendance no doubt, but is lodging there medicine or medical attendance?

74. That is one point?—Then what is fuel, is it coal or wood? It was put in of course to protect the collier's right to get his coal, because it would be very much resented if that were taken away from him. "Fuel" is a very vague term. Then it was asked in one case whether gas was fuel or was to be included in materials, tools or implements to be by such artificer employed in his trade or occupation. By "In his trade or occupation" do they mean in a trade or occupation in which he is employed? I suppose it is so. But, again, by the words, materials, tools, or implements it is intended to cover everything, and why does not it cover Archer v. James? The words are very wide, at all events. Then it says: "If such artificers be employed in mining." So that it only applies to Archer v. James as applied to mining. Then it says, "Any hay, corn, or other provender to be consumed by any horse or other beast of burden employed by any such artificer in his trade or occupation." That seems very narrow. I wonder if a gas engineer were to employ in his trade engines, whether the gas consumed and which belonged to him, would be exempted. They have begun to tinker, if I might use that expression, with small points, and the consequence is that this looks very much like a section that they had put in in Committee to try and protect various small things through the Acts. But it would be far better in a case of this sort, I am sure, if power had been given to a Secretary of State to make such exemptions (after hearing the parties) as were necessary from time to time. It taxes the wit of man to anticipate a whole lot of small exceptions.

75. I am rather anxious to hear you on the next point, namely, on the supply of victuals dressed or prepared under the roof of any such employer?—That is wider and more clear. "Nor from making or contracting to make any stoppage or deduction from the wages of any such artificer, for or in respect of any such rent." Then there is the point about letting the premises to him. Of course that has protected to a large extent the living-in system, but whether it also protects and is intended to allow a bed or the preparation of a bed, which is not exactly a lease, I do not know. It is not a lease. You let the place to a lodger, but by a licence simply. You allow him to sleep in your premises but he can hardly be said to be a tenant, and he is hardly a lodger. He pays no rent, but he sleeps upon the place; and they only put "victuals dressed or prepared" in the Act, and then they say: "under the roof." We have even had doubts upon that. Where a dining-room is provided in a factory it is the roof of the employer; but provided it is outside you could not allow it, because it is not the roof of the employer. That phrase seems to me a very unnecessary one to introduce. If the victuals are allowed to be prepared and dressed, it does not matter whose roof they are actually consumed under. The question is whether it is fair for them to be allowed to be supplied by the employer to the workmen. Then the section says: "And there consumed by such artificer." According to that it does not apply to a sandwich.

Mr. H. H. S. Cunynghame, C.B.

76. That is an enumeration which shews that you cannot make deductions for everything?—That for rent is a necessary deduction to allow where the workmen are living in the cottages of the employer. It is an important point in connection with mines. Then it says: "For or in respect of." I am inclined to think the words, "for or in respect of" are very confusing—it is such surplusage. It says: "Or for or in respect of such fuel, materials, tools, implements, hay, corn, or provender, or of any such victuals dressed and prepared under the roof of any such employer; or for or in respect of any money advanced to such artificer for any such purpose as aforesaid." Then comes the really valuable thing at the end, which says, provided it shall not exceed the real and true value, which is a hint on which they acted in the Act of 1896 in restricting all these things to the real and true value. It would be silly to be unduly severe on this, only I know that constantly the interpretation of this section has given considerable difficulty. We never knew what we could really do or not do under it, and I hope whatever exceptions are made they will be expressed by the draftsman in more uncompromising and plain language, and I take the opportunity to say that it would be worth your while to consider how far some power should be given to add to or modify them, because with an Act of Parliament it is passed and there is an end of it. A great difficulty arises, and there is no mode of remedying it till Parliament meets again, and then you have to bring in a Bill, whereas if a little point arose, if you could trust some competent person to deal with it it would be all put right at once.

77. Only one word on that section. What do you say to leaving it to be determined in a court of law as to what the real and true value is? Workpeople in humble circumstances have a shrewd suspicion perhaps that they are paying far more for fuel or material or for food than the real and true value, and how is the remedy applied? How do they get over that state of mind? Is it only by having a law case about it?—The way it works out in practice with us is that the inspector takes up the case under the Act of 1896. I think the inspectors will tell you that under the Act of 1896 immense reductions have been made. The lady inspectors will tell you more about that. Then I come to the difficulties that still exist. The first great defect I think of the present condition of things is that the local authorities throughout the country have not taken up the case of truck in shops sufficiently. You see the Act of 1896 provides that so far as the truck is regulated by that Act in factories the inspectors will take it up and in spite of adverse circumstances and some difficulties I think a very good record can be shewn by the inspectors of their exertions. The number of cases on that point by no means represents of course the evil put down. For one person who has fought the Home Office hundreds have given way, so that there has been undoubtedly in factories and workshops very considerable truck reductions, but when you come to shops I am afraid a totally different picture must be presented. I am not in the least saying that that is necessarily the fault of the local bodies, but I do not think they consider the duties which are cast upon them under the Acts, as far as I can make out. Take the London County Council. Speaking subject to correction, I do not think they have made any attempt to administer the Truck Act at all, and if they were asked why, I cannot say what they would say, but I think the answer would be that they have rights of entrance for various matters into people's houses, and that if they began to administer the whole body of the law of England and put everybody right for everything they were doing wrong they would become too inquisitorial, and the thing would be really quite impossible. So they have restricted their action to cases in which they were directly directed, that is, expressly directed, by the legislature to take up the thing and intervene. That is what I believe the view of the London County Council would be.

78. I should like to have your view about this, because your reference to the London County Council shews that the Act may have been unconsciously impeded in its operation from a lack of co-operation by that very powerful body. Could you lay your finger upon the clause or clauses in the Statute which you say they might have made operative with public advantage?—It is very difficult for me to say they might have done so. I am very much inclined to think that the view is sound that a local authority cannot be held to have been invited by the legislature to do anything or carry out an Act which it is not expressly directed to carry out.

79. I know that is the difficulty?—For instance, they would overlap the police and every authority in the country if they began saying that their officers must intervene wherever they found an illegality of any kind whatever. It would be a tremendous thing, when you come to think of it. They have restricted their action to the things they were directed to do. I do not gather from any of the Acts that the local authority has been actually directed to look to shops.

80. But excuse my pressing the point. I want to elucidate it, and I ask, could you put your finger upon any statute or any provision of any statute which gives them an option to interpose with beneficial effect?—If they had prosecuted or taken up a case of truck in that way I do not see that the magistrate could have very well refused to hear it.

81. Upon that, to bring it out, and because I am so glad to have the advantage of you being here, I may say the point I want to know is this: assume they had instituted such a proceeding as would or probably might be considered desirable, do you not think it might have been open to the defendant in such a case to plead that the prosecutor had no title?—I hardly think so. I think that it would be very difficult to plead that. It is a very delicate point. To make them hear it is the real object. There is no duty on them. The magistrate could hear them, but it would be rather an appeal to his discretion as to whether the whole thing was misplaced and vexatious. But I do not know that a magistrate would hold that it was vexatious or improper to be tried if it was a prosecution conducted on behalf of a great public body, like the London County Council, and when nobody else whose duty it was would intervene, and with a shop committee who were inspecting the shops with regard to seats and other things I greatly doubt whether the magistrates would refuse to hear them. I am inclined to think they would hear them.

82. In London how have such cases been tried—at whose instance?—Not at all. We cannot do it. We are only bound to do it for factories and workshops and the London County Council do not do it, and therefore it is not done at all.

83. But the pinch of the matter in one's mind of course is this, in factories and workshops you have a locus standi, as it were, to interpose?—Yes, the Home Office have.

84. Then when you come to shops nobody has, not even the London County Council, I gather, such a locus standi?—No. Mr. Delevingne has the Act before him, and he will tell me how it is, but I do not gather that there is anything in that Act of 1896 imposing it upon the local authority.

By Mr. Delevingne.

85. I think it is left to anybody to prosecute?—Yes. I do not remember anything definitely assigning the duty to a particular body. Of course it has not been a point for us strictly, because we were concerned with our own administration, but I can find nothing in that Act which casts a duty upon the local authority to prosecute in the case of shops, in the same way that it casts it upon us in the cases of workshops and factories.

By the Chairman.

86. But I think my colleagues on the Committee and I would be very glad to have some view upon this alternative. On the assumption which we wish to make for convenience sake, that it is requisite in the public interest that there should be some supervision of this sort in shops, as well as in factories and workshops, and on the assumption, further, that that supervision could be most effectively exercised by a power to institute a prosecution, is not the only alternative before us either to extend to shops en bloc the provisions with regard to factories and workshops, or, on the other hand, to give if it were to be done at all to some local authority like the London County Council an imperative power under the Statute?—Yes, I should certainly agree. One of those two courses seems to be the only course reasonably open.

87. I mean on the assumption that we are on at present that there is a large wrong to be remedied, and a wrong perpetrated on a class who are not very well able to help themselves?—Yes. I think the only other thing I can think of would be to give the police the power, but I do not think it is at all a subject for bringing the policeman in. It would confuse the whole thing. I am only taking that, as your Lordship referred to the various things that could be done, and I merely mention it to exclude it. I think it would be altogether undesirable.

88. The police would be excluded in any sense from this inquisitorial duty, and it is desirable that in any case it should be exercised in the least harsh method?—I think so. It is better not to mix this up with the law against thieves and scoundrels.

By Mr. Maddison.

89. Which of the two do you think would be the better plan, leaving it to the Home Office, or to give the local authority power, because that is very important for our guidance?—There you have raised a very wide question. At present the duty of looking after industry is divided between the Home Office and the local authority. There are certain things we do, and there are certain things they do. As long as that division exists, I think that for shops it would be decidedly preferable that the local authority should do it. They deal with shop hours. They have shop inspectors. They inspect shops already for other purposes, and they would prove, I think, the most efficient. If it is a question of which is the most tremendously efficient instrument, I do not know that I need answer that, but I am inclined to think, if you ask me candidly, that our inspectors carry out the law more rigidly, and get it put into force more effectively than any other body that I know of—but that may be a departmental prepossession. That is a wide question, but unquestionably as things stand, I think the local authority would be quite the proper body to do it.

90. I should like to ask you whether you think that the sort of inspector that is employed by the local authority would be equal to what is a more complicated matter, I should think, than they have to deal with in shops now?—No I think not. The difficulties they have in regard to nuisances and structure are very great at present. I should not anticipate that they would not be able to get proper officers to assist them. They would want more assistance than they have to carry it through, and probably special inspectors to deal with it, and I do not think they ought to have any difficulty in getting most effective men and women to do it for them.

By the Chairman.

91. Would you consider this case apart from London, which naturally attracts the mind outside. Take smaller localities only, in which large shopkeepers are pretty considerable men in the locality. They are men of substance and influence in the locality, and does it not occur to you that the operation of the local authority might almost unconsciously be hampered in the inspection of shops if the officials conducting that inspection were officials merely of the local authority in a place in which the suspected person was a man of influence?—I would say that in some localities those considerations might undoubtedly prevail, but in other localities the very contrary conditions would perhaps prevail, and the fact that it was a local authority under the observation of the local people would cause the Act to be enforced with more vigour than otherwise. If you want it rigidly and completely enforced, I think a central authority like ours would be the most effective instrument to have this power put in our hands, but to dislocate the present arrangement of division between us, the Home Office and the Local Authority would give rise to considerable difficulties. It would necessitate having vastly larger numbers of inspectors. It would duplicate inspections to a certain extent because they have got inspectors of shops themselves already, and I think it would be more expensive, and I do not think there has been I must say that dereliction of duty on the part of the local authorities on anything like a large scale which might justify one in distrusting them. I think it is better to give them control at all events to see how they will use it.

By Mr. Maddison.

92. I am very much averse to increasing inspectors, but I think you said there would have to be fresh inspectors, and that was rather my point?—In any case that is so, but we should want a larger additional staff to do it, I think, than the local authority would want to do it, because they have got, or ought to have inspectors of shops already. Though they have not in many cases appointed them, they ought to have their shop inspectors ready to do the work. The London County Council could do this work with but a small addition to the staff that they already possess, and I have no reason whatever to suggest, or think, that they would not be perfectly willing to do it if they thought it was their duty to do it. I believe they would be quite willing.

By the Chairman.

93. Or have any legal enactment putting that upon them?—Yes. I wish to say that so far from wishing to impute any blame to them at all in the matter, I think they have thought for public reasons they were not meant to do it.

Then the next point is food. That is as to amendments which might be brought into the present law. In the first place with regard to food, lodging and clothing, and other articles, I am inclined to think that the restrictions in the old Act of 1831 and the Act of 1887 have in some respect probably gone too far. I mean I can conceive cases in which it is very advantageous indeed for the workman to be assisted and to get his goods from the employer. I might mention two or three cases, for instance, in a moment, which are illustrations showing what I mean. Supposing you had a fish shop; nobody would say that it was a bad thing on certain nights for the owner of the fishshop to hand over the fish that would be spoiled, because they have not eaten it, to the employees. It might be done as a regular system. It would be a part of their wages, but they would get a bit of fish in that way for about one halfpenny that was worth a shilling, perhaps, and it is very hard that they should not be allowed to do so, provided you can be sure that no tyranny is being exercised over them to spend their wages in that way. Again, in regard to agricultural servants' they are already exempted from the Act. I am not sure that they ought to be exempted all round as they are as to fines and everything. When you come to servants in agriculture, I may say I know a number of landlords, for instance, who give milk to the children—a most excessively valuable thing. To do away with that would be, I think, quite fatal. With regard to even a gardener, who gets his garden produce free from the employer, whatever is over from the house—he gets potatoes and cabbages and so on, and that is a very valuable source of income to him. Again, the coal miner gets his fuel. That is protected under the Act already, and I have seen also cases in which temperance drinks have been provided in some of the large dining halls that exist. For instance, in the case of railway companies, one has seen enormous dining halls for accommodating a thousand men at a time—enormous places. And in those places they have some temperance drinks. They heat their food there, and it prevents the men going out to the public-houses and spending their money. They have newspapers, and even in some cases men are paid to read the paper to them, and I believe the journal is not selected by the management, as far as I know. It is a very happy system and the men seem quite content with it and value it very much. There is no suggestion of any tyranny or compulsion in the matter, and I think, generally speaking, that there are a very large number of cases in which the giving as a regular understood thing of some advantage of that sort to the workman is a benefit, and it would be rather a pity to have it disturbed. But on the other hand there is no question that especially in the past this giving of food and lodging and clothes had been the subject of the greatest abuses, and might be made so again if great care were not taken.

94. In such case does it occur to you that there might again without there being any loss, be a convenient appeal, so to speak, to be made to an inspector?—That raises a very important point. We have rather deprecated giving too large a power of arbitrary decision to our inspectors or even taking it for ourselves. It is a very difficult thing to advocate. If an inspector says, "I think you ought to be permitted to allow such and such a food," say in one part of England, and in another part of England, acting quite bonâ fide another inspector takes a different view, then you get two contrary decisions. It is true you might refer them to the Home Department, but then the Home Department could only hold an inquiry and form a judgment as best it could, and perhaps a wrong one, so far as I know, but I am inclined to think, I must honestly say, probably a right one in the end. But the decision of these points brings an enormous deal of labour up here, and if it could be done properly with proper directions by the magistrates I do not see why it should not be so. Then if you lay down what the law is to be, and allow the magistrate to do it, you might say that it must be shown that the thing provided was at least equal to the full wage and that the burden of proof must be on the person allowed to do it to show that what he was giving was more than the full wages deducted directly or indirectly for it.

95. It is right to disclose to you at once the bent of our mind. It is rather against compelling people who are so differently constituted to appeal to the magistrate. One would like to see the law as it were automatically operating for the protection of both parties. I do not say an inspector, but is there any kind of method that would permit the good system to go on, and the bad system to be stopped upon examination? One is fishing in one's own mind for some method of doing that apart from the laborious method of having law cases about it?—Firstly, what I would say with regard to that is that whatever tribunal or body the Government or the Legislature were to entrust with the power of doing that would like some very explicit principles laid down for its guidance. What is it that the statute does wish should be given to the men and what not given to the men? You would not like to say simply that wages may be paid in kind whenever such and such a tribunal thinks it is desirable. To give such a wide power as that to the tribunal would be to cast it into the air, as it were. It would be much better if Parliament could pretty well define the sort of thing it wanted.

96. Now you have come to the point. Can you fire a shot, even if it be only into the air, in the meantime? We should be very glad to know what you would say?—I am not going to give cases on this point, but you ought to decide on the living-in system. I think you ought to come to a conclusion as to how far the living-in system is desirable, and to say what restrictions should be placed on it. Certain classes of domestic servants would continue in any case under the living-in-system, but let us know at all events how far other employees such as shop-assistants ought to be under the living-in system.

4 May 1906.

97. But the point I am putting is in a manner totally dissociated from that. It is the question of food and clothes and lodging, which is apart from that altogether ?—The food and lodging I was treating of.

98. Take food alone. You gave various illustrations about fish shops and railway men being supplied with refreshments and so on, but that is apart from the question ?—I will at once say we have had no complaints, I think I am right in saying, of harm being done by the supplying of food by the employer to an operative except in the case of drink. I remember one case in which the Act was put in force against a farmer who gave some cider to his haymakers, but I am told that the action was instigated by a neighbouring publican who wanted them to come to his public-house, because it interfered with his custom. But that is not a very satisfactory case if I am right in that. What I want to know is this: does an evil exist now ? Unions and other associations for protecting the men are far more powerful than they used to be, and the Truck Act in the past has undoubtedly had the effect of stopping that old system of paying, and great care must be taken to see that it does not become an abuse again. It is a good deal a question for the men. I should like to see any man who complained of payment in goods. I confess I have generally met men who said it was an advantage to them, as a rule.

99. No doubt we may have to address ourselves to various considerations upon that matter, but I wanted to know whether you could give us any line which would effectively protect the workers against the bad system and yet not compel the employers or workers to be driven into a Court of Law to have it determined ?—I can only suggest that it should be forbidden except in cases where full value was given to the men, and it was plain that the men desired it. If that was done I do not know of any evils that would arise, but I would invite you to try and find that out. The mere fact that complaint has not been made to the Home Office, which is, after all, my horizon, does not imply that there may not be evils. But on the other hand, for instance, in Germany at the mines of the Great Westphalian centres, the employers, who are there federated into enormous syndicates, buy truck loads of potatoes and food, and it is distributed to the men. Whether they pay for it in cash or not I am not quite sure. It might be interesting to inquire, but it is quite certainly a fact that they do assist the men in getting food wholesale at a very cheap rate.

By Mr. Ramsay Macdonald.

100. Might I put this to you: employing the illustration which you gave about the fish and using it as a type. You said, as I understood, that if food were given, the only condition which we need specify very carefully would be that value is given. But if, for instance, fish were given to the value of 1s. ordinary market value, the workman having it could not be charged, say, 15d. for it ?—Yes, and I wish that there should be no compulsion, direct or indirect.

101. But how would you secure the workman against compulsion ? We know, as a matter of fact, as you said very truly in connection with another point, the other day, they might rely upon contract, and I think that is so ?—In the poorer trades that is so, but in the richer trades the men are quite able to take care of themselves.

102. But it is in the poorer trades where it would be valuable ?—Yes.

103. Then also on the point of compulsion—because you might help us with your experience if you would—does not it put a premium, again to use the fish illustration, upon the man who wants fish for the week-end ? There are a good many men who would like fish for the week-end. The value is not merely the monetary value but also the psychological value, as I would call it. Men do not want fish perhaps, and the fishmonger who employs them naturally wants to dispose of his remnants on Saturday night, and consequently there is then the other compulsion of the unwilling purchaser and the extremely willing seller ?—Quite true; and you must always remember that the employee having received his wages might if the act were altered, be allowed to buy fish from his employer's shop at such a discount that nobody else could rival him. The whole object of it is that being with the employer he is going to get his fish very cheap indeed, and it is desirable that there should be nothing to prevent his doing that.

104. At any rate the point I should like to bring before you is this, that if there is any value in your suggestion from the point of view of the workman, what is to hold the employer from paying his workman the full wages and giving the full contract price for his labour, and then selling, as an after effect, this fish or surplus produce ?—I think there is nothing except that where it is done as a regular thing there is a tendency to slip into a kind of deduction. I will give you an instance of what I mean. In the Midlands when you go round these factories that you find there is one thing that strikes you, as it struck me most, was the ill-fed condition of the girls employed. I saw it in one after the other. I I saw it in factory after factory that I was in, and I asked why was this—what is it they eat, and the most appalling illustration was given to me of the food that those girls have in the middle of the day. At one particular factory I asked a great deal about it and I saw the wife of the managing director of the factory who had taken a great interest in it. The factory people had provided a dining room and they had got a cook, and I went and saw the whole thing. They had got a kitchen, where most excellent soup and meat was made at very reasonable prices indeed. One could see that there was really good, and very nutritious soup made, and meat, and they could have it for 1½d. and 2d. The meals were made exceedingly cheap, but when one asked out of 600 girls how many took it, the number given was thirteen, and the remainder went to the pastrycooks and ate food that was not good for them, and not sufficiently nutritious. They were not acquainted with what we now know of the science of food. The rest of them spent their money on bonnets and things of that kind. I do not blame them for that, because that is done, after all, a good deal to attract our sex. You will not prevent that. It is impossible to blame them for it at all. They wish to render themselves attractive, and I think that is a very good thing so far. I think they are unjustly blamed if they are blamed. But such a system as that was decidedly to be encouraged. That lady, who had done a lot of work, was most kindly, and indeed to do anything to put an end to that system would be a very great pity.

By the Chairman.

105. I fancy we shall have evidence from inspectors about matters of fact in regard to that ?—I think so. You can get much better evidence from them than I can give you as to these details.

By Mr. Cawley.

106. As to people giving provision in the nature of truck, could it be dealt with by giving notice to some authority; what do you say to some authority having to do with that ?—I believe that we should be then overwhelmed with a mass of notices, and we should first have to decide whether the notices were to be taken notice of by us. We should then have the inspector going into the question, and if we then once began questioning into the value of fish and the food and the vegetables that composed the soup and so on, we should have a tremendous task before us I am afraid. We should have to do so, and we should not shirk any work. I am sure Mrs. Tennant knows we should do it.

By Mrs. Tennant.

107. I want to put this to you: you speak of the facilities for getting cheap fish which an employee in a fish shop has; of his being able to get his fish at a cheaper rate than a member of the ordinary public. But as a member of the ordinary public he could generally buy fish, just before the shop closes, at an infinitesimal cost. In fact fish is then oftn given away: so his facilities as a member of the ordinary public are almost enough ?—Of course if the workmen could be compelled to buy food the power to oblige them to dine at the employer's restaurant might be very tyrannically used. But I confess I should like to have deducted a penny from every one of these girls' wages every day and give them about sixpenny worth of good soup and meat.

The employer would in this way get very much better work done and the work girls would be a great deal better and more healthy in the end. But I admit that one could not insist on their being fed in this way.

By the Chairman.

108. Of course you know we are to advise the legislature with regard to the matter ?—Of course, and I do not suggest that as practical legislation; on the other hand I should not like to see too great difficulties thrown in the way of things that may benefit these girls.

By Mrs. Tennant.

109. Your illustration refers rather to the case of a big employer who provides cooked food than to the fishmonger ?—I think I am answered completely as to the fish employer. I think it would be better to let the employer pay his people and let them handle the cash. But it makes it rather pedantic to require an employee to receive 5s., say, and then take 1½d. out of his pocket and pay it back, and to make it an offence against the Act that he should receive, say, 4s. 9d. instead of paying back 3d.

110. Except that he may not want to spend the 3d. at all ?—He is sometimes practically compelled, if it is done at the same place.

111. But he might not want to buy fish at all, or whatever the produce sold by the employer might be ?—But the mere fact of handing the employee 5s. in silver and requiring him to hand you 1½d. at the same desk is not such a thing as to suggest an offence against the Act. The fact of getting the 5s. enables him to put it into his pocket, and he can refund it if he likes. But still the difference is a very fine one, and it is in that way that truck first grew up to a great extent, by that being done. First they got into deducting money, and then giving tickets.

By the Chairman.

112. The next point you have in your notes is about fines ?—Yes, my Lord. Under the Act of 1896. fines were allowed to remain. There are a few cases in which certainly it seems to me that fines are necessary still to be allowed. I will give an instance of this kind. What are you to do with the young lad of about nineteen who repeatedly takes matches or tobacco down a mine ? Of course you can summon him before a magistrate, but supposing that his colliery is up in a valley say in Wales, the fireman or whoever is superintending him has to take the lad down to the magistrate and the day is spent by the fireman and the lad there before the magistrate while the case is heard, and the wages of the two men are lost, or at least one is paid by the employer, but the lad loses his day's work and is either fined or not fined, and then goes back again. It would be desirable, and the men feel that too, to have some rather summary and rapid method of settling the offences committed by young fellows in cases like that where it is so important that the act complained of should not be done. That is the strongest case I can think of of fines.

113. Do you mean you cite that case as a case in which fines might be continued with advantage ?—I will put it in this way, my Lord. It is very difficult to decide that in that case fines ought to be done away with.

114. I am sorry that instance has been selected from this point of view. Is not there this to be said, that if you permit the dangerous operation of taking matches down a mine or lights or anything of that kind, to be settled by a convenient method of fines, you would thereby do away with a great measure of protection under the Mining Acts against explosions. We know, unhappily, a very great deal of disaster is wrought by that very practice to which you refer, and even from the point of view of public interest, does it not occur to your mind that it would be rather a dangerous thing to make a highly dangerous operation a kind of thing that could be settled by a private arrangement ?—There is that to be said with regard to that particular instance that I have taken; but there are a number of other smaller things which a boy ought not to do, which can hardly perhaps be said to be as dangerous as taking matches down a mine, but which perhaps better illustrate my point. I mean, I can conceive special rules made in the mine which provide that in that case no fines should be inflicted, but that it should be necessary with regard to that pit to take the boy to the magistrate. We should deal with all that; but when you come to smaller points, and when you come to such things as putting a chock under a truck so that it should not run anybody down, that is a different thing. You might say to a lad that he should put chock every time; but a stupid boy does not do it, and is it worth while taking him with a man right away to the magistrate ? The men are all with you in fining him. There is not a single complaint in regard to that. They will all say, "The young rascal, a good thing too"; and if the fine was placed to a common enjoyment fund there would be the greatest good nature about it, because they would say, "You young rascal, you have injured us, and now be good enough to pay a shilling towards our entertainment fund," and in that case there would be the greatest pressure put upon them to make them do nothing dangerous. On the other hand the first doubt in my mind as to the necessity of fines was suggested by Sir Frederick Harrison himself, one of the most distinguished and well-known railway managers in the kingdom in evidence given by him on the Royal Commission on Accidents to Railway Servants in the year 1899. The subject was a good deal gone into of how far fines were good as stopping dangerous practices on the part of railway servants, and with your permission I will read you what he says about fines. He was asked at question 6160: "Something has been suggested in examination here as to fines. Will you tell the Commission what is your opinion about fining railway servants ?—(A) I have a very strong feeling, and the officers of the London and North Western have generally the same, that fines of small amount which generally used to be the custom to inflict on railway servants for breaches of rules, is a very objectionable and a very irritating kind of punishment to the men; and when the question of fines was brought up by the amendment of the Truck Act passed some three years ago"—that was the 1896 Act—" or recently, we considered again as we had often considered, the question of whether we were wise in going on fining the men small amounts such as a shilling and half a crown, and five shillings, and we came to the conclusion that the best course for us to take in the interest of the men and in the interest of discipline would be to discontinue those fines altogether. We did it deliberately and after a great deal of consideration with the conviction in our mind that that mode of punishment created a social difficulty between the man and his family." Then he proceeds to say that the man did not bring home all his earnings and that that vexed his wife. I must say that I think the reasons are rather insufficient that he gives for that course being taken; but, as a fact, I think I am right in saying that nine tenths of the whole of the railway service of this country is done without any fining at all. The amount of fining is very small on railways and they seem to think they can get on without it; but, on the other hand, some of the men (and I think Mr. Richard Bell himself among them), are doubtful whether it is not better if you could get a perfectly fair way of fining, to have small fines. In the case of young men who have to be drilled into taking care it is perhaps better to fine them rather than suspend them. Suspending them gives them opportunity for loafing for a week or so and takes them to the public house, and they come back after several days rather the worse for it, and their wives and children suffer. On the other hand, there is the opinion of Sir F. Harrison and I felt bound to call your attention to it.

Mr. H. H. S. Cunynghame, C.B.

4 May 1906.

By the Chairman.

115. You do attach great importance to Sir Frederick Harrison's statement ?—Yes. The question of fines in regard to railway servants has many points that might occupy your attention. There you have got a case of very dangerous employment, next in that respect to the case of seamen, and one of the most dangerous in the country. Shunting is almost as dangerous as mining, and yet you have railway managers saying they deliberately discontinued fines.

By Mr. Ramsay Macdonald.

116. I should like to put this to you. Whilst it is true you have got no fining in the sense of transferring wages from the men's pockets to the masters' pocket you have got fining in the shape of suspensions ?—Yes, that is perfectly true; but then no Truck Act has attempted to say that if a man prove a bad workman he is not to be discharged or suspended.

Mr. H. H. S. Cunynghame, C.B.

4 May 1906.

117. You have got the screw upon them?—You have got a much more powerful screw, and I am inclined to think in some cases a too-powerful screw.

By Mr. Maddison.

118. It is not shown by Sir Frederick Harrison that he does abandon fines because he thinks he has got a greatly more effective instrument than that of fines. In the case of the North Western Railway the policy pursued with regard to suspensions is really very bad, and an inconvenient system I know, because the men actually lose two or three days' pay?—Yes; you will find evidence as to this. I have, I think, marked all the passages here, and I will leave the book to you unless you wish me to go through it.

By Mr. Cawley.

119. Does that come within the scope of our inquiry?

By the Chairman.

120. I suspect we shall have to face that not because it is specifically remitted to us but because it is apparently the only available alternative, if fines are done away with.

By the Witness.

121. At all events, without going through all this I have marked a number of passages where some of the men, the employees, that is, have said that they upon the whole prefer a fining system.

By the Chairman.

122. I am very sorry to trouble you about this, but I am so anxious about it, and I attach such importance to your evidence, that I should like very much to have a reference to those passages?—Yes, and in addition I think I can give you a list of the parts of the evidence of the Royal Labour Commission that dealt with fines. If I could give you that list you would be able then to turn up very rapidly any passage out of the fourteen volumes about fines. I have got the list and have gone through it all myself (See Appendix I.).

123. I think then the next thing is materials?—But one word first on fines. In the first place, I think, that fines ought to be reasonable. Next I am rather doubtful as to how far you ought to allow fines except where the Act contemplates danger to the safety of others. There is a very strong line of demarcation between fines for acts that involve no danger, and acts that may involve grave danger to fellow workmen. Upon that I do not want to give too positive an opinion. I have not heard all the evidence you will hear, and I do not want to be very positive. Thirdly, I think that the proceeds of the fines ought not in any case to be pocketed by the master. That is, I think, a thing that irritates the men. It produces a feeling of unfairness. I do not believe the employer in the least desires it, but it makes the employer judge in his own case. And it does more than that, it makes him pocket the fine that he inflicts, and I believe it is far better to say that in every case the proceeds of the fine should be applied to the benefit of the men. I should not mind it being applied to a treat, and it would make the men who were subject to the fine laugh at each other. A man who had to contribute to it would be laughed at by the others, and a young fellow would take care not to do it again.

124. The only thing that seems to be opposed to that is this, that in the case of fines for spoiled work injustice might be done?—I do not call that a fine. That is damages, and that is a different thing altogether. I will deal with that in a minute.

125. In such a case there would be spoiled work and the loss falling on one party and the fine going to the other party?—Yes. Then I have seen codes of fines, in shops mostly. I think we have pretty well weeded out that weed in factories. I have seen 100 different fines, and each one of them could not be said to be unfair, but the code as a whole was most tyrannous, and regard ought to be had to the number of them as well as the fairness of them. Fines for being late stand on a different footing. In some trades if a girl is late it does no harm to the factory. In the many factories in the potteries there are a number of girls engaged in painting, and there is a big room covered with desks and a few brushes and colours about, and the girls come when they like. They work at piecework and a larger number are employed than would be necessary if all worked full time. They attend to their families at home. Some are there for six or five hours or even less, and it is a very convenient plan, and they earn what they can and there is no harm done to the employer, and it does not harm themselves if they come late. But there are other cases where more deduction of wages for the time the girl was absent would be insufficient; cases in which the absence of the girl might derange the work of others, and upset the work of the factory.

By Mr. Maddison.

126. On that point about a girl being late, do you see any very great advantage in admitting that principle amongst girls—I mean, though it is quite true they cause more loss than the mere deduction of the amount of the fines, does it not open the door very widely to the system of fining which in my experience is amongst the worst?—If you did not allow them to fine a girl for being late, and the girl were late more than once or twice, they would say: "We cannot fine you, but we can reduce your rate of pay, your wages are 6s. 6d. this week, but they will be 5s. 6d. the next week." They would reduce the wages. They would say: "You are a late worker and one who is unpunctual, and therefore worth less."

127. That may mean only three minutes after which the factory door closes?—That raises the question of whether so small a lateness as that is detrimental to the factory.

128. But my point is that in many cases they do not keep the door open the first hour. If you are not there at six it closes till seven or closes till eight, and you cannot come in at a quarter past six?—I am not defending the reasonableness of the fine, but I am discussing whether it should be absolutely forbidden.

129. Assuming it was desirable to abolish fines, do not you think those cases are such that they would open the door to the worst cases?—In Ireland, where they fined a girl 2s. it was a very bad case, and we shall certainly proceed to appeal on it.

By Mr. Cawley.

130. If all the fines went, as you think they ought to do, to some fund for the workpeople, and not into the employer's pocket, would not that do away with three-fourths of the ill effects of fining?—It would do away with a good deal, but there is always one danger left. In some places near London where sweating is carried on fines are used as a mode of graduating wages. An employer gets a girl at 6s. a week, but does not intend to pay her that. He knows that he is going to inflict fines to a very considerable amount, and therefore, the girl has a nominal wage of 6s. a week but in reality it varies from 5s. 9d. to 4s. in the worst cases, The worst ones get the least and the best ones the most. It would be better that the wages should be reduced openly and not under cover of fines. The employers ought to say: "You are not worth more than 4s. and we shall not give you more than 4s."; but they hold out 5s. 6d. and then reduce it by the amount of the fines.

131. Should the amount of the fine bear any relation to the wage earned in the case of the fine being paid to a common fund?—If you do not have a rule that fines shall be reasonable and if you leave them unregulated you might have a whole system of graduating wages, and I should deplore that. The mere fact of putting them into a common fund alone would not be sufficient to do away with all the evils.

132. I do not quite see your point about graduating wages, because it would not be then a matter between the employed and the employer. The employer would have to pay the wages?—I might say that giving me leave as an employer to fine unlimitedly without any restriction at all, and only with the condition that the fine I shall inflict shall be pooled amongst the workmen, and I could use that method to make a graduated system of wages in that way. I could say that I would give you 5s. a week, and one will get 6s. and another 4s. under that system. I should have 200 events upon which a fine could be inflicted. If you are not so deft as another there would be a fine—if you do not do anything in a particular way, then a fine, if you do not paint this cup very beautifully, then a fine, and so on, and I should have a graduated system of wages extremely uncertain, but one entirely under my control, and it is for that reason that I value the provision which says no fine at all shall be inflicted unless it is reasonable. I may be wrong, but that is the way I look at it.

133. But you have put rather a far-fetched illustration, have you not ?—If you had seen the list of fines that I have seen you would not say so. It is not the good employer but the bad employer that one has to deal with. Then I should like to add that fines should not exceed a fixed proportion of wages. I believe that would be very valuable. That is only existing, so far as I know, in one trade, namely, the laundries of London. I remember we had the laundry employers of London here, and Mr. Delevingne will remember it, and we had the lady inspectors, and had a tremendous discussion on fines, and when we came to examine it we said: "If you put in force a complicated set of fines for not goffering a piece of lace properly and for a great number of similar small faults you will take away a great proportion of the wages of these people." They said: "We do not want to do that." So we proposed that they should agree that no fine or fines inflicted on any one employée should exceed an aggregate of 2d. or 3d. a week, and they took it willingly, and they have carried that out with perfect harmony ever since. It is not a bad rule, because it ensures that you cannot fine more than a certain amount, and beyond that amount you must dismiss or have another mode of punishment.

134. What is the percentage ?—2d. a week.

By Mr. Delevingne.

135. It was not reckoned as a percentage ?—No, it was 2d. a week in that case.

By the Chairman.

136. Then is that all you are going to favour us with about fines, or is there any other point on that to be dealt with before you proceed to the next point ?—The only other point would be the great difficulty of the deductions in respect of materials. I should like you to hear what the inspectors say on that point. The present rule has not worked badly as to not exceeding the true value, and as to proper notices being put up. In some cases you will be obliged still, I think, to allow materials to be provided by the employers, but that, I think, is done much too much at present, For instance, in coal mines the men insist on providing their own gunpowder or other explosive, and they send a little girl with a tin can in the morning to buy it at the grocers. It is a bad system, and it ought to be put an end to. In connection with the use of explosives in order to do away with that system employers in the better mines are providing explosives which they charge to the men. The men are encouraged thereby to fire as few shots as possible, which is what is wanted. Provision of materials by the employer could not be done away with without having the whole mining world, men and all, in opposition, and it will have to be very carefully inquired into in regard to mines before doing away with the provision of material altogether.

By the Chairman.

137. Then we come to our old friend—deductions for bad work.

By Mr. Cawley.

138. I should have liked, as to the particular system of fining for being late, to hear what you say as to how it affects piece workers. That has not been mentioned up to now.

By the Chairman.

139. I think when the inspectors come that will be a very proper point to deal with. I hope you will keep it very fully in view when the inspectors come, because they have the details of each particular trade.

By the Witness.

140. Then, sir, as to the deductions for bad work, here are one or two very curious cases as to that. For instance, a girl spoiled a pair of trousers. The trousers, we will suppose, would have been worth 5s. selling price, and her spoiling them made them worth 4s. 6d. Her employers gave her the trousers and said: Now we shall deduct 5s. for them, and you may sell them for 4s. 6d., if you can. We prosecuted successfully, because we said that is a payment in goods—that is wages paid by a pair of trousers. Even if they tried to get out of that argument by saying that the amount of five shillings deducted was a fine, we could reply that in that case the fine exceeded the damage done, which is contrary to the Act of 1896. In either case, therefore, the Act had been broken. But after all, some deductions for bad work must be allowed, but under strict restrictions. We attempted to deal with that in the Act of 1896, and I think the clause there has worked fairly well. I do not think there has been so much hardship under it. The men's deductions for bad work are now generally tolerably reasonable. But I should like you to hear what the inspectors say on that.

Mr. H. H. S. Cunynghame, C.B.

4 May 1906.

By the Chairman.

141. Then there is "special employments" ?—I think I have said what I have got to say on that.

142. We are very much indebted to you for what you have said—or have you anything further to say ?—I would only say that I hope the Acts may be re-drafted. I should like to see all the Acts swept away, and a re-drafting of all the Acts.

143. Rather than any incorporating ?—Rather than any incorporating. I would have a re-drafting of them from the beginning, and correct errors.

144. It would be a very difficult piece of work, you will acknowledge ?—It will be difficult.

By Mr. Ramsay Macdonald.

145. There is only one point, and it is as to the deductions for wages for charitable purposes. Those deductions do not go into the pockets of the employers, but are transferred in the first instance to a society like the Hospital Saturday Society. They are received and retained by that society week by week, and then paid over by them to the hospital or hospitals, and the process of deduction is this: There is a meeting of the workpeople in any particular factory held and a resolution is passed. Generally the employer or the managing director, or the leading foreman, is in the chair, and a resolution is passed that this meeting decide that week by week a penny shall be deducted from the wages of those workpeople and the wages will have to be paid to them less that penny ?—A penny deducted from those who have agreed to the resolution, do you mean, or from everybody.

146. From everybody. Then as the weeks go by the wages are paid less this penny. This penny is handed over in the way I have described. Whether you are willing or not you have that deduction made the rule of the factory—the unwritten rule or custom of the factory is that this deduction shall be made. I should like your opinion upon that ?—Unless it is within the exception of Section 23 of the Act I doubt whether it is legal at all in the first place. It is Hewlett v. Allen again, and illegal. If it be asked whether it is a good thing to continue, I may say I do not like these compulsory belongings to societies enforced by deductions from wages. I am a very strong advocate for persuading people to join these societies in every way you can, but I do not like compulsion.

By Mr. Cawley.

147. But it is not a society that Mr. Macdonald speaks of.

By Mr. Ramsay Macdonald.

148. No, the use of the expression "society" turned my mind to a similar case ?—Why should I be compelled to hand part of my wages earned at the Home Office to the Charing Cross Hospital ? I do not know why I should.

149. Take the case of the Miners' Provident Society ?—I am in favour of it being done then, but I am not quite sure how far it is better to compel it or to leave it to the feeling of the men. I have a faith in the growth among the working classes of feelings of providence.

150. But you know this also, that if the money is not intercepted at the moment it is being paid over to the men, it will never be got at all ?—There are two things to be considered here. First, the compelling of the man to contract, and putting pressure upon him to contract to pay, and then the mode of payment. I do not mind so the mere deduction, provided it is done perfectly freely. It is the forcing of him which is the point; even compulsions to thrift may be a good thing with good employers, but it is liable to abuse.

Mr. H. H. S. Cunynghame, C.B.

4 May 1906.

151. You have not made up your mind about it, have you?—I think it is against it; it comes within Section 23, and I am not at all for making it legal.

By Mr. Maddison.

152. In the case that Mr. Macdonald mentions the employer gets no benefit at all?—No, I quite agree, but as part of a State system if it were made a law that everybody should insure I should welcome it extremely.

By Mr. Cawley.

153. But in this case that Mr. Macdonald puts there is no compulsion about it, I understand. I know of cases in which it is done, and any man can decline to do it at any moment?—But why should the employer step in to do something philanthropic, and compel the men to do it?

By Mr. Maddison.

154. He does it on behalf of the men?—But I am not sure how far that is a good thing.

155. It is a fact that in the North of England you will get a strong committee of the men who will ask the employer to allow the deduction to be made, and the fact that it is done in a mechanical manner makes it compulsion?—It is compulsion by the men really, then.

156. There is no doubt about it.

By Mr. Ramsay Macdonald.

157. It is using the employer as an instrument of compulsion?—Then it is a question whether it is not bad.

158. In its original form it may be paid by the men, but in its ultimate form it is by the men by the use of the employer as an instrument of compulsion?—I do not object to the deduction in the least, provided the payment is really thoroughly desirable. I instanced that of the fish shop the other day.

By the Chairman.

159. I know that, but Mr. Macdonald's point is rather this, that you adhere to the view that it is illegal?—I think it seems to be so, except in the cases provided for under Section 23.

160. The difficulty that arises in our mind is this: Assuming it is a good thing, and it is done at the instance of the employees as a body, then is it not a very awkward state of the law that if that good thing done at the instance of the people who know best what their own interest is, is done through the medium of the employer, the employer should be in the position of committing an illegality in order to do the good thing?—I quite see that, and I have answered Mr. Macdonald, I believe, to that effect—that if the thing is thoroughly desirable there seems to be no harm in the mere deduction; on the contrary, it may be advantageous. I have never felt the mere deduction to be in itself a harm, but if you permit it you must be very careful that the power is not used for something very undesirable.

161. We are all extremely with you on that, but our difficulty arises rather from this, that we do not like the continuing of the method which would make that illegal which on its merits is not only legal, but a most beneficial operation?—Yes, I can quite sympathise with that.

162. In effect in providing for that state of matters we must take care not to fall into other pitfalls?—Yes.

By Mr. Maddison.

163. I understood you to say you do not have any complaints about this matter from any part of the country on behalf of the men?—That is the compulsion of joining benefit societies, but that is a different thing.

164. But for a hospital, say?—I do not recollect any.

By Mr. Delevingne.

165. I do not recollect any, either, but I should like to ask whether there is anything illegal in this payment being made to a benefit fund?—Unless it comes within Section 23.

166. But is it not covered by the doctrine of Hewlett v. Allen that it is a request to pay made by the workmen to the employer?—But there may be a contract that she should belong to the Amicable Griffins.

By Mr. Ramsay Macdonald.

167. I want to put two points on that. First of all the individual employee as a matter of fact has made no contract with a hospital Saturday fund (I am assuming my first case now) to pay money to it. No contract can possibly be made, because it is a voluntary contribution week by week, which can be stopped without notice and without involving any obligation. The second point has been taken already by Mr. Cunynghame, I think, that although the contract between the subscriber, A, and the benefit society, B, may be perfectly legal, yet that C, the employer, should pay the subscription and deduct it from the wages is illegal, and although A cannot claim against C, yet nevertheless C can be prosecuted or the payment.

By Mr. Delevingne.

168. But I do not understand that there is any contract between the employee and the employer that he should contribute to the relief fund. It is only on request that the employer shall pay over a part of his wages, but not in pursuance of any contract at all, only to a relief fund?—That would be legal if there is no contract, but I was assuming that there was an understanding or that which amounted to a contract, as in the case of Hewlett v. Allen.

By Mr. Cawley.

169. What does take place in my own case is that the secretary of the Hospital Saturday fund writes to the employer and asks him whether he will allow him to hold a meeting at the mill or works and put the case of the hospitals before the men, and then ask the men whether they will allow so much a week to be deducted from their wages and sent in a lump sum at the end of the year to them. The man comes down, generally some pretty eloquent man, and puts the case of the hospitals before the men. The foreman is there, perhaps, and then the foreman puts the resolution, and the men at the meeting in many cases unanimously decide that so much a week shall be deducted from their wages. But there may be other men come into the works afterwards that have never had anything to do with it, and although there is no compulsion still the money is deducted?—That is quite legal, but it is very easy to slide into an agreement between the employer and the men that it shall be done, and then it would be illegal. You are on the fringe there.

By Mr. Delevingne.

170. On the point that came up as to the inspection of shops, shops of course are not the only trades under the Truck Acts which are not at present covered by the Home Office inspection?—No.

171. And in those trades which are not covered by the Home Office inspection no duty is placed on any authority to prosecute?—No.

172. But as a matter of fact under the English law it is the case that anybody may prosecute for breach of statute, at any rate, in a matter of public interest, unless expressly prevented by some clause in the statute?—Yes.

173. In some trades outside the Home Office inspection cases are taken up sometimes by the police?—Yes, such as the cider case.

174. Or by the Shop Assistants' Association?—Yes.

175. So that it is not a question merely of shops. It is the whole question of the enforcement of the Truck Acts in the trades not at present covered by the Home Office inspection?—Yes, that is so, certainly. The worst evils exist in shops so far as I know.

By Mr. Ramsay Macdonald.

176. There is one point that arises as to this with regard to the latest case the Shop Assistants' Association took up. I think there was some point of law raised which limited very materially their powers to act in such cases for their members.

By the Chairman.

177. From our Scotch point of view such questions solve themselves always, because we have the system of public prosecution there?—Yes. But I think the real solution is that every court has a discretion to treat a matter brought before it by anybody that it considers has no interest whatever in the matter, as a vexatious proceeding, and that is the origin of the idea of not allowing proceedings to be recklessly brought.

By Mr. Cawley.

178. Will this come under our purview? In some parts of England farms are let with four or five cottages included in the tenancy. The farmers have those cottages and they pay the men so much a week, perhaps 11s. or 12s. a week, and a cottage, and in the cases where there are large farms including four or five farms, the farmer is often very tyrannical in this matter. Is the letting of a cottage as part of the wage in any way to come before us?

By the Chairman.

Mr. H. H. S. Cunynghame, C.B.

4 May 1906.

179. We have to come to some determination about that as a Committee, but I wish to point out to you that in regard to the whole series of existing Truck Acts agriculture as such is excluded from the operations of the Act.

By Mr. Cawley.

180. They have no trade union.

By the Chairman.

181. I quite see it may be very well worth our investigation.

By Mr. Cawley.

182. It seems to me that people who have no society to protect themselves should be considered.

THIRD DAY.

Wednesday, 9th May, 1906.

PRESENT.

The Right Hon. THOMAS SHAW, K.C., M.P., Lord-Advocate for Scotland (Chairman).

E. A. BROTHERTON, Esq., M.P.
FREDERICK CAWLEY, Esq., M.P.
MALCOLM DELEVINGNE, Esq.
J. RAMSAY MACDONALD, Esq., M.P.
FREDERICK MADDISON, Esq., M.P
Mrs. H. J. TENNANT.
A. F. YARROW, Esq.

T. E. BETTANY, Esq. (Secretary).

Dr. B. ARTHUR WHITELEGGE, C.B., His Majesty's Chief Inspector of Factories, was called; and examined.

By the Chairman.

Dr. B. A. Whitelegge, C.B.

9 May 1906.

183. How long have you been in the service of the Home Office?—Since 1896.

184. So we may take it that your experience covers entirely and almost precisely the situation of matters as altered by the statute of that year?—Yes. I had practically no experience of the matter prior to the operation of the 1896 Act; that Act followed very shortly on my appointment.

185. Now we desire to hear from you in your own way any statement you may have to make with regard to the powers of the factory inspectors under the Truck Acts?—These powers arise under two sections, namely, Section 13 of the Act of 1887, which gave to the factory inspectors the duty of inspection under the Truck Act in factories and workshops and the powers that they have for the enforcement of the Factory Act.

186. Did you say Section 13 of the Act of 1887?—Yes, Section 13, Sub-section 2. That was extended under Section 10 of the 1896 Act so as to include laundries and outwork.

187. Outwork?—Yes, home workers.

188. Will you please describe the field that you cover, taking all your statutory powers; what we want to know as laymen, so to speak—putting ourselves in that category:—is what is the actual field of your inspecting operations?—Practically factories, workshops and laundries. Our position as regards out-workers has been very materially modified by recent decisions, and it is only rarely, in consequence of these decisions, that we have any powers.

189. You do not include mines within that field?—No, mines do not come under the factory department, and I have no official knowledge of them. The Truck Acts, so far as we administer them, do not relate to docks or warehouses, which nevertheless for certain purposes of the Factory Act are under our inspection. There is a further exception under an order of the Secretary of State which excludes from the operation of the 1896 Act cotton-weaving in Lancashire, Cheshire, Derbyshire, and the West Riding of Yorkshire. Otherwise we are concerned with the administration of the Truck Acts in all factories and all workshops, subject to one further reservation, namely that certain factories and workshops which are closely allied with mines are under the supervision of the mines inspectors who are constituted inspectors of factories for that purpose.

190. Is there anyone in connection with the department of mining inspection who holds a position exactly corresponding to your own position within the sphere of factory inspection?—There is no chief inspector of mines.

191. Then I assume that for information under that head we must go to the mining district inspectors?—I believe so; but I presume there is record in the Home Office of questions of importance referred by the mines inspectors.

192. But there is no officer of equivalent rank to your own in the department of the inspection of mines?—No.

193. Perhaps you can now tell us something with regard to the number of works and operatives affected?—Including factories, workshops and laundries we are concerned with the inspection of some 250,000 places in the United Kingdom of which 8,000 are textile factories—I am giving round numbers—94,000 non-textile factories, 141,000 workshops and 7,000 laundries. The number of persons employed in these places is approximately 1,030,000 in textile factories, 3,120,000 in non-textile factories, 750,000 in workshops, and 92,000 in laundries, making a total of about 5,000,000. That, however, is incomplete as regards what we call men workshops, in which none but male adults over eighteen are employed, for of these works we have not the same accurate particulars.

Dr. B. A. Whitelegge, C.B.

9 May 1906.

194. What is the reason of that?—Their position in regard to the Factory Act is different; the occupiers are not called upon to give returns of employment.

195. What are the points under this statute which differentiate men's workshops?—In men's workshops there are no protected persons, (women, young persons, or children), the hours of employment are not regulated in any way, and the occupiers are not required to furnish returns of employment unless specially directed by the Secretary of State. Many are small workshops which change from time to time, and it is difficult to keep the same accurate record with regard to them that we attempt to keep with regard to factories and workshops generally.

196. Can you give us a reference to the point in this statute which refers to these men's workshops?—There is a section in the Act referring to them.

197. Are you referring to the Act of 1887 or of 1896?—I am referring to Section 157 of the Factory Act of 1901.

198. Perhaps you had better read that section?—It is as follows:—"The following provisions of this Act shall not apply to men's workshops, that is to say, workshops conducted on the system of not employing any women, young persons or child therein: (1) the sections in Part 1 relating to temperature, thermometers, means of ventilation, drainage of floors, sanitary conveniences, opening of doors, powers to make orders as to dangerous machinery. (2) Part 2 and Part 3. (3) The sections in Part 4 relating to fans and to lavatories and meals. (4) Part 7. (5) The sections of Part 8 relating to the affixing of abstracts and notices and the keeping of a general register, and the first sub-section of the section relating to periodical returns."

199. Assuming that the ambit of your observations was extended to these excluded workshops that you have referred to, what would be, to the best of your knowledge or judgment, the number that would have to be added to the total of 5,000,000 that you have already quoted?—I can only give a very rough estimate, but perhaps the number would be about 200,000 or 300,000.

200. May we take it, roughly speaking, that about a quarter of a million additional would be brought under inspection if these restrictive provisions were removed?—Yes.

201. In dealing with the number of works and operatives you did not mention shops?—They do not come under the Factory Department. I have no knowledge as regards shops except in those cases where shops and workshops are substantially one and the same.

202. If they were one and the same and were brought under the supervision of the Home Office what do you think would be about the number of operatives that would in that case have to be added to your total?—I am afraid I can give no estimate; I have no data.

203. Would you put it about three-quarters of a million?—Yes, I should think it would be fully that.

204. Of course I understand that the estimate must be largely conjectural, but at all events they would be a substantial addition to the duties of your department if shops in general were added?—Yes, a very substantial addition indeed.

205. Probably amounting to about one-fifth or one-sixth of the whole?—Yes, and with this further consideration—that in shops the average number employed would probably be small compared with the average number employed in workshops, and especially in factories; so that the number of places to be visited would be very largely increased out of proportion to the number of workers.

206. I follow your point. You think the cases would be extremely rare in which shops would run up to a total of over fifty or 100 employees?—Yes, I presume they would be rare.

207. Whereas such cases would not be at all with regard to workshops in general?—They are quite common in factories and even in workshops.

208. In order to carry out your work under the various statutes of course you have a staff under you?—Yes.

209. Will you please give us an account of the staff by whom the statutes are administered?—The staff has been increased repeatedly and largely since I first took charge of it in 1896. At present it includes in all 155 of whom thirty-six are assistants.

210. Kindly give us a description of the hierarchy or different grades, beginning with yourself?—There is directly under me a deputy chief inspector and there is also at the Central Office a medical inspector, a superintending inspector of dangerous trades and an electrical inspector. Then the whole of the United Kingdom is parcelled out into five divisions, each with a superintending inspector. In the five divisions there are districts, 47 in all, each with a district inspector, and in many cases with junior inspectors and assistants acting under him. There are likewise special departments; one of these is that of the lady inspectors, who, with one exception, have not formulated district duties, but are at liberty to inspect anywhere throughout the United Kingdom. Another separate staff, which, however, is not directly concerned with the Truck Acts, is that of the inspector of textile particulars.

211. Particulars?—Yes, particulars of piece-work wages.

212. What is the exception you refer to in the case of the lady inspectors?—One of the lady inspectors is responsible as a district inspector for laundries and milliners' and dressmakers' workshops and factories in a defined portion of West London.

213. I presume the lady inspectors are in ordinary course transferred from one district to another, and that that will be done under your supervision and guidance?—I made an important omission. There is a principal lady inspector, under whose supervision the whole of the lady inspectors act. The principal lady inspector is the superintending inspector for her branch.

214. You mentioned the assistant inspectors?—There are thirty-six inspectors' assistants, whose duties have hitherto been confined to visiting in workshops, and there they give attention to questions of truck, in the same way as the inspectors do throughout.

215. You have stated that the staff has been increased; have you any opinion to offer with regard to the present size of the staff and its adequacy to the duties laid upon it?—I don't think there is any finality; it all depends upon the standard of inspection. The staff at present is about equal to a once a year inspection of all the places that come under our supervision. If that number is increased, or new duties are imposed, clearly more staff is required. In considering the amount of inspection, it is not sufficient to look only to the number of places which is steadily increasing year by year, even apart from extension by legislation, but more and more is being entrusted to the inspectors with every order made by the Secretary of State, and especially by every code of regulations and special rules for dangerous trades. Every new code amounts, so far as concerns the work put upon the inspectors, really to a new Act.

216. I presume new orders issued by the Secretary of State are sent to each member of your staff?—Yes.

217. Have you any system under which the staff finds itself in possession of all the statutes and codes up to date?—The statutes are always supplied to the staff and orders in the same way, both in draft and in their final form. I have for many years issued a monthly circular to the staff, supplemented by special instructions when necessary. The whole of the important alterations during the year and the whole of the orders appear in the annual report, which is sent to the whole staff.

218. You made one remark which rather struck me, namely, that the staff appears at present to be adequate to one yearly inspection; but, assume legislation which would involve a more frequent appeal to the inspectorate, and assume this Committee to have certain opinions (for instance, with regard to the subject of truck), that it might without separate legislation be thought desirable to call in the inspectors as a convienient working staff to examine particular cases of complaint, would that involve a large addition to the duties of the staff?—That is done already to a large extent. The inspectors are constantly applied to in such matters upon complaints from the operatives, and questions arise from their own inspection. Truck is one of the points to which they direct their attention. They are quite commonly consulted by employers who desire to frame a list of fines and deductions in accordance with the Act.

219. I had in mind more particularly one of the special points of the reference to this Committee, namely, the subject of living in. Assume that upon that subject we were to suggest a further draft upon the valuable services of your inspectors, would the staff have in consequence to be increased ?—My answer would rather depend upon what sort of supervision the Committee had in view. If it were a supervision of sanitary details, air space, etc., the duty would carry the inspectors a good deal outside their present field, and would, I might suggest, belong rather to the local authorities. It is difficult to form an estimate of the amount of work that might thus arise; but simply to keep a watch upon notices and deductions on the truck side of the question, where living in is connected with factories and workshops, would be opening up a comparatively limited field.

220. I presume that the one visit a year that you mention is not paid with regularity and invariably, but that you were striking an average as to the frequency with which the services of inspectors are available ?—Yes, that is so. Where special legislation applies to a particular class of factories and workshop, for example under regulations for dangerous trades, or the sections relating to humid textile factories, we aim at a much more frequent inspection, perhaps a quarterly one; an inspector in not able to limit his inspection of one factory to the average share of that factory; he may have to go again and again on account of accidents, or complaints of irregularities.

221. You had, I think, reached the point of explaining what your staff were supplied with in the way of materials apprising them of the state of the law. Did you not yourself prepare a memorandum on truck ?—It was prepared by the legal adviser of the Home Office, and forms the basis of the action of the inspectors.

222. Do you refer to the penny pamphlet ?—There is also a larger one.

223. Perhaps you could furnish us with copies ?—I will do so with pleasure, but the only copy I have at the moment is marked with figures and notes of my own.

224. If you happen to have prints, you might forward a sufficient number of copies to Mr. Bettany, in order that each member of the Committee might have one ?—Yes, in addition to the two memoranda to which reference has been made, we have added to the abstract of the Factory Act (which must be affixed in factories and workshops) a note as to truck, of which I have copies here. May I explain that in consequence of the exemption of cotton weaving in Lancashire and the adjoining counties, it was necessary to differentiate. The note added as to truck is brief, and only attempts to put forward in simple language the more important points. The affixing of an abstract is in compliance with the Factory Acts but there is no requirement of the same kind as to the Truck Acts, and one of the points I wish to suggest to the Committee is whether it should not be obligatory in some way or other

225. Perhaps you would give that suggestion greater definiteness—assuming that your own suggestion were carried into effect, what would be the precise form you would suggest ?—I would suggest that just in the same way as the Factory Act requires a summary of its provisions to be affixed in prescribed terms in every factory and workshop, so in the same way the Truck Acts which apply to the same factories and workshops should be summarised in simple prescribed terms, and exhibited for the information of the persons employed. The Truck Acts themselves are not easily accessible, and not always perfectly clear in their meaning. The explanatory Truck note which has been appended to the Factory Act Abstract may possibly be ultra vires, but we have had no complaint. The abstract I suggest would go more into detail. As regards the cotton weaving industry in Lancashire, Cheshire, etc., we had to distinguish, and that was done by means of a gummed slip which is substituted in the case of cotton cloth factories in those counties.

226. Are we to understand that your department as such institutes or suggests the institution of prosecutions ?—As a last resource.

227. I think that is a valuable way of putting it; what in the ordinary course precedes that ?—We endeavour as regards the Truck Acts, and also the Factory Act, to secure compliance with the law. In many cases all that is required is a clear understanding of the law on the part of persons upon whom the duty rests, the employers more particularly. As a rule, we are able by instructions and explanations to secure that compliance. We do not prosecute unless we think that the observance of the Act would be furthered by prosecution. We are content when we can secure the remedy. That line was especially necessary when the 1896 Act was passed; it was a new conception not only to the inspectors but to the employers and workpeople. It was misunderstood by the workpeople as legalising fines, which it did not.

Dr. B. A. Whitelegge, C.B.

9 May 1906.

228. Do you mean that it was understood as if the Act legalised fines ?—Yes, it was so understood by the workpeople, and that I think explains in great measure the demand for the exemptions of the cotton cloth factories in the four counties I have named. It was misunderstood also by the employers; it was a new duty cast upon them, and many of them proceeded at once to draw up long lists of penalties, often with not the least intention of inflicting them. As regards the inspectors, it carried them into new technicalities with which they had not been concerned before, technicalities of different industries, trade customs, methods of payment, deductions, etc., so that even more than under other new Acts their work in the first few years of this Act was very largely educational. I venture to submit to the Committee that the results have been of enormous benefit in checking abuses under the first three sections of the Act. The prosecutions represent only those cases—a minority and comparatively few—in which the remedy was not secured by other means.

229. Such means as you have described ?—Yes.

230. Now, with regard to the prosecutions ?—I have prepared two tables for the information of the Committee, copies of which are in the hands of members. One of them is a summary of prosecutions during the years 1888 to 1905—following upon the powers given by the 1887 Act to inspectors to enforce the earlier Truck Acts. The Committee will see from the table that a very great change took place from 1897 onwards—that is, after the passing of the 1896 Act. The number of cases we lost is considerable, and much larger than the proportion under the Factory Acts, but that, I think, is only natural, because the Truck Acts, so far at least as the cases we take into Court are concerned, deal largely with matters of opinion as to whether a given charge does or does not come under a more or less vague definition included in the notice, whether it is reasonable in all the circumstances of the case, and what circumstances should be taken into account. It is only natural to expect that we should lose a number of such cases: prosecutions under the Factory Act are more concerned with plain matters of fact and well-established precedents. There is another consideration that should be borne in mind on looking to the results of Truck prosecutions. Owing to the difficulties attending the present form of the Truck Acts, we sometimes have recourse to alternative informations. An offence may be legally attacked under either one of two Acts or sections according to the view taken by the court. In some instances, but not oftener than we can help, we lay alternative informations, and in event of obtaining conviction under the first we withdraw the second, explaining the circumstances to the court.

231. Is the second information included within your statistics ?—Yes, as an information not sustained. It goes to swell the total of cases dismissed.

232. Would it be convenient to illustrate that point as to alternative informations ?—In the case of compulsory sale of damaged goods, a matter to which we attach importance, we might lay an information under either the 1831 or the 1896 Acts. In some cases we have been advised that it is desirable to attack it by information under both Acts.

233. What would be the special charge under the Act of 1831 ?—Making a contract as to the way in which the wages should be laid out.

234. And under the other Act, the Act of 1896 ?—As a deduction for damaged goods.

235. Still, the general result appears to be that in these cases you have had convictions in rather more than one half ?—Yes. I have examined the matter somewhat closely. I was struck at the time with the number of cases we lost in 1904. I found that three or four of them were of the kind to which I have referred, alternative informations. Some were cases withdrawn in order to lay an amended information on the suggestion of the court. Two or three cases turned on the outworkers' question which led to a decision in the case of Squire v. Midland Lace Co., so that the number of real failures is not quite so large as at first might appear. The Committee will observe that in 1905 the result was far more satisfactory, as out of thirty-eight cases we obtained thirty-four convictions.

236. Yes, and I observe that in 1900, 1901 and 1902, you were fairly successful ?—Yes.

237. Can you give me any idea by way of illustration with regard to the cases dismissed in 1904, what proportion of them were dismissed on grounds of procedure ?—I will have inquiries made and send you the result.

238. Have you any record of the prosecutions under the Factory Act ?—I have not got out a separate table on the subject, but the materials are ready to hand, as they are published in the annual report.

239. If it is convenient, perhaps you would let us have a statement for the same year showing the equivalent cases under the Factory Act. And that could be printed in the appendix as it may turn out to have relevancy with regard to certain aspects of our inquiry ?—Quite so, I can furnish the information. I had prepared another table, it is, however, hardly ready yet to submit to the Committee, as by a misunderstanding it is only brought up to the 31st August, 1905.

240. What is the bearing of it ?—It is an analysis of the prosecutions distinguishing the section under which they were taken.

241. Personally, I should attach importance to that table, but would you mind having a separate column showing where the dismissals were upon methods of procedure or after trial, as I want to ascertain how many of the prosecutions actually brought to trial failed ?—I shall make a note of that. Under the 1831 Act, we laid sixty-five informations; under the 1896 Act we laid fifty-nine informations under Section 1, 101 under Section 2, and 126 under Section 3. Under Section 6 there were three. There were 20 other cases.

242. Do you find that as the result of persecution under specific sections of the Act a deterrent effect is produced ?—Yes. Even when prosecutions have failed we have found beneficial results to follow. That was so, for instance, in the Donegal cases. In another at Bristol, where we took action as to fines and unreasonable deductions, we lost again, but there was great improvement in the local practice owing to the light thrown on the abuses. May I say this, as bearing on what has been done with regard to prosecutions. It is a very common practice for the employers to come to the inspectors—and in matters of difficulty that means that the questions are referred to the Central Office—asking advice as to lists of fines and deductions under the 1896 Act. The position of the inspectors is rather difficult, because, although it is a reasonable part of their duty to give advice and assistance to both parties, this is really an ex parte application, and they have to be very guarded in expressing any approval. Our practice is to refuse to express approval of any code of fines whatever; but, to call attention to anything that seems to us on a careful examination to be open to objection, and then to say with regard to the rest that it will be the duty of the inspector, in the event of complaint or apparent abuse or grievance arising, to re-examine the notices; so that he cannot give any approval. But it is a great advantage to have truck notices sent to us, not only so that the inspector may have a general view of the truck practice and the truck conditions in a given industry or a given locality, but also that he may have from the outset an opportunity of calling the attention of the employer—who is often quite ready to receive advice—to the more obvious objections to his draft notice.

243. When you are consulted by employers, not exactly in order to have you ratify their action, but at all events to give advice with regard to it, have you ever carried out in practice the idea of calling the employees together; I suppose you have not ?—Probably the inspectors have consulted the operatives, and in the case of a doubt they would certainly, but the points that arise on the notice itself are usually of a semi-legal kind. If an inspector found it necessary in order to form an opinion about a given item turning upon trade customs, he would no doubt consult the operatives; but I cannot say how far or how often that has been done. The vast majority of appeals to the inspector I hear nothing of; it is the cases of difficulty that come to me. I may mention one case in particular, that of the Federation of Laundry Employers. They approached Miss Anderson, the principal lady inspector, with a long list of notices. Representatives of the employers came by arrangement and saw Mr. Cunynghame and myself and the lady inspector. We had a long discussion; they were absolutely reasonable and the result was that a code which we cannot take exception to as being unreasonable was fixed upon, and it is now generally used in London laundries. One or two important precedents were introduced; one was a maximum total amount of fines for a particular kind of offence; another was the exclusion of non-truck matters from the truck notice; neither of which, of course, is obligatory under the Act.

244. I have asked you as to the general effect of these prosecutions; but apart from prosecutions, or along with prosecutions, the general fact of your inspection remains between employers and employed ?—Just so.

245. Now, what has been the result of those Acts of Parliament so worked ?—A very great improvement indeed. I am confident that we have checked the worst abuses and more especially with the aid of the 1896 Act.

246. What are the conditions of the 1896 Act that seem to have given effectiveness to your work ?—Under each of the first three sections a very large quantity of extremely valuable work has been done by the inspectors, and now it is exceptional to find the unreasonable fines and deductions, or the long codes, or the frequency of fining, that was somewhat common at one time.

247. There have been some instances brought before this Committee already about very long codes, including, I think, in one case about eighty different items, with an addendum at the close, to say that anything not included in the preceding seventy-nine items should be subject to another fine, or something of that sort. Have you any observation to make upon that. I gather that that is very unusual ?—It always was, I think, very unusual to have a code of such a length, but I think I may say that in factories and workshops, at all events, there are none in existence now.

248. The case I am referring to was a shop case ?—I understand that there are long lists in shops, but I have no official knowledge of them.

249. Now that it has been brought to your notice, have you any suggestion to make; does it not appear to you that that prima facie seems to suggest that similar remedial action should be taken ?—Yes, by some authority.

250. By the State and its inspectors or by some authority ?—By some authority; I do not know that I should say the State necessarily; there are district authorities and county authorities.

251. I mean by some authority extraneous to employers or employed, and with compulsion behind it ?—Surely. I understand that shops are inspected already under the Shop Hours Act, and it would not seem difficult to provide for this matter also being taken in hand.

252. Just see that I do not mislead you in any way about that, because it is rather important. The existence of those long catalogues of fines substantially you may say could not have occurred under your field of operations ?—It could occur certainly.

253. It has not, in point of fact, occurred ?—I am speaking without the detailed knowledge that the inspectors who are in actual touch with factories and workshops would have, but we have so often obtained improvement of codes that were unreasonable in length, as well as codes that were unreasonable in other respects, that I am confident that any remaining unreasonably long lists would have been heard of.

254. In fact, if it be an abuse, the abuse would be at any rate largely eliminated ?—Largely eliminated. Of course there may be surviving instances; perhaps I put it too broadly.

255. Now we have got to the subject of fines. Will you give us your views as to that ?—I have referred to one difficulty already; that the truck notice (and this concerns, of course, fines and deductions of all kinds coming under the 1896 Act) is not necessarily free from other matter; there may be rules of discipline, or announcements that workers will be dismissed for certain offences, which are not truck notices. It makes it much simpler, and it is a common practice now to keep the truck notices apart from non-truck matters.

256. Will you explain that ?—The occupier can put up any notice he pleases. As long as anything else he chooses to say has added to it any notice that he is required by the 1896 Truck Act to give, that is a good notice but it is not a convenient method for the workers or for the inspectors. It would add to clearness very much if the notice which the 1896 Act requires did not contain any other matter. The employer is not required to give notice under that Act, for example, for what offences he will dismiss, he is not required to say when wages will be paid, or what notice is required to terminate the employment; but those matters often appear mixed up with truck questions, Then I would draw the attention of the Committee to the intention of the Legislature as expressed in Section 1. The section says, "The contract shall specify the acts or omissions in respect of which the fine has been imposed, and the amount of the fine, or the particulars from which that amount may be ascertained." That of course should be the aim; it is only reasonable that the worker should know what fines he is exposed to and for what offences. In practice it is extremely difficult to attain that definition even approximately.

257. What is the exact section you are referring to ?—Section 1, Sub-section 1 (b), of the Act of 1896. The intention is that the workman shall be able to know precisely how much he is going to be fined and for what offence. It is hardly practicable to enumerate all the offences and degrees of offence quite as specifically as this seems to suggest, to assign a single fine which is proper for all of them. There have been attempts to meet this by stating that the fine shall not exceed a certain maximum sum. We are told by the legal advisers of the Home Office that that is not sufficient—that the fine ought to be definite in relation to a particular offence, and that a maximum limit does not convey the information to which the worker is entitled

258. Have you any other observation to make ?—We find that it is difficult to insist on the precision of the statement of the offence and of the amount of the fine which the sub-section seems to require.

259. May I suggest that a great difficulty may have been created by the legal decisions contravening or appearing at all events to contravene sub-section (1) (b) of Section 1 in this particular; that the contract specifies the acts or omissions in respect of which the fine may be imposed, and yet, notwithstanding that, the decisions have given operative effect to extremely vague indetermined omissions; a fine is imposed quite vaguely, practically for any breach of the rules ?—That is the difficulty that I have in mind.

260. Take the Bristol case, which happened some time ago, in which Lord Alverstone gave judgment sustaining the Court of First Instance, or rather refusing to quash the judgment. The fine, as I recollect the case, was in respect of a breach of decorum in the establishment. The case I am referring to is the case of Squire v. Bayer. That was specialised only in this; that one girl played a Jew's harp and the other danced. The only thing against these girls was a breach of order and decorum in respect of that. Now I put it to you plainly: do you think that "all workers shall observe good order and decorum" satisfies the words of the Act of Parliament which particularly prescribes that the contract shall specify "the acts or omissions in respect of which the fine may be imposed" ?—It appears to me singularly lacking in definition, and it was that particular case that I had in mind. It does not appear to me, speaking as a non-legal official, that such a notice does adequately specify the acts or omissions and the amount of the fine incurred. If fines are allowed it appears to me to be hardly practicable in a great number of instances to give such precision as the sub-section contemplates.

261. If they are allowed as a system at all ?—If they are allowed as a system. To give absolute precision in the definition of offence there would have had to be mentioned the use of the Jew's harp, and the dancing; and such detail is hardly practicable.

262. I want your view upon that. There is no hardship in fact in it if you take into account this: that the employer has always his remedy of keeping due order and decorum by selecting workers who keep due order and dispensing with the services of those who are obnoxious in that particular. The remedy or discipline in the selection of proper servants is always behind all these Acts of Parliament ?—Certainly.

263. Do you think that discipline is improved by the permission of fines for anything so vague as that of which Squire v. Bayer is an instance ?—Certainly not, though I am not in a position to express any opinion as to what fines should be allowed. This certainly appears to me to err in the sense of vagueness and indefiniteness.

264. I think that is probably as far as we can go ?—Yes. Many employers get on without any fines at all.

265. It would be extremely valuable if you could crystallize that in any kind of figures or any well-grounded conjecture as to the number of cases ?—That would be difficult. If you take evidence from the inspectors they may possibly be able to give an approximate figure for some locality or some industry; but we have no official returns of the kind. That, again, is one of the suggestions that I thought of bringing before the Committee. Then, it is specified that the fine must be in respect of something causing injury to the employer.

266. Injury or hindrance ?—Quite so; I was using the term in a general sense. It carries us rather far in some instances. We have had examples of this kind; an operative has been found employed at illegal hours, the employer has been summoned and fined for it, and has then fined the operative. It is true that the employer suffered loss through the operative working at illegal hours, and it may well be that the operative was really in fault, but it certainly seems to be rather straining the section beyond what was probably contemplated at first to make the conviction of the employer a subject of fine upon the operative.

267. Apart from the detection of the offence, it would have resulted in a profit to the employer as well as to the operative ?—Yes, but in many of these cases the employment at illegal hours is against the wish of the occupier. A further difficulty arises in determining what is fair and reasonable. Take the case of a fine for unpunctuality or for non-attendance. In some works the doors are locked immediately after the appointed minute; sometimes a worker arriving a minute or two late is locked out for a considerable time. It is very difficult to say in those instances whether the fine ought to have relation to the few minutes that the worker was late first of all or to the length of time during which he was precluded by the occupier, not by his own will, from working.

268. May I ask you, upon that head, have you been put to establishing affirmatively in prosecutions the fairness and reasonableness of it ?—Practically we have to show that.

269. The law provides no means at present of affording an ex facie test of fairness or reasonableness—say in the opinion of an inspector or anything like that ?—No, except that in some portions of the 1896 Act it is specified that the fine shall not exceed the loss to the employer. That does not apply to fines; it applies to deductions of other kinds. That is the only attempt in that direction under the 1896 Act.

270. That, of course, places you in the position of proving your case negatively, that is to say, you must prove that it is not fair and not reasonable. Have you, notwithstanding that, been able to succeed in many instances ?—Yes.

Dr. B. A. Whitelegge, C.B.

9 May 1906.

271. May I ask you how? I suppose you put the inspector into the box?—Yes, and if necessary we put the operative into the box too; but not if we think we can prove the case without doing so, because it may place the operative in an invidious position with regard to his employer, and may lead to dismissal.

272. No doubt you find the County Court judges and those who try these cases attach considerable weight to the opinions of your inspectors in these matters?—Yes, fortunately. Then, what may be a reasonable fine for one operative would not be a reasonable fine for another. There is no suggestion in the Act itself as to any relation to wages.

273. On the contrary the Act seems to be content with having regard to all the circumstances of the case?—Just so. In some codes—I have mentioned one example—we have a maximum amount of fine for a particular offence; although under that particular clause there may be a number of fines arising in the course of a week, the maximium in that case was 4d. a week for one group of fines. In some of the pottery factories, where we have a portentous list of fines, there is a limit of one-twentieth of the wages inserted at the instance of the inspectors; it would help us very materially if the Act defined some maximum proportion to wages as one of the criteria of reasonableness.

274. Is your mind so far made up upon that as to enable you to recommend it to be done?—I would certainly suggest it for the consideration of the Committee. There are precedents for it. I am not in a position to say how far such an arrangement would lend itself to every industry; but I have not in mind any practical difficulty that need arise in fixing some sort of maximum.

275. Now will you go to the next point?—Often fines if they are at all heavy (and this applies also to deductions) are paid by instalments extending over several weeks, sometimes months. It is not clear—at least we understand it not to be quite clear—whether the particulars that the Act of 1896 requires the employer to furnish each time a deduction or payment is made must be given with every instalment. If not the operative cannot be expected to keep elaborate accounts and the system lends itself to evasion and unfairness. I would suggest that it is worth consideration whether, in the event of a fine or deduction being levied by instalments, each instalment should be coupled with a statement of particulars.

276. Do you happen to have any particulars as to the length of time that the instalments cover?—The lady inspectors will be able to give the Committee examples of instalments extending over many months.

277. The general policy of law would seem to be to make the fine a given penalty for a particular offence and to have it over and done with?—Yes, but as a matter of fact the fine is often paid by instalments. Attempts have been made to deduct from the wages of one operative fines or charges incurred by another. Attempts have been made, for example, to deduct a fine incurred by A from the wages of another member of A's family. I do not think there is any real difficulty with regard to that. We always challenge it, and I do not remember that we have had any practical difficulty.

278. That is a sort of corporate criminal responsibility?—Just so. I have already spoken of the lists being unreasonable in length. Fines may also be oppressive by frequency. If it turns out on investigation that fines have been inflicted constantly, then we examine more closely their reasonableness, and the truck notice, and the administration generally. In this matter the registers of fines are of very great value to the inspectors; we have as a guide a record of every fine inflicted under Section 1 of the Act of 1896. We have not any such registers of deductions for damage to goods or for materials supplied. I am not in a position to say that such registers could always and without undue inconvenience be kept under Section 2 and Section 3, as well as under Section 1; at the same time I want to suggest for the consideration of the Committee as a matter for further evidence whether the way may not be open for some change of that kind.

279. Is it by statute that these fines are catalogued?—The duty is placed upon the employer by Section 6, Sub-Section 3 of the Act of 1896; but that applies to fines only.

280. Then there is that mechanism existing at present?—Yes, and, if an employer chooses to carry on his business on lines of fines and deductions which other employers do not find necessary, I hardly think that he is entitled to much sympathy if he is called upon to do a little more book-keeping. Then, in many works the fines go to some sort of fund for the benefit of the workmen, not to the employers. My own opinion is that that is a wise and reasonable arrangement.

281. I am anxious to have your view about that. Let us take the case of fines for damaged goods, with the regulations that no profit shall be made to the employer, but that he is to be recouped, as we say in Scotland, for his damage, and no more. In such a case, would you still put the fines to a fund for the benefit of the workpeople?—I was thinking of fines in the sense of Section 1; charges for damaged materials would come under Section 2. There the employer may have to be recouped for some definite loss, but under Section 1 it is almost impossible to say what the employer's loss is. Suppose a worker is five minutes or half an hour late, it is not merely the profit on the work that the worker would have done in that five minutes or half an hour; his absence may dislocate the whole of the employer's arrangements; it may lose him a customer; it may interfere with the employment of other people as well as the absent workman.

282. On the whole do you think that the continuance of a fine—even though it was ultimately devoted to the workmen themselves—would of itself be a better protector to the employer?—Probably if one had a far wider knowledge of the whole of the trades of the country than I can claim from personal observation, one would be able to point to instances in which fines are on the whole beneficial and proper for the maintenance of discipline. I do not like fines in general, but if there are to be fines it seems to me that they ought to be used only as a means of discipline; and the impression on the workers and others would be much better if it were understood that the fines did not go to the profit of the employer, but went to some fund for the benefit of the workpeople.

283. I suppose you have no hesitation in condemning any system of fines which produces the result of profit to the employer?—I should say it is extremely wrong. Fines in general are, after all, only an alternative to dismissal or suspension or lowering of wages, and I do not see how any Act, truck or otherwise, could interfere with the freedom of the employer to use those other means if he is deterred from fining. It is a matter of general policy; there may be cases, and I understand that there are cases in mines, where fines are thought by operatives and inspectors, as well as employers, to be preferable to dismissal or suspension.

284. And in railway cases too?—Yes. Those, of course, are outside my official field.

285. Now, I see that you have a reference to certain complications as to fines for damaged goods where the work passes through various hands?—Yes; that is passing to Sub-section 2.

286. Will you just explain that?—In some factories the system is for workers to be employed in gangs or sets—not necessarily under a sub-contractor, but often under a foreman or a leader. In other cases the work passes through the hands of several different operatives dealing with different stages after it has been given out and before it is returned to be examined. We often have complaints of fines for some damage sustained in the course of this circuit, and it is very difficult for the person fined or for the inspector investigating it, or, in fact for anybody, to make sure who is really responsible. If, for example, a textile fabric after passing through several hands is found to be soiled, it may be difficult to bring home the fine to the right person.

287. In such a case as you figure are the wages received individually?—They may be, in the particular case I am thinking of they would be; in other cases they are paid out through the leader and distributed.

288. In the case of mines, as we know, the ganger of the team gets according to the coal taken from that face, and is paid a particular sum for the recovery of that coal, with an arrangement for distribution amongst his confrères. In such a case as that, of course, the difficulty would hardly arise, because it would be a deduction amongst themselves ?—Yes, and they would probably adjust it amongst themselves.

289. But you must of course know that that system of joint payment by results does not always operate, although in point of fact there has been joint effort to produce ?—Quite so.

290. Have you any suggestion to make with regard to that ?—I am pointing out a difficulty that we have met with administratively. I do not see any way round it. I think it is a weakness inherent in the system of fines when the work passes from hand to hand.

291. Now you come to the subject of the compulsory purchase of damaged goods ?—Yes. That is a point to which we attach a great deal of importance. We have one binding case to guide us, the case of Smith v. Walton. So far we have succeeded in enforcing the view that the compulsory purchase of damaged goods is bad in law. It is an offence which arises with tolerable frequency. It is one of the points in which an abstract of the Truck Acts would be serviceable.

292. I am rather surprised to hear, although, of course, I must take it from you, about the frequency of this system of making deductions of damaged goods ?—The frequency, I am happy to think, is rather of the past now, but we have had to attack it in a very considerable number of cases.

293. Under Section 2, you are still confronted with the same difficulty as you have in Sub-section (c), namely, that the amount is to be determined as "fair and reasonable" ?—Yes, and that is very difficult, because here the loss to the employer comes in. A doubt has been raised in the Home Office, where the practical effect of suggesting the loss to the employer as one limit, may not be really to encourage charging up to that loss—to regard it as the one and only needful factor in the matter. It appears to me important to retain it, but it would be better if it were made clear that it is only one, and not the only criterion.

294. The statute gives no authority for saying that you must take the loss as the measure: the statute only states the maximum ?—That is perfectly true. I only mention the doubt as having arisen. Personally, I do not share in it. Determination of the loss to the employer is practically impossible for the operative, and is very difficult for the inspector. It becomes rather easier under the next section, which deals with the material supplied, but here it is very difficult to say what the loss to the employer would be: he might, for example, lose a customer.

295. Still, on the other hand, we have to keep in view what your evidence seems to suggest with regard to Sub-section 1, that there should be a maximum of a similar kind put in here ?—You mean having regard to the earnings of the operative ?

296. Yes ?—Quite so. It applies equally here. If an employer chooses to employ, let us say, children or unskilled hands, or casual hands, at low wages, he must expect more risk of damage to goods as a consequence of the system upon which he works.

297. In fact, the damage rather arises from something inherent in the system ?—That would be so in the case I am putting. On the other hand, I do not think it would be at all reasonable to say that an employer should pay for bad work what he has contracted to pay for good work. That is one of the underlying difficulties. There are such things as carelessness and wilful damage.

298. I wish to put it to you whether such a case as carelessness and wilful damage would not be protected by the ordinary rules of contract between man and man ?—It is so protected, and as far as we know adequately, in many works. I do not know enough, and I do not think that any single individual knows enough of all the branches of manufacture in the country to say that there are no circumstances in which the best working system might not entail some sort of deductions for damaged goods but certainly it is found unnecessary by a good many firms, and I think it rests with employers to show why it is necessary in any particular case.

Dr. B. A. Whitelegge, C.B.

9 May 1906.

299. I am thinking of cases in which this method of enforcing discipline is not necessary on account of the intelligence of both parties, where you have an intelligent class of workmen and an intelligent employer—with good sense on either side to know that for decent wages decent work must be given, and that failing that they must part. Is that not in fact in your experience a good system ?—Certainly a good system, and certainly the best system, but I cannot go so far as to say that there are no circumstances in which deductions within the scope of Section 2 may not be a reasonable method.

300. I was putting that question to you not as expressing my own view, but in order to elucidate—what no doubt will be a matter of scrutiny afterwards—our views upon the whole question of the total and absolute extinction of fines and deductions, leaving parties to their ultimate remedies on the lines I have suggested. I do not suggest for a moment that that is my own mind, but at all events all you can say is that you think in principle it is sound, and according to your experience it has been largely successful ?—I cannot speak to the scale. In many works they manage without deductions of any kind. It is the ideal system undoubtedly, but I cannot claim to know enough of all the details of all the industries of the country to say where and how an absolute prohibition of fines and deductions would pinch.

301. Now under Section 3 we get to the subject of deductions in respect of materials ?—The question of fairness and reasonableness arises here, and I want to point out again with regard to this section, as well as with regard to Section 2, the difficulty that there is in determining even that one point of the cost to the employer. Take, for example, the charge for the supply of power; the cost to the employer may include fuel wages, capital charges, depreciation, and all the rest of it. It is impossible for the workman, who has not access to the employer's books, to find out what the real cost to the employer is, and it is very difficult for the inspector; although I am bound to say that we have found the employers generally ready to give us every information, and we have been able to come to some conclusion There is a precedent for something more in Section 97 of the Act of 1887, which provides for a statement of account and for an audit. Whether it be always practicable or not I am not in a position to say. I understand that in many instances it has not been enforced. At all events it deserves consideration, because it does put on the employer some of the burden of proof that you mentioned just now with regard to another section. If, however, there is to be an audit I do not see why the two auditors should be both appointed by the workmen. Then there is a further precedent in the Hosiery Act of 1874, which forbids deductions for frame rents.

302. Is there a provision in that Act about the audit ?—I meant to suggest this as a precedent of a different kind.

303. Before we pass from this, may I ask is there any class of witness who will give us information as to how the audit works; would your inspectors be able to give us that ?—Surely, but I cannot at the moment mention any particular inspector who would have information on that point.

304. On the matter of principle, suppose we were to recommend that the fines and deductions should be always rendered effective for workmen's purposes, then the claim for audit would seem to arise, would it not ?—For some statement of account and audit. At all events it deserves consideration. There may be difficulties that I cannot foresee, not having detailed knowledge of all the trades of the country. The words of Section 9 are these: "Where deductions are made from the wages of any workmen for the education of children or in respect of medicine, medical attendance or tools," then there is to be an audit. It appears to be at all events prima facie feasible in the case of deductions of this kind in which the employer should be able to strike a balance.

Dr. B. A. Whitelegge, C.B.

9 May 1906.

305. Then you were going to the Act of 1874 ?—Yes. that was on a different point. Certain deductions of the kind, with which Section 3, 1896, is concerned, are forbidden in respect of the hosiery trade by the Act of 1874, although they are allowed in other trades. The deductions actually made under Section 3 are very various. There are deductions for tools and materials used, machinery, lighting, and even for assistance in work. But I wish to refer more especially to the deductions for duties which the Act makes obligatory on the employer—deductions for cleansing of premises, medical examination, and so on.

306. Have you a deduction under the statute for cleanliness and medical examination ?—They may be covered by Section 3. In a considerable number of cases deductions are made for cleaning premises, in some cases for cleaning latrines.

307. Under the phrase "something done or provided by the employer in relation to the work" ?—Yes ; and we understand that a deduction of that kind is not illegal, and that we cannot challenge it. The broad principle, it appears to me, should be that if the Factory Act, or other Act, puts a plain duty upon an employer, he ought not to recoup himself at the expense of the workman. The things done or provided by the employer in relation to the work may be held to include the provision of sanitary accommodation, lavatories, mess-rooms ; the employer could charge, I imagine, for any of those things, but I suggest that it is unreasonable that he should do so where the duty is imposed upon him.

308. Among other things which he is entitled to charge for is standing room ?—Yes, that is expressly mentioned. Deductions of that kind imply an indirect and not very desirable way of arriving at the true wage.

309. Would you allow me to put this point to you? Under Section 1 of the Act of 1896 there are deductions allowed in respect of fines, and under Section 2 in respect of damaged goods. Those two sections cover the cases where the employer has done everything on his part, but what he has done has been undone by irregularity or impropriety on the part of the workmen. Is not Section 3 differentiated from that by this, that Section 3 contemplates the case in which deductions can be made in respect of no irregularity and no impropriety at all ?—Quite so.

310. I wish to follow that up by putting this. Does it not occur to you that with reference to the whole scope of Section 3, Parliament might be well advised to interpose, to say that in such a case the wage struck shall be a net wage, and that all those deductions in respect of accommodation, the use and supply of materials, and so on, must be taken into account in fixing the net wage ? I take standing room as an instance. Suppose 2d. a day is charged to standing room ; would it not be a far better arrangement to prohibit such a deduction, and to let the employer or workmen fix their net wage, that is to say, the wage less that charge ?—I think it would be a far better arrangement. But while that may be clear in respect of standing room and many other things, there may, on the other hand, be things to be done or provided by the occupier which he may with advantage do and provide, and for which a deduction may be reasonable.

311. Let me limit my question in this way. Let us deal with anything in the nature of a fixed charge. I will take standing room to begin with ; that is clearly a fixed charge ; lighting is clearly a fixed charge ; heating is clearly a fixed charge. Those are all debit items in the employer's account which he can reckon beforehand as part of the on-cost of the working of his workshop ; therefore, so far as he is concerned, does it occur to you that there is any difficulty with reference to those fixed items of charge, a net wage being struck ?—No difficulty occurs to me.

312. Your difficulty, naturally enough, and one's own difficulty, arises rather with regard to the supply of materials or tools ?—Yes.

313. In which the workmen's habits may interpose a variable element ; one good workman may require fewer tools and less on-cost in that sense, and even less material, than a bad workman would ?—Quite so ; he would make less waste.

314. But with regard to the invariable element which I call the fixed offset, or standing charge of the business, does it occur to you that there is any difficulty in striking a net wage and letting the parties know exactly how they stand ?—I see no difficulty except a possible difficulty in definition of fixed charges.

315. I suggest to you that at all events, progress would be made if we took out all the fixed charges on the face of this Section 3, such as light, heat, standing room, and so on ?—Yes. "Materials, tools, or machines, standing room, light, heat" ; and others might be added for the purpose of exclusion.

316. On the category that I suggested to you—which just occurred to my mind—namely, category of fixed and ascertainable charge ?—Yes.

317. That of itself would be a considerable improvement in the situation, would it not ?—Yes. I understand the suggestion would not apply to the whole of the items specified in Section 3.

318. Not necessarily ; of course the Committee will judge of that ; but at all events we seem to be agreed that we might make a satisfactory inroad into that section ?—Yes.

319. You have mentioned cleanliness ; would you mind enumerating the other statutory duties of the employers ; or may I suggest to you a phrase of this kind, that the clause of Section 3 of the Act of 1896, which permits a deduction for anything to be done or provided by the employer in relation to the work or labour, should at all events be conditioned by this : "Provided that such thing done or provided be not already a statutory obligation" ?—I quite agree. That is the suggestion that I wished to convey.

320. Then there is something about mess-rooms ?—Some of the regulations and special rules in places where poisonous substances are used require the employer to make provision for mess-rooms. As this is a statutory duty of the employer, there ought to be no deduction made. Where it is provided by the employer as a purely voluntary concession for the convenience of the workman, the position is different. It may be a very great convenience to the workpeople to have a mess-room, cooking facilities, food, hot water, especially to workpeople living at a distance. There are many instances of that kind. We do not interfere as long as we find that there is no grievance arising, and no complaint is made, and that the charge in no case exceeds the cost to the employer. But complications arise as to the charge to persons who do not use the mess-rooms. Some employers have said "we cannot undertake elaborate book-keeping in order to distinguish the people who do and do not use the mess-room." But, as a matter of fact, the charge is made generally only to the persons who use the accommodation. Then with regard to deductions for medical attendance, hospital subscriptions, clubs, and so on, we are advised that these are outside Section 3. They may be beneficial and desirable. By arrangement deductions are often made for those purposes from the wages of the workpeople, and at the request of the workpeople. It does not appear to me that any hardship can arise as long as it is not a condition of employment, and as long as the individual workman has made written application to the employer to stop the amount from his wages. I foresee difficulties if an application from a body of workmen as a whole were to govern deductions from individual workmen. Take the case of a hospital subscription or a friendly society subscription ; an individual workman may have made some other arrangement of his own, and he should not be called upon to pay twice over. I do not know if the Committee have had before them the Shop Clubs Act, which lays down a number of conditions governing deductions of this kind in the places to which it applies. These, I think, deserve consideration in connection with the general question as applied to factories and workshops. I do not know that I need detain the Committee by going into detail,

321. The Legislature appears to have considered the whole question of the workman not being compelled to join a club, and so on ?—Yes.

322. Would you suggest that that should be extended generally ?—I suggest that it is a matter deserving consideration. It appears to me to embody a useful principle.

By Mr. Delevingne.

323. Does it not apply already to factories and workshops ?—It is not administered by the inspectors. There is one other point which has a bearing on the question of deductions for things done or provided by the employer. Until 1901 the employer was entitled to recover from the child or its parents a proportion of the fee paid to the certifying surgeon for a certificate of fitness. That was cancelled by the Act of 1901. This is a step in the direction of disallowing charges for duties which are obligatory upon the employer. We have had other examples of deductions still further afield. Probably the Committee have already had particulars of the case of Owner v. Hooper, in which the employer made a charge for the cost of insuring against his liabilities under the Compensation Act.

By the Chairman.

324. Does not that occur to you as falling within the kind of generic term that I used just now ?—Certainly; it is a typical instance of an improper charge.

325. It is improper in this sense also, from a practicable point of view, that it is a calculable and fixed charge which should be reckoned as part of the working on cost of the business ?—Yes. In the case in point, it was calculable, but the employer derived a profit from it in addition to recouping himself. One final word upon Section 3. Some employers require their operatives to wear a distinctive dress. They may be compelled to do so under special rules and regulations; that case is covered by what has been already said; but there are other cases in which the employer requires it on the ground of neatness or cleanliness—for instance, in dealing with food supplies—and there is something to be said in favour of it. But when the employer proceeds to charge the employee for it, some possibility of hardship at all events does arise. In some instances, again, the operatives have to bring their own overalls, so that no truck question arises at all, but still the same sort of hardship may come in.

326. Then you have a reference to the subject of discount ?—Discount, I thought, was a point that ought to be brought to the attention of the Committee: you will probably wish to have evidence from the inspectors, who are more immediately in touch with it. Take, for example, the Sheffield trades. The wages and deductions are fixed for a number of different items at a standard rate varied from time to time by a "discount" agreed between the employer and the workman according to the state of trade. I only mention this because it further complicates an already complicated system of arriving at wages. I understand discount to be outside the reach of the Truck Acts, and I do not suggest that any substantial injustice arises under it.

327. Are those organised trades that you refer to ?—Many of them.

328. Do those organised trades accept the situation ?—I understand so, and I am afraid that the Committee will find that the organised trades will have an objection to any change which would even nominally lower their rate of wages. I mean, a net wage might appear to them a lowering of wages.

329. That is rather a curious result, is it not, because it comes to this in effect: that the standard rate of wages is nominal, and the facts do not operate at all ?—No doubt. I cannot say what the discount is at the present time.

330. But take the figure (which is not unreasonable) of 5 per cent.: that means that a man is supposed to be earning £1, which is the standard rate of wages, but in point of fact he himself and his master know that he is only getting 19s. ?—Quite so, equally with the fixed deduction that we have already discussed, such as deductions for light, heat, power, standing room, and what not.

331. At all events, the matter of discounts is a matter in which both parties are on a level and have their eyes quite open to the transaction ?—Quite so, and I do not suggest that substantial injustice arises, but it is a complication of the system of calculating wages. Then, allied with that, may I just mention the bonus system; probably Mr. Cunynghame has already dealt with it. In some trades, in addition to the wages ordinarily paid, there is an agreement—not usually in writing—that a bonus shall be paid—an additional wage, so to speak—in consideration of rapid work, good work, punctuality of attendance, and so forth.

Dr. B. A. Whitelegge, C.B.

9 May 1906.

332. I think we have had that dealt with pretty fully by Mr. Cunynghame ?—Then I need not dwell upon it. The practical point of importance to us is this, that if an employer is at liberty to escape from the provisions of the Truck Act with regard to fines by simply calling a portion of the wages he pays a bonus, instead of calling it wages, then the effect of Section 1 of the Act of 1896 is very largely nullified. This is a point that we are at present attempting to establish by an appeal case in Ireland.

333. You are against the system, in fact ?—Surely.

334. If it is a fine, I fancy your view would be, let it be a fine according to the Statute regulating and providing what fines are permissible, but if it is anything more than that, it ought not, under the evasive name of a bonus, to be permitted at all ?—Precisely.

335. Before you come to your suggestions, there are two matters that we might try to get from you to-day: one is with reference to the living-in system, and the other with regard to out work ?—I have very little to say about the living-in system, but some of the inspectors, more especially the lady inspectors, will be able to give information about it in relation to factories and workshops. My own view is that it may be of great advantage to the persons employed, but it is clearly one which needs control, which control in all respects it is difficult for the inspectors to give. It is not only factories and workshops in the ordinary sense and shops that are in question. We have on the fringe of the Factory Act a great many institution premises, convent laundries and workshops, institution laundries and factories, and so on. The living-in system is often a more or less essential part of the system in such institutions. So that, whatever conclusion the Committee arrive at with regard to living-in generally, I suggest that it may be necessary to have special consideration for those places.

336. Then as to out-workers ?—We have always understood—at least until recently—that the out-workers were subject to the Truck Acts, and that clearly was the idea present to Parliament in 1896 when Section 10 expressely gave powers to the inspectors of factories to administer the Truck Acts so far as they related to out-workers. But in the year 1897, the Irish Courts held that the extension was not as wide as we thought.

337. Will you give us the reference to that case ?—Squire v. Sweeney. We were instructed to proceed on the assumption that the Truck Acts do apply to out-workers, at all events in England and Scotland, and we have gone upon that since, but now we are met with a decision in Squire v. Midland Lace Company which stays our hands altogether in that respect so far as regards the ordinary case of out-workers. It would not apply in cases where there was a personal contract by the worker; that, of course, is very rare. The position is the more to be regretted because we had had a considerable amount of success in securing improved treatment of out workers under the Truck Acts.

338. On what lines ?—We thought we had the ordinary powers of the Truck Acts at our back. There was an important inquiry in Donegal which the lady inspectors carried out in 1897 and 1899. It was true that we failed in our immediate attack, but it led to substantial improvement.

339. What was the business there ?—Work given out by the Belfast manufacturers to be hemmed and stitched by cottagers in Donegal; it was distributed by local agents, often by shopkeepers, who paid for it in tea and sugar and so on. In the Shetlands and in the Hebrides we have had extensive inquiries about truck among home-workers by one of the inspectors, Mr. Newlands, and I hope the Committee will have evidence from him. He found widespread prevalence of customs opposed to the spirit of the Truck Acts, and was able to secure better method in many instances. Then again, there is truck in the chain trade in the Black Country; one of the superintending inspectors, Mr. Redgrave, will speak to that. The lady inspectors can give evidence as to truck in glove making and "braiding." These are only examples of truck among out-workers. We have proceeded on the assumption that we could enforce the Truck Acts as regards home-work, and, acting on that assumption, we have succeeded in doing a great deal. Now, of course, we are theoretically powerless.

340. Does anything occur to your mind that would interfere with propriety or freedom, or any of those usual names that are employed in such questions, if you were to apply the Truck Act to out-workers ?—I can conceive no reasonable objection at all. It appears to me that the Truck Act is as essential for the out-workers as for the in-workers. Section 10, 1896, shows that it was meant for out-workers, and they are expressly mentioned in Section 116 of the Factory Act in connection with the closely allied question of particulars of piece-work wages.

FOURTH DAY.

Wednesday, 16th May, 1906.

PRESENT.

The Right Hon. THOMAS SHAW, K.C., M.P., Lord Advocate for Scotland (Chairman).

E. A. BROTHERTON, Esq., M.P.
FREDERICK CAWLEY, Esq., M.P.
MALCOLM DELEVINGNE, Esq.
J. RAMSAY MACDONALD, Esq., M.P.
FREDERICK MADDISON, Esq., M.P.
Mrs. H. J. TENNANT.
A. F. YARROW, Esq.

T. E. BETTANY, Esq. (Secretary).

Dr. B. ARTHUR WHITELEGGE, C.B., was re-called; and further examined.

Dr. B. A. Whitelegge, C.B.

16 May 1906.

By the Chairman.

341. You might now continue your evidence, taking it up at the point you had reached when we last separated ?—Perhaps it would be convenient if at this point I handed in the amended tables which I prepared at your request. There are three tables, of which copies have been furnished for the use of the Committee (see Appendix II.).

342. Would you please distinguish what alterations you have made upon the tables produced at our last meeting ?—In the first table I have given year by year the number and result of prosecutions by the Factory Department under the Truck Acts from 1888 to 1905, and I have introduced a new column as requested, distinguishing cases which were withdrawn for Departmental reasons, or with a view to other proceedings; that is Column 8.

343. What is the second table ?—It is a detailed analysis of the same prosecutions according to the sections under which the informations were laid, and here again a column is introduced, distinguishing those which were withdrawn in view of other proceedings; that is Column 9, upon the two page table. In both tables the prosecutions are distinguished according to factory and workshop; the prosecutions in respect of outwork are included in the workshop totals.

344. That is of course naturally correct, because presumably outworkers are more in relation to workshops than to factories ?—Yes, but by no means exclusively so.

345. Can you give us any general idea of the average relations. What proportion would the outworkers connected with the workshops bear to the total ? Would they represent three-fourths of the total ?—I could not give an estimate. Many are not connected with either factories or workshops, except indirectly, the outwork being given by an intermediate agent or contractor.

346. Before you pass from these two tables, please look at the figures for 1904, upon the first of them. It would appear from Column 8 that nine cases were withdrawn in view of other proceedings, five for amendment, and four after conviction for some offence under another section ?—Yes.

347. In the case of the five withdrawn for amendment, was the libel amended and the prosecution followed up ?—So far as I remember prosecutions followed in three of these cases; in the other two, for reasons which I do not remember, the action was not carried further. Probably there had been substantial amendment, and it was not thought necessary to carry the cases further.

348. In the other cases there was a conviction, although under another section ?—Yes, these are examples of the alternative informations which I mentioned to the Committee at the last meeting.

349. The result is that instead of there being truly nine cases dismissed, that number was reduced to two on the merits ?—Yes.

350. That is to say, that four were had up and convicted for something else, and three were prosecuted after amendment of the libel, making a total of seven and leaving only two truly abandoned ?—Yes.

351. So we may take it from you as the result of your first table, that on the whole the Home Office prosecutions in the Factory Department have been very largely indeed successful ?—That is so, but not so largely successful as under the ordinary Factory Act, for reasons which I suggested at last week's meeting.

352. Such as ?—Such as the fact that we are dealing under the Truck Acts very largely with matters which are matters of opinion, and not (so much as under the Factory Act) with matters of fact.

353. In your second table there is a figure "9" with an asterisk attached to it. Is that our old friend of the former table ?—Precisely the same. May I add with regard to the second and larger table that I have distinguished, under the first three sections of the 1896 Act, those instances in which we attack the contract itself from those in which we attack a particular fine or deduction.

354. Yes, I follow that. Your first set of offences is making the contract ?—Yes.

355. I am not sure that this is made quite clear in the table, because you also deal with payments of wages other than in coin, and that was a contract, was it not ?—That was under the 1831 Act. I have only made the distinction in respect to the 1896 Act.

356. I think we are all indebted to you for these tables, and it occurs to me that it may perhaps be necessary when we hear some further evidence from other witnesses to recall you in order to illustrate some points which suggest lines of amendment in the law. Does anything occur to you by way of comment upon this table at the present time ?—I think not, except that I should like to point out to the Committee that not only have we succeeded in the great majority of the cases we have taken up, but the penalties have been substantial.

357. There are two points I am rather anxious about in this second table, namely, that by far and away the largest figures, and the most alarming apparently, under the 1896 Act, seem to be those where there are charges for damaged goods, not in pursuance of a proper contract. Is that not so ?—These are the largest figures.

358. You have there a total of sixty-one prosecutions out of which you obtained forty-six convictions ?—Yes.

359. Can you in popular language, apart from the sections of the statute, give an illustrative case bringing out what is the nature of that offence ?—The best illustration I can give is that it is compulsory purchase of damaged goods.

360. In what trade would that be carried on ?—The first instance that occurs to me is the clothing trade, where there have been more cases than in any other branch. Quite commonly in the earlier years of the 1896 Act, the worker who was supposed to have damaged a garment was compelled to purchase it, and the usual sequence was a raffle held among her fellow-workers, for it more especially affected women, and this we regarded as clearly an offence against the Truck Acts. We have succeeded in stopping that practice now wherever we have attacked it.

361. Still the narrative stops at the point I am anxious about, namely, it was apparently part of the bargain that if the goods were damaged the worker would have to take them. At what figure did she take them ? What was the substantial deduction from wages that ensued from that transaction ?—The Lady Inspectors will be able to give you many definite instances if necessary. What is present to my mind is that the workers were charged the wholesale price of the garment.

362. That was taken out of their wages ?—Yes.

363. She was thus put in possession of the balance of wages, plus the damaged article, and had to realise as much as she could get for that article ? Did the raffle usually realise anything like the wholesale price of the article ?—That I cannot say, but in some cases it certainly did.

364. What we are striving to get at is the ensuing loss to the worker; but of course the whole transaction is against the spirit of the Truck Acts ?—Surely. In many cases the garment in question was of no possible use to the workers upon whom it was forced. We had examples, for instance, in the manufacture of khaki clothing where girls were compelled to take damaged goods of that class which could be of no use to them.

365. Here is another rather alarming column, namely, charges for materials not in pursuance of a proper contract. I see you have there had no less than a total of ninety-nine prosecutions with regard to which you have obtained convictions in seventy-seven cases ?—Yes.

366. Can you there again illustrate in a concrete fashion what is meant by charging for materials not in pursuance of a proper contract; can you give us some instances which would make that luminous to us ?—One reason for the large number of prosecutions under this head is that we found it a convenient method of attacking an improper deduction of this kind to allege that it is not in pursuance of a proper contract. That leaves it open to us either to show that the particular deduction was unreasonable, or that the contract was bad. It gives us a wider field. Prosecutions have been taken in respect to very wide range of deductions. One example would be that of deductions for sewing cotton supplied to workers at a charge exceeding the cost to the employer.

367. Have you had such cases in practice ?—Yes.

368. Are these women's cases ?—Yes, but of course that is only one example out of many.

369. No doubt your assistants will be able to give us further particulars ?—Yes, any number of instances.

Dr. B. A. Whitelegge, C.B.

370. A question has been suggested to me by one of our number in this connection. With reference to the proportion of dismissals relative to convictions, it is rather a striking figure, namely, ninety-nine prosecutions and seventy-seven convictions. You withdrew four cases, and eighteen are dismissed, not for formal reasons, but after discussion on the merits. Was that because you were anxious to have these cases thoroughly investigated and tried ?—That was the reason for which the prosecutions were taken.

371. Can you give me any idea as to where it was that you failed to convict ?—We may fail for many reasons; our witnesses may break down in cross-examination, and we may fail to satisfy the Court that having regard to all the circumstances of the case, the deduction is (our opinion notwithstanding) unreasonable and improper.

372. You are here dealing with the section of the statute which imports necessarily a question of opinion as to reasonableness ?—Yes.

373. And there judges may naturally differ ?—Yes.

374. They may accede to or differ from the view taken by your Department ?—Yes.

375. Some of these cases, however, such as you have referred to, viz., the deductions for sewing cotton, might be ascertainable, might they not, by a reference to current values ?—Yes. In other cases we should need to know what the actual cost to the employer is, the wholesale price, and what discount he gets.

376. And such an inquiry might naturally produce different results on different minds ?—Yes, certainly.

377. Still it comes to this, does it not, that you have had over 75 per cent. of convictions ?—Yes, more than 75 per cent.

378. Notwithstanding the vagueness of the charge, in the sense that reasonableness is a matter of opinion ? That is true, but of course the question as to what real reasonableness is affects our judgment as to the cases that it is proper to take into court.

379. That is, you necessarily form your opinion as a Department before you authorise prosecutions ?—Yes.

380. May I take it that these are real prosecutions in the sense that none of them are taken for the mere purpose of exposing a thing, but in order to obtain a conviction which you think should be obtained on the merits ?—Certainly, but it does weigh with us in deciding as to a prosecution whether an offence is common in the district or not. If we find deductions that we regard as illegal to be widely prevalent, we should attach some importance to the pressure which will be produced by knowledge that the offence has been attacked successfully in other factories and workshops.

381. Naturally enough you have in view the deterring effect ?—That is one point that weighs with us. The inspector has also to consider whether, in view of what has happened since the offence, it is necessary to prosecute. Such considerations must weigh with him to some extent in deciding upon what report he should make.

382. Will you explain what you mean in the second table by the phrase, "without due particulars ?"—Under Section 3 a charge for deduction has to be accompanied by particulars, and the employer sometimes fails to give these particulars.

383. There is also a third table ?—It is produced in compliance with your request made upon the last occasion for comparative particulars of prosecutions under the Factory Acts as distinguished from the Truck Acts. I am sorry I cannot make it more complete without very laborious research through bygone records; but I have given the main facts, and they are fairly complete from 1895 onwards. The number under the Factory Acts is, of course, far larger than the Truck prosecutions.

384. There is one striking figure here, namely, that out of 37,004 prosecutions you obtained 35,412 convictions and there were only 875 dismissals ?—Yes, only between 2 and 3 per cent. of dismissals.

385. So that out of every 100 cases you have had from ninety-seven to ninety-eight convictions ?—Yes.

Dr. B. A. Whitelegge, C.B.

16 May 1906.

386. Who is it that manages these prosecutions. Am I right in assuming that the information is supplied in the first instance by the inspectors who cover the district ?—Yes.

387. Is that information then formulated by them in memorandum ?—Yes.

388. Are these memoranda then communicated to the solicitor or legal authorities at the Home Office ?—If the inspector thinks a prosecution is desirable he sends in a prosecution report ; that is considered by the superintending inspector under whose direction he acts, or by the principal lady inspector, and subject to their approval a prosecution can be instituted. If there is a doubt in the matter they refer it to me, and if necessary I refer it to the Secretary of State.

389. So that before the case reaches the arm of the law the matter has on its merits been very carefully and fully considered ?—Yes. I should perhaps mention here that the proceedings in court are nearly always undertaken by the inspectors themselves.

390. Do they appear in person and conduct the cases ?—Yes.

391. Do you find that in practice that is perfectly satisfactory ?—Yes, we do.

392. On the record it seems to be eminently so ?—We find it in general the most satisfactory plan ; the inspector being in constant touch with the Acts, becomes familiar with every detail that is likely to arise in discussion.

393. Suppose this Committee came to be of opinion that we might broaden, as it were, the scope of inspectorial duties—if that is a proper word—no doubt you would still think that the inspectors would conduct the prosecution in the same simple and effective way as before ?—Yes.

394. Any suggestions that you have made with regard to the amendment of the law are not suggestions which would in any way interfere with the smooth and swift administration of justice in this matter ?—Certainly not.

395. Of course it might involve an increase in the inspectorate if the duties were largely increased ?—I hope so.

396. I assume you don't hope for an increase of the duties, but if the duties were materially increased you would want a staff sufficient to cover the new duties. Is not that what it comes to ?—Yes.

397. Perhaps you would now resume at the point we had reached at the close of last meeting. I think we were on the subject of outworkers and you made an allusion to the Donegal case in which the Department thought it right to institute a prosecution, which, however, failed ?—Yes.

398. Does that suggest to you the expediency of an amendment of the law ?—I think it most important that the outworkers, the home workers, should have the same protection with regard to truck that the inworkers have, and I think that is all the more necessary in view of the large extension given by successive orders of the Secretary of State to the closely allied question of the particulars of piece-work wages which largely affect outworkers. The Particulars Clause has been extended to a number of industries by the orders of the Secertary of State. If these outworkers are entitled to particulars of their wages, it follows that they ought to have corresponding protection and particulars as regards any reduction from their wages, whether in the shape of fines or deductions for materials supplied or damaged goods.

399. That seems conclusive at first sight, but would you illustrate that by pointing out if you conveniently can one of the orders applicable to these workers. You could perhaps give us the page in Mrs. Tennant's book ? —Page 336. The first order in the list as given relates particularly to pen-making, and that hardly affects outworkers. The next refers to locks, latches and keys.

400. I see that reference is made to the outworkers ? —Since the Secretary of State has had power to extend the section in question to outworkers that has been done in all recent orders for any industry in which we can find there is any outwork at all.

401. So as to cover any possible cases ?—Yes. The third order in the book has reference to cables and chains, and the fourth to wholesale tailors, where the outworker element becomes important.

402. What is the passage referring to it ?—Sub-section b, of Section 1, bears upon it.

403. (Chairman, reading). "Such particulars of the work to be done by each worker as affect the amount of the wages payable to him shall be furnished to him at the time the work is given out to him." That is simple, and there does not seem to be much room for offence in that ?—The substantial words are at the beginning of the clause.

404. Prior to this order, or to orders like that, what was the state of matters ? Were these outworkers substantially not under the Truck Acts to all intents and purposes ?—In view of recent decisions they certainly were not protected by the Truck Acts.

405. Do you mean the Donegal decision ?—I refer more particularly to the later decision in the case of the Midland Lace Company. After the Donegal decision we were instructed by the legal advisers of the Home Office that the decision need not affect our action in Scotland and England. The position was regarded as extremely doubtful, and the decision in the Irish Court did not alter our practice, subject to any test case that might arise in Scotland and England. Now it turns out that the Truck Acts do not apply to outworkers in the United Kingdom, and it appears that the outworkers were not only then, at the time of the order, but remain now, without the protection of the Truck Acts.

406. May the Committee take it as clear even from the text of these later orders by the Secretary of State that in the opinion of the Home Department these outworkers ought to have a similar protection ?—Yes, I think that is clear.

407. And these orders have been issued, of course, under the assumption that it was within the powers of the Department to include such workers ?—Yes, for the purpose of "particulars of piece-work wages," but the Secretary of State could not modify their position with regard to truck except by such exemption as was made in the cotton-weaving industry in Lancashire.

408. Is there any objection in principle that occurs to your mind ?—None.

409. Or is there any objection in practice ? I suggest to you a possible objection in practice, namely, that the inspectors would have a larger area of inspection. Does that occur to you as of any practical importance ?—I was thinking of the question of necessity and propriety from the point of view of the workers. So far as inspection goes the task is certainly more difficult in relation to outworkers, but there is this consideration, that in visiting factories and workshops the inspectors are visiting places from which work is given out to out-workers, so that even without visiting these out-workers in their homes there would be some supervision.

410. And of course the financing of it is all done through the books of the firm at their headquarters ?—Yes.

411. Questions of wages, etc., and all the book-keeping stipulations and agreements are at the central office ?—The employers' books available for inspection at the factory or works would presumably include such details. but would not be equivalent to truck notices posted up as in the case of inworkers.

412. As some substitute for that would you require some written communication to the outworker ?—Yes.

413. Do you think that should be stipulated for ?—I do.

414. That where outworkers are employed a copy of the Bill should be furnished to such outworkers ?—Yes, certainly, if the Bill or notice concerns the outworkers. The working details of the Truck Acts as applied to outworkers would be very similar to the working details required by extensions of the particular orders. Speaking without reference to notes, my impression is that these apply now to the bulk of the outworkers.

415. What was the next point in your précis of evidence ?—The next point I have is with regard to suggested amendments.

416. Before you come to your own particular views upon that, I am anxious to get your opinion as to a suggestion made to the Committee that it would be of advantage if the whole of these Acts were overhauled, codified, and brought up to date?—Personally, I attach very great importance indeed to that. The Acts as they stand are cumbrous. They contain a great deal of unnecessary verbiage. I have a copy for my own use in which I have erased those portions not necessary for an inspector of factories to read, and quite half of the wording of the Acts has disappeared in that process. It is important in all Acts affecting operatives or large bodies of manufacturers and employers that the wording should be as clear as possible, and the present Truck Acts are far from complying with that requirement. At present there is no stipulation that any abstract or summary of the Truck Acts shall be affixed in factories or workshops, and with a view to a short summary of that kind, I think it is very important that the doubtful points in the Acts should be cleared up, and that this should be done upon the lines of a re-draft, avoiding the complexities that exist at present.

417. That would not necessarily be anything like equivalent in length to the whole of the Acts, because so much in them obliterates what precedes?—Yes.

418. In practice do you prepare a precis of Acts of Parliament for your inspectors?—Under the Factory Act an abstract of that Act is required to be affixed on the premises where the people are employed, and the Committee have before them a copy of such abstract. There are abstracts for factories and workshops; although a truck note is appended to the abstract now, it is not in any way obligatory.

419. Have you specific suggestions with regard to what should be in truck notices?—We have met with truck notices in which it was not stated that a deduction should be fair and reasonable and that it should not exceed the cost to the employer. We attach importance to these words appearing. We have contested the point in a number of instances, and in several of them we have obtained the insertion of words to the effect I have quoted.

420. After legal proceedings?—Often without, and in one case by legal proceedings.

421. You have a suggestion as to the prescribed terms for such truck notices?—The description of fines or deductions that would be allowed under the Act must, of course, be left to the drafting of the individual employer. We could hardly prescribe terms for that, but it would be possible to some extent to prescribe the outline terms, the skeleton terms, or the fixed part of the notice. I wanted to call the attention of the Committee to the practice that is adopted under the Factory Act in respect of special exceptions. Special exceptions with regard to hours of labour and other matters are allowed by the Factory Act on condition that a printed notice is affixed in the factory and a copy of it is sent to the inspector. It is left there (as under the truck notice that I was suggesting) for the employer to fill in details which fit his own factory, but the outline of it must be in the prescribed terms, settled once for all by the Secretary of State. The same notice bears a statement of the conditions with which he must comply in order to make his notice good.

422. Of course, all that system you would recommend to be continued to the full?—To be continued and extended to truck notices if possible. I suggest that for the consideration of the Committee. There is this advantage in the other part of the suggestion, that a copy should be sent to the inspector. It would give the inspector a general knowledge of the extent of truck operations in his district or in a particular industry, and it would give him the opportunity of recognising and challenging at the outset anything obviously improper. It would mean in many instances an explanation to the employer which would be sufficient to lead him to bring his notice into proper order. At the same time, I do not suggest for a moment that the inspector should be called upon to express any approval, on the contrary, the instructions to the inspectors are that they must not approve of any code of fines, because it will be their duty afterwards if any complaint arises or if they suspect any abuse, to attack either that notice or the deduction for the fine or charge made under it. Therefore, while I think it is important for the inspector to have copies of all truck notices, I do not think that he should be called upon to express any approval.

423. In the case of any variation of truck notice a fresh intimation would, by statute according to your suggestion, have to be sent to the inspector?—That is my suggestion, following the precedent of the special exception notice under the Factory Act. When any change is made a notice is required to be fixed and a printed copy of that is provided for, which contains a slip which the employer must attach and send to the inspector.

424. Then we come back to our old trouble with regard to the word "reasonableness." Can you give us any more definite guide than just that word "reasonableness" itself. Assume, to begin with, that we have the cost to the employer as a sort of datum or standard; and assume that we have also reasonableness having regard to the cost to the employer; can you suggest anything further? I am rather anxious to get any suggestion from you that you can give us of language which would be more helpful?—I think it might be possible to arrive at some maximum proportion to wages so that a fine should become unreasonable if by repetition or magnitude it exceeded that proportion, or if concurrent fines for different offences exceeded that maximum. There are precedents for that in several truck notices now in force.

425. I think the percentage suggested was something about 5 per cent.?—Mr. Redgrave, from whom I hope the Committee will have evidence, has suggested that for a particular kind of deductions the aggregate should not exceed one-twentieth of the wages. Some employers have taken that suggestion from him and inserted it in their truck notice. I believe the lady inspectors may be able to give other instances. I need not refer again, I suppose, to the difficulty that there is with regard to "reasonableness" as turning upon the cost to the employer. It involves knowledge which the employer himself alone may possess, and we are met with this difficulty sometimes; a charge appears to be unreasonable because it is in excess of the probable cost to the occupier; if we ask the occupier for a sort of balance sheet showing exactly what he has received and what he has paid, we are asking him to give information incriminating himself under the Truck Act. It is true that the employer usually gives us the information; and as a rule we are able to secure a remedy; but if he refused it, as he would be entitled to do, we could hardly press it.

426. On the ground that he would be incriminating himself?—Yes.

427. It would be considered reasonable that a certain proportion of standing charge should be reckoned up which cannot be ascertainable by actual figures as to the cost of material?—Quite so.

428. And that is where you are groping in the dark to some extent?—We may often be in the dark. As a rule we can form an estimate usually with the assistance of information given by the employer.

429. Then there is a suggestion which struck my mind when I read your proof as to whether the Legislature would be helped by any enactment as to the burden of proof on this question of reasonableness. I would like to hear your view about that?—I referred last week to the precedent there is under the Hosiery Act, and probably the Committee will have evidence about that. It appears to me that if a charge to the operative involves considerations of this kind it ought to be open to the operative and to the inspector to obtain the necessary particulars. That substantially means putting the burden of proof upon the employer; that if an employer makes a charge he should be prepared to show that that charge does not exceed the cost to him.

430. I put it to you that on the general views of the case your inspectors might think that those charges were unreasonable; your suggestion is that they should have a power to make inquiries and to require answers to specific questions?—To require certain particulars to be given.

431. And that those answers could be founded upon in any prosecution; do you go so far as that; I do not see why you should not?—Yes; and the precedent in the 1897 Act goes further—that the operatives also are to have those particulars, in the shape of a statement of account and audit. But whether that would work out simply in all the industries to which Truck Acts would apply I am hardly able to say.

432. There might be difficulties ?—There might be grave difficulties that do not occur to me in respect of a particular trade.

433. Will you explain this note about "the abolition of charges for compliance with statutory duties" ?—That is substantially a summary of one part of my evidence last week.

434. Might I put it in this way; that there should be no possible charge made by the employer for furnishing what the statute requires him to furnish ?—Precisely.

435. On the other hand, there should be no deduction made from the worker in respect of not being a good workman in the ordinary contractual sense, but only in respect of some specific delinquencies which he has committed. Do you assent to that ?—Yes.

436. We had the case put of a man getting 17s. 6d. a week wages, but if he exceeded a certain standard of work he was to get an additional 2s. 6d. a week. Do you approve of that system ?—No; and mainly because it is not clear how far that system leaves the workman the protection of the Truck Acts.

437. Then you have some references to "written particulars with each instalment of fines." Do you mind enlarging on that a little ?—Some employers, when fines or deductions are heavy, distribute the charges for them over several weeks or it may be months. It is not altogether clear whether the particulars of the charges as a whole are to be repeated on each occasion when a deduction is made. It that is not done the worker is left in doubt as to the state of the account, because there may be many deductions running concurrently.

438. I would like you to illustrate that by instances ?—If a worker is fined anything amounting to a week's wages or more it would be harsh apart from the merits of the fine itself to deduct the whole of it from one week or two weeks' wages. The employers sometimes deduct so much a week for a number of weeks or a number of weeks or months. They are obliged by the Truck Act to give particulars of the fine as a whole. It is not altogether clear, and I suggest to the Committee that it should be made clear, that the particulars should be given on each occasion when any charge is made even although it is only an instalment; that it ought not to be enough to give particulars of the particular fine or deduction as a whole, but the worker ought to have on each occasion when any deduction is made a statement showing the position.

439. Does your evidence with regard to a percentage of wages apply to deductions ?—It would apply to deductions for damaged goods, but whether it applies to material supplied rather depends on how that question is left. I am hardly prepared to say that if the Truck Act of the future allows deductions for goods supplied in pursuance of a clear contract it would be possible to fix any proportion that those deductions ought to bear to the real wages.

440. You can see for yourself that there is a good deal of the objectionable in the idea of this running on of fines and the overlapping probably of two or three sets of fines ?—Certainly.

441. The liberty of both parties is thus tremendously infringed ?—No doubt.

442. Now if you could apply the principle of specific percentage to the whole amount of those deductions for fines, that overlapping would largely disappear, because you would be always within at all events a fixed percentage ?—Yes, it would simplify the matter immensely, but the doubt I was expressing was with regard to the section of the 1896 Act, which deals with materials supplied. If that is allowed I do not quite see how it would be possible for the Act to say that the value of the goods supplied shall not exceed one-twentieth of the wages.

443. I follow that and assent to it as far as I see, except to this extent; that the Committee might feel themselves bound to make that exception, but that exception being made beyond that they might think it right to suggest to the Secretary of State a percentage for everything else. Would that meet your view ?—Entirely.

444. Do you think that that would inflict any real hardship on either the workman or the employer; that is what we want to get at ?—I can only speak of the cases that have come under my notice, and they are very considerable in number, I have no case in mind in which that would prove unworkable. There may be underlying difficulties which do not occur to me.

445. The 5 per cent. that we refer to might have to be considerably enlarged; it might have to go up to 20 per cent. of a total possible deduction from wage ?—Yes.

446. You think it would be beneficial on the whole to have a maximum limit ?—I do.

447. But you very properly point out to us the exceptions with regard to goods supplied ?—I think that stands somewhat on a different footing.

448. You have a note as to the formation of a register of deductions of charges ?—Under the Act of 1896, Section 1, dealing with fines, the employer has to keep a register in which he enters the necessary particulars of all fines inflicted. That is of very great service to the inspector in examining into reasonableness on the ground of frequency. There is no such register record as regards deductions for damaged goods or for materials supplied. It may be that there are formidable difficulties in the way of having a register under those two heads, but if the Committee came to the conclusion that it was possible, I want to point out that it would be of very great service indeed to the inspectors in their duties. It not only shows the frequency of deductions and their amount, but it gives a clue to cases in which particular deductions have been made which may require investigation by the inspector.

449. It would be like a chart of the weather ?—Yes.

450. Then you have referred to the extension of the Acts to outworkers. Will you explain your reference to docks and warehouses ?—At present the powers of the inspectors with regard to the Truck Acts do not extend to docks and warehouses; we have no knowledge of truck questions in those places. I suggest for the consideration of the Committee whether docks and warehouses in that respect should not be on the same footing as other places under the Factory Act, and whether as regards truck the inspectors should not have the same responsibilities and the same powers in respect to docks and warehouses as they have in respect to other places.

451. Have you any idea (or is it beyond your jurisdiction) whether any of the abuses that have been remedied by legislative interference prevail in docks and warehouses ?—We have very little information indeed. We have heard a little of truck questions, because of the inquiries made on representations that the particular section ought to extend to those places, and that has necessarily brought in some questions of truck; but, speaking broadly, we have no knowledge in the Department of truck questions in docks and warehouses.

By Mrs. Tennant.

452. I think you said that if the inspection of shops for the purposes of the Truck Act were to be added to the duties of the inspectors under your department it would considerably increase those duties ?—Very largely.

453. Have you any opinion to express as to which would be the better authority to undertake the duty of inspection, taking all things into account—the local authority or the factory department ?—Speaking from some extended personal knowledge of local authorities, as well as of the factory department, it appears to me that the local authorities, having already to visit those places for other purposes, and having that duty presumably for the future as well as in the past, could most conveniently undertake the charge of truck questions there. The alternative would mean dual inspection, and an enormous increase to the duties of the factory inspectors in a narrow groove. It is not necessary for the purpose of inspection of truck in shops to have knowledge of fencing machinery and of the Factory Act generally. It does not appear to me that it would be an economical arrangement by any means for the factory inspectors to take over such a wide extension of duties.

454. I notice one point in your evidence as to the average number of inspections; it has some bearing, I think, upon the point on which I asked my last question. You said that on an average there was an inspection of every factory and workshop once a year ?—It was rather more than that. The number of inspections, if I remember rightly, is something in excess of 300,000 in the year; roughly speaking, something over 1,000 a day.

455. Are there any figures at the Home Office to show how many factories and workshops remain uninspected ? We know that certain factories receive perhaps twenty visits, or more, in the year, and that of course would affect the average. Can we ascertain how many of these places are uninspected ?—I have not the returns from the district inspectors. They are required to make returns to the superintending inspectors of factories and workshops which they have not been able to visit during the previous twelve months, and priority has to be given to those factories and workshops in the ensuing year. As a rule, they are outlying places of small importance.

456. Would you say they are in any considerable number ?—Yes, a considerable number.

457. Would you consider that it would be an advantage to have for the use of outworkers a similar notice to that which there is now for the use of inworkers. If there were a statutory requirement that there should be a notice for out-workers, do you think that it would be an advantage not only that they should have in their own hands a copy of the contract that they make, but that they should be able to see and discuss the notice in the same way that inworkers are able to see and discuss the notice ?—Do you refer to the terms of the Truck Act or the terms of the contract ?

458. I am thinking now of the terms of the contract. Under the Act they do not get a form of contract, and you suggested that each outworker should receive a copy of the contract. Do you think it would also be an advantage that, in addition to each individual worker having his contract, there should be hung up by the counter or place where work is given out a copy of the notice, so that each outworker should be able to discuss with the other out-workers what the terms of the contract are, in the same way that in-workers can discuss the terms of their contracts ?—There would be some advantage, but in the Orders of the Secretary of State extending the particular section, it is left as an alternative, and I do not think I should press for both in the case of the Truck Acts. There would be an advantage, undoubtedly.

459. Do you think there would be any disadvantage in the submission of the contract to the inspector by reason of this—that an employer might urge that he had submitted the contract and that the inspector had taken no exception to it at the time ?—Very many employers are in a position to say that already. It is the practice very generally to submit copies to the inspector, and I think it would be perfectly possible to cover ourselves in the same way if the practice were made general instead of optional, as it is now; that is to say, the inspector would make it clear in one way or another that he could not formally approve anything, but he would call attention to anything that occurred to him on the spur of the moment as being obviously contrary to the intention of the Act. I think it would be covered sufficiently in that way. The same thing applies, of course, on a smaller scale to the special exception notices that the inspector already receives. He may conceivably overlook some irregularity.

By Mr. Ramsay Macdonald.

460. I think on the whole you have given us to understand that you think the inspection of shops for the purpose of truck should be left in the hands of the local authorities ?—That is my feeling.

461. Have you any information in your department at the Home Office which would enable you to come to any fairly definite conclusions as to how the local authorities are now carrying out their duties under the various Shop Acts ?—That would not come to my department.

462. Your opinion, with reference to the inspection of shops for truck is not based upon your experience of how shop inspection is now carried on ?—No, nor am I even sure that the present inspectors have power to deal with truck questions.

463. I refer to the way in which the present inspectors carry out the duties that are imposed upon them in other respects than truck ?—I have knowledge of districts in which the shop inspection is, I believe, well carried out. I have never had the actual administration in that sense.

464. You do not think that the inspection of shops for truck would be of such a nature as to be somewhat foreign to the duties of the local inspectors responsible to local authorities for other work. What I want to suggest to you is, the necessity of some uniform criterion of criticising the various truck lists, fine lists, and so on. Could you give us some indication of your opinion in that respect ?—It would be a difficult duty for an inspector newly undertaking it, but he would, I presume, in any event act under supervision, whether of the municipal authority or of the county authority, and I think they would arrive at a proper working system.

465. I suggest to you that under the number of separate authorities that there are you would have different and conflicting standards of inspection ?—It would be difficult to secure uniformity—as we find, of course, even in the organisation of the Factory Department.

466. But in the organisation of the Factory Department you have ultimately one head, yourself and your own office ?—Yes, on referred questions.

467. On referred questions, which of course settle large disputed points, so that ultimately you do get uniformity ?—Yes; we aim at that.

468. Then with reference to another point. The Act of 1896, does not apply only to one section of cotton factories, cotton weaving; it applies for instance to spinning ?—Yes, and to cotton weaving outside the specified area.

469. I should like to ask you upon that whether as a matter of fact the cotton weavers are not in quite as good a position as regards protection against truck as the cotton spinners ?—The cotton weavers and also cotton spinners are very well organised, and quite capable of fighting their own battles. I do not hear of any complaints from them of difficulties arising from the compliance with their own request of exclusion from the Truck Acts; but we do occasionally hear (and I think the Committee will hear particulars from some of the lady inspectors) of complaints from individual workers, women, who rightly or wrongly think that they would have been better off if they had had the protection of the 1896 Act.

470. These individual workers are cotton weavers ?—Yes. The instances I am thinking of are from the West Riding of Yorkshire.

471. Let me pursue that point a little further. As I understand, the cotton weavers in 1896 objected specially to coming under this Act on the ground that the Act provided for an exhibition in the factory of the permissible fines ?—That was the ground, I believe.

472. May I suggest to you, in order to get your opinion that the exhibition in the workshops of the legal maximum fines will tend, in unorganised industries (I mean industries that are unorganised from the workman's point of view, industries in which there are no strong trade unions) to make fining the rule rather than the exception. I rather put this question to you in relation to your suggestion that the exhibition of fines should be extended to the case of outworkers, and that list should be given to them as well as to inworkers ?—I suggested a definite notice to the outworkers, and Mrs. Tennant further suggested that the notices should be exhibited in the places at which the outworkers attended.

473. Is there not a possible serious drawback to that exhibition ?—If the fines and deductions are to be allowed at all, I think it absolutely necessary that each worker who is or may be affected by them should be in full possession of that information, and I do not think that the fact of their being exhibited, made public, reduced to definite terms, can tend to the increase of fines; I should say it would have the contrary effect.

474. Would it not, in your opinion, be sufficient if we took care that the fines and deductions were properly entered in a register, and recommended such an increase in the staff of inspectors, whether local or national, as would make the inspection of that register a real thing ?—I do not think the register in itself gives sufficient protection to the workers. I imagine that whatever inspection is arranged for it will be of necessity an infrequent inspection. The protection which the Truck Acts intend depends mainly upon the proper comprehension of their rights by the workers themselves. They should be in a position to complain to the inspectors if necessary, but they should be able to look after their own interests, as the organised workers do on a more effectual scale.

475. Now with reference to the gang system, and the difficulty of apportioning fines or deductions, particularly deductions for spoilt work. Have any cases arisen in practice showing that there is a matter of fact very much difficulty in that, or is it mainly a theoretical difficulty ? —No, it is not theoretical. Mr. Redgrave will be able to give you instances from the potteries, and the lady inspectors will be able to give you many more.

476. Have any cases been decided in the courts throwing any light upon the legality of employers fining for time locked out (this is à propos your evidence last week). Suppose a workman or workwoman is late five minutes, and in consequence of being late five minutes he is locked out for an hour ; then the fine is imposed for the hour, not for the five minutes. That is the custom in some places is it not ?—You mean that the amount of fine represents an hour's wages.

477. Yes. Has any case been tried to test the question whether that is a legal deduction ?—I do not remember any.

478. I am supposing a case in which the workman is actually, so far as he himself is responsible, late for five minutes, but the employer says, " If you are late for five minutes, you must be late for an hour." Is the employer legally entitled to deduct wages for an hour, or only for five minutes ? No case, I think, has been brought before the courts ?—Not that I am aware of. It is very difficult to answer that point categorically. The point that would press itself upon the inspector would be, whether the fine was reasonable if based on an hour's absence.

479. But would not it be an element in it if the worker said, " True, I was locked out for an hour, but so far as I am concerned I was only absent for five minutes " ?—Yes, it would certainly be an element, and it must be taken into account.

480. That experience is pretty common, is it not, where that kind of fining is carried on ?—It is quite common ; and not only to lock out for an hour, but to lock out for a quarter-day or more.

481. It is much longer than five minutes now ?—Yes. May I just add this. The difficulty comes in of the cost to the employer. It may be that in a specific case the loss to the employer may be much more than the five minutes' absence would suggest. He may contend that it upsets the arrangement of his business altogether. That would be another question that we should have to inquire into if we were judging of the reasonableness of the fine in that particular instance. It is very difficult.

482. Then with reference to what one may call voluntary deductions made from the earnings of employees in certain places of business in respect of charitable concerns, such as hospitals. Would you suggest that those deductions might be made only when each person suffering the deductions signs a written application to his employer to make the deduction. That is what I gathered from your evidence in chief ?—That represents my view, undoubtedly.

483. And you would not consider as valid a general resolution passed at a particular meeting attended by any number, great or small, of the workpeople that were ultimately to be affected by it ?—It occurs to me that there might be instances in which that would not be quite equitable ; some individual affected might have made other arrangements for similar facilities, and it would entail calling upon him to pay twice over.

484. Then with reference to the application of the truck law to outworkers. In your opinion should the factory inspector be responsible for that, or would you make the sanitary inspector responsible for it ?—I am not prepared to suggest any alteration in the decision reached in the 1896 Act that it would be left to the factory inspector, who is already in touch with truck of that kind by reason of his visits to the places from which work is given out. At the same time it is a formidable addition to the duties of the factory inspector to have the investigation of truck in detail in the homes of the out-workers. There is this further consideration ; that he already has to undertake something of the same kind where he finds irregularities under the Particulars Orders, and it would be hard to dissociate the two. So that I am afraid that both he and the sanitary inspector must visit the home workers occasionally, and it would not be practicable—it would not be easy at all events at present—to give particulars and truck to the sanitary inspector.

485. But the recent tendency has been to put the home work places more and more under the control of the sanitary inspector ?—Surely, because it is already under the sanitary inspector and the district councils for all sanitary purposes. Even if the Factory Act did not put it upon them they would, nevertheless, have to conduct sanitary inspection of all those places, and there is little more than the sanitary inspection in view.

486. Would it not be much more economical if the local authorities inspected for truck in the homes of the workers just as you suggest that they should do in the shops ?—If Parliament is satisfied and the sanitary authorities and sanitary inspectors are equal to the task, it would certainly be more economical for them to undertake that, and possibly the particulars also.

By Mr. Brotherton.

487. I should like to be sure that I clearly understand your evidence with regard to deductions. There was a suggestion that the deductions for spoilt work should not be above 5 per cent. ?—May I interpose for a moment. The suggestion of 5 per cent. had not relation to deductions for spoilt work in particular ; it was rather in respect of fines.

488. Then we will take it with regard to fines. Suppose there are offences on several days, all in one week each coming to 5 per cent. ; suppose the total for a week is 15 per cent. ; would the 15 per cent. be deductible under your suggestion from that week's wages, or would it be only 5 per cent. as a maximum and the amount to be carried forward for two weeks or three weeks, as the case might be ?—The idea I had in mind was that there should be a maximum in respect of the week's wages and that the maximum should represent the total of fines inflicted in that week, whether the payment were carried over several weeks or otherwise.

489. But in the case of the offence being repeated perhaps several times in one week the maximum that you would deduct from one week would not exceed 5 per cent. of the wages ?—Yes. I suggest that " unreasonableness " may arise from repetition as well as from the character of the individual fine. When it becomes very frequent, either it is unreasonable in itself or else there is a sufficient remedy outside the Truck Act.

By Mr. Cawley.

490. With reference to this display of fines. Mr. Ramsay Macdonald seemed to be of the opinion that the display of fines would encourage employers to impose fines ?—It was the impression, I believe, at the time of the passing of the 1896 Act that Parliament was authorising fines and that the fines which were inserted in the truck notices which came into use then were the consequence of the Act ; whereas what the Act insisted upon was that fines should not be inflicted without this contract.

491. But your idea is whatever is the law, it should be as much known as possible to the operatives ?—Yes.

492. Fines should be displayed and any other information given ?—Yes.

493. Whatever effect it has ?—Yes. That it should be known beforehand exactly what they are going to receive, and that the particulars of any deduction should be made plain to them.

494. Even at the risk of it encouraging a practice which it is not particularly desirable should be encouraged, as long as it is the law ?—Quite so ; but it has been the law since 1896.

495. Still, you think that all these particulars should be displayed ?—Certainly. May I point out that there are two separate things involved. The contract notice has already to be affixed. My suggestion is that the terms of the Act, the limitations which the contract notice must not exceed, should also be affixed in some shape or form, and I think in more detail than it is given in the truck notices which are now attached to the abstract.

496. Then with regard to locking out for lateness. Have you any suggestion to make in a case where the fact that an operative is late not only damages the master, but may damage others of his fellow workmen very much by preventing them going on; take the case where one man is absent say from a set of five, as is frequently the case in some businesses. Have you any suggestion to make as to how that difficulty could be overcome otherwise than by a fine?—I think the only alternative to a fine is suspension or dismissal or the reduction in wages. As I said last week, I do not want to press the point in any way that would involve hardship to the workman, but if a fine is not to be inflicted it seems to me that the only alterntive would be dismissal or suspension or reduction of wages.

497. Then as to written authority for deductions for charitable objects. Mr. Ramsay Macdonald suggested that no deduction should be made for a charitable object unless with the written authority of the employee. I presume what you mean is a requisition signed by all the workmen—not individually written?—Yes, as long as the workman has expressed in writing his desire that the deduction should be made, I cannot see any object in declaring it to be illegal.

498. I was putting the distinction between an individual written authority and a general requisition. Your opinion is that a requisition signed by the body of employees as a whole should do?—Yes.

499. I have not quite followed your evidence about the outworkers in, say, West End tailors' shops. Suppose a tailor gives out clothes to be made and gives out the cotton or silk, or whatever the material may be. They are under inspection, I presume, in some way?—If it is a workshop, as it would probably be in the case you refer to, it would be under our inspection.

500. Suppose the tailor has not any makers of clothes at all inside his premises, and gives all the cloth out to be made at the homes of the makers, giving them the necessary cotton or silk and so on, and getting back the stuff in made garments. Are the workers in that case under any inspection?—We thought so until the decision in the case of the Midland Lace Company, but the ruling there was that unless there was a contract of individual employment the Truck Act did not apply.

501. Does not that seem to you an important point?—Most important.

502. Have you anything to suggest as a means of getting over it?—I do not think it would be difficult for Parliament to get over it. The point is that the wording of the existing Act does not include outworkers; I suggest that it should.

503. Then it would include them whether the manufacture was going on inside the premises or not?—Yes.

By Mr. Maddison.

504. On the question of the reasonableness of fines. You, obviously, were not able to give a definition of what is a reasonable fine?—No; I am afraid I was unable to go further than to suggest that one or two of the criteria which go to reasonableness should be made statutory.

505. Have you in the course of your experience come across a large number of fines that are obviously unreasonable?—Yes.

506. I understood that you agreed with Mr. Redgrave that 5 per cent, of the maximum amount that should be taken from any one week's wages should apply to fines?—Yes, that appeared to me a good working basis.

507. One point that you made rather emphatically I think was that the proceeds from no fines should go to the benefit of the employer?—I think that would be a wise provision.

508. But I gather that you do not think that that would altogether get rid of unreasonable fines?—On the contrary, we have many instances of unreasonable fines which have gone solely to funds for the benefit of the workmen.

509. I know you can only answer this in an indirect way. We have had cases where fines are non-existent; but you would not say, would you, that fines are really necessary to the discipline of a workshop?—They are certainly unnecessary in many factories and many workshops where they have been dispensed with for years, and I am happy to think that the number of such works is increasing; but that they are unnecessary in all factories and workshops I am hardly in a position to say.

510. You mentioned the bonus system. I gathered from your answers that you considered that where, as the Chairman put it, a man gets 17s. 6d. wages, but may get £1 by being punctual and doing his work well and all the rest of it, the workers are left somewhat unprotected so far as the Truck Act is concerned; it gives a margin for evasion?—It gives a possible wage which may be withheld without the safeguards of the Truck Act.

511. I do not know how far you would carry that. For instance, you know that in certain trades they have what they technically term a bonus system, although I think this does not come under the category you had in your mind; where, for instance, a job is said to be worth six hours work; if a man does it in five hours he gets six hours pay, if he does it in seven hours he gets only six hours pay?—That comes to something very similar to piece work; it is reducing time work to piece work. if I follow you rightly. No objection to piece work is intended in anything I have said.

512. The case I have just mentioned would hardly come under your inspection?—I think not. It is only one method of payment instead of another, each being equally under the Truck Act.

513. One question about living in. You gave no general opinion about the living in system, but I forget whether you said that you thought that it did really come under the spirit of the Truck Act?—It seems to me that at all events it borders on infraction of the Truck Acts.

514. Then about deductions. You have made it plain that you think no deductions should be made for certain statutory obligations of the employer; but there is a kind of deduction which is made in this way. In the old days, in the weaving trade, the weaver cleaned his loom in his own time and at his own expense; but, for alleged purposes of efficiency or order or what not, that work is now done for him by the employer, and deductions are made?—That is a new and most beneficial custom that has sprung up.

515. You do not regard that as a deduction coming under the Truck Act?—Oh yes, I think it is a deduction that would come under the Truck Act—something "done or provided by the employer."

516. You do not think that that is a system which should be interfered with?—In that case it works out quite beneficially. Whether it could be better met by re-adjustment of wages, I am not in a position to say, but at all events it is for the advantage of all concerned.

517. Would not you say that it would be better that the payment should be made in full direct to the weaver and that he should return to the employer whatever is the proper cost of cleaning the loom?—That is the simpler system.

518. And less liable to abuse?—I am not sure that the liability to abuse is not very much the same whether the wages are paid in full and a portion paid back again over the counter, or whether it is deducted straight away.

519. What in your opinion is the reason that the weavers wished to stand outside the Act of 1896?—Mr. Ramsay Macdonald mentioned one reason that was certainly advanced.

520. The exhibition of the fines that might be imposed?—Yes. Another reason, I imagine, was the consciousness of their own strength. They knew that they were well organised, and could probably resist any abuse that might be attempted. A third reason was, I believe, the misapprehension that was prevalent at the time, that the Act was one legalising fines, and not, as intended, merely imposing restrictions on fines.

521. I presume they are not out of the previous Truck Act?—Oh no.

522. They are only outside the 1896 Act?—That is all.

By Mr. Delevingne.

523. On Section 3 of the Act of 1896, I think you have expressed the opinion that deductions for the fixed or standing expenses of the employer ought not to be made from the workers' wages—deductions for standing room, light, and so forth?—Quite so.

524. I do not think you expressed any opinion about the other part of the section, the supply of materials, as to whether a system of deductions for the supply of materials by the employer to the workman has any value or advantages either to the workman or to the employer?—I would rather that the inspectors, who have had experience of individual instances, should speak to that. I can imagine that there may be advantages in it in certain cases.

525. I should like to put it in this way. If the employer is not allowed to make deductions, either he must supply the materials to the worker without payment, at his own cost, in which case presumably he would have no check over waste, or he must leave it to the worker to supply his own materials, in which case he has little or no check over the quality of the materials which the worker uses?—Those questions have arisen, and lead me to the conclusion that there may be difficulty if such charges are altogether prohibited.

526. One question on the point about locking out. In cases where a worker is five minutes late and is locked out for an hour, have you in fact treated the non-payment of the hour's wages as a fine under the Truck Act, or is it merely a non-payment of wage with which the Truck Act has nothing to do?—We have in practice regarded this as a fine, and required statement of it in the truck notice.

527–9. If it is merely the non-payment of wage not earned for the time lost and does not include anything additional in the way of penalty or fine?—I should still regard it as a fine, since the workman only absented himself for one-sixth of the half-hour lost; but it borders of course upon suspension, which is outside the Truck Acts. If, however, the deductions were only at the rate of wages for the five minutes, it might, no doubt, be looked upon as simply non-payment of wages for services not rendered (which again is outside the province of the Inspector) and not as a fine at all; but in such a case the deduction (even if regarded as a fine) would be small, and the question of reasonableness would hardly arise. I do not remember any instance of the kind being referred to me.

530. Now on the question of fixing a proportion or maximum limit for deductions for damaged work or for injury to materials. Do not you see some difficulty in having a fixed limit for all kinds of injury to the property of the employer irrespective of the amount of damage that may be done?—Do you mean under the head of damaged material or under the head of fines?

531. I mean under Section 2, which applies either to damaged work or injury to the property and materials of the employer. There may be wide variations between the amount of damage done in different cases?—If the committee see their way to recommend a maximum limit, there is the general remedy that a worker who is grossly careless, or does wilful damage, is hardly a desirable employee.

532. You would be of opinion, I suppose, that the instalment system is really bad for the workers themselves?—Yes.

533. It keeps them in a perpetual state of debt and bondage to the employer?—Yes, and that accumulates.

By Mr. Yarrow.

534. In the industry that I am connected with we have no fines. If a worker is late or does bad work he gets sent away. For my part I am pretty certain that if we had a scheme of fines, the workers would not be so careful and would not be so regular. Would you agree with me in that—that if there is some easy way of their getting over the consequences of bad or careless work by the payment of a fine instead of getting discharged, the tendency would be to make them more careless?—The severer remedy of dismissal, which I understand to be the alternative to a fine, would, no doubt, have the more deterrent effect, but I can imagine it also to be rather hard on the workman who was guilty of only a slight offence.

535. Does it not naturally follow that it would have a greater deterrent effect on the workers in those places where there are fines to make fines illegal, in which case they would know that if they behaved carelessly or improperly the simple remedy of the employer would be to send them away?—The more serious the punishment the more deterrent would be the effect, no doubt.

536. Would not that be on the whole a very good thing?—I am afraid I have not sufficient knowledge of all the trades of the country to give a definite answer to that.

537. It would get rid of complications as to adjustment of fines, and would remove a great deal of ill-feeling?—Perhaps that is so.

538. At any rate, you would agree that on the whole the knowledge that he would be sent away for a continuation of bad conduct would have a more deterrent effect upon a man than simply making his bad conduct subject to the payment of a fine?—I imagine it would be more deterrent, but I understand that there are cases in which employers and operatives and inspectors are agreed that fines are on the whole, perhaps, the better method.

539. Still, in some industries you would admit that it would not be so?—In some industries within my knowledge there are no fines at all, and I have no doubt that discipline is well maintained under those circumstances.

540. Then I was going to raise the same question that two other members of the Committee have raised. I understand that you do not approve of a worker being paid extra for extra good work on the ground that that might be practically a form of inflicting a fine. If I understood you aright, you expressed disapproval of a system by which if a man did a certain quantity of work he should get 17s. 6d., but that if he did that work exceptionally well he should get a sovereign?—I do not like that system, because it places part of the real wage on a footing which removes the protection of the Truck Acts. Withholding of it is substantially a fine. If there is any doubt whether it is part of the wage in the sense of the Truck Acts, then there is no such protection as is afforded by the inquiry whether the amount is reasonable or not exceeding the cost to the employer.

541. I take it the real wage means, not the time a man is at work, but what he does. One has to be very careful that if this theory were carried out it does not really mean the doing away with the inducement for good work?—As long as it is part of the contracted reward of labour and the workman has the protection of the Truck Acts as regards the whole of that reward, then my point is met. In the case of the bonus on time wage system there is a doubt whether the whole of it is the contracted reward.

542. If a man got sixpence, and half a crown more for extra diligence, that would be bonus?—Yes, but if that half a crown more were not paid I think the worker ought to have the right to require that the deduction shall not be unreasonably made and that it does not exceed the cost to the employer.

543. I am very much afraid of anything that would have a tendency to discourage the doing of good work; that is why I had been rather pressing you about this?—As long as it is made clear in one way or another that is part of the reward of labour, so that the Truck Acts will apply, my point is met.

544. It would seem rather risky to do away with anything that is an inducement to men to do as much work as they can, or (what is the same thing) making them forfeit something for doing as little as they can?—There is the remedy in the adjustment of wages. At the present time, the Truck Acts being what they are, this particular method of meeting it does not seem to be a good one, and is certainly not in the interests of the worker.

545. Do you not think it is quite within the scope of this Committee to consider whether fines might not be made illegal on the ground that possibly they do more harm than good, and that the law would be very much simplified if they were done away with altogether?—Of course it would simplify the law very much to abolish fines altogether.

546. Do you not think that that is worth considering?—It is a point which I understand the Committee will consider. My knowledge does not extend over the whole field of industry, and I am not prepared to say that there may not be instances in which fines are on the whole the better method.

547. Referring to these lists of factories and workshops, I confess that I am quite unacquainted with what the difference is between a factory and a workshop ?—Very broadly, a factory is a place in which power is employed and there are certain other places that are specified as factories whether power is employed or not. Workshops are places in which persons are employed in a manufacture, but which are not factories.

548. About fines not exceeding a certain percentage. Would not that have the effect that a workman might be discharged when his offence was more than the fine corresponded to; I mean, if the fine did not compensate the employer for the damage done by what the workman did, the workman might be discharged ?—I do not think it would be possible to limit the right of the employer to discharge a workman.

549. Then if fines were limited you would have more men discharged ?—Possibly.

550. I only put that because it appears to me that limiting the fines would have the very effect that some people seek to avoid by this Truck Act. If fines are limited, the only punishment open to the employer would be the severe punishment of dismissal of the workman. That is the upshot of it ?—I follow what you mean.

By the Chairman.

551. I am sorry to ask you another question still about this local authority. In the case of the inspectors of a local authority, whose servants are those inspectors ?—Do you refer to shops ?

552. Shops ?—The inspectors under the Shop Hours Act are appointed and controlled by the municipal and county authorities, I believe.

553. The sanitary inspectors are also the servants of the local authorities ?—Yes.

554. Now I put to you the case of a comparatively small municipality, in which these officials are servants. Do you think there is the same guarantee for efficiency or for the getting over of local influences in favour of sustaining a system that has prevailed for a while ?—The smaller the community the greater the risk of undue influence; but that extends, of course, to other considerations besides truck; it would extend to inspection for any purpose whatever.

555. In the case of your inspectors, they are under, practically speaking, roughly, the Home Office ?—Yes.

556. In the case of the local authority inspectors, is there any board which supervises them in the same sense, for instance, that the Home Office supervises the inspectors that are under your staff, or that the Local Government Board supervises boards of guardians or parish councils ?—There is nothing in the way of direct supervision comparable to the supervision of the Home Office over my staff.

557. The reason I put that was twofold; in the first place, there is no supervision so as to avoid, if possible, any defective system in particular localities, and in the second place there is no appellate authority to be appealed to to regularise the system. Does any idea occur to you of putting even these local authority inspectors under the charge of some central body like the Home Office, or under supervision to a certain extent ?—That would be a much simpler way of dealing with it. But there are intermediate authorities, of course, in the county councils; they might possibly serve the purpose.

558. I fancy you realise the difficulty of the two points I have mentioned ?—Perfectly.

559. Then there is a third point, namely, that, if you allow local inspectors under local authorities totally unrelated to each other or to a central authority, you may have a variety of practice arising on the part of different inspectors ?—That is quite true; but co-ordination might be secured to a certain extent by county grouping.

FIFTH DAY.

Wednesday, 23rd May, 1906.

PRESENT.

The Right Hon. THOMAS SHAW, K.C., M.P., Lord Advocate for Scotland (Chairman).

E. A. BROTHERTON, Esq., M.P.
FREDERICK CAWLEY, Esq., M.P.
MALCOLM DELEVINGNE, Esq.
J. RAMSAY MACDONALD, Esq., M.P.
FREDERICK MADDISON, Esq., M.P.
Mrs. H. J. TENNANT.
A. F. YARROW, Esq.

T. E. BETTANY, Esq. (Secretary).

Mr. J. A. REDGRAVE, H. M. Superintending Inspector of Factories, Birmingham, was called; and examined.

By the Chairman.

560. Please tell us your position in what I might call the hierarchy of the inspecting establishment ?—I am the superintending inspector for the Midland Counties and Wales. The Midland Counties under my supervision (through the local inspectors) are Lincoln, Notts, Rutland, Leicester, Derby, Warwick, Staffordshire, Shropshire, Worcestershire, Herefordshire, Monmouthshire, and the whole of Wales. My duty is practically to superintend the work of the district inspectors and their juniors and assistants in these areas.

561. Does your area include the whole of Wales ?—Yes

562. Is there any official above you in the Home Office to whom you report ?—Yes, there is the deputy chief inspector and the chief inspector.

563. Who are these ?—Dr. Whitelegge who has given evidence before this Committee is the chief inspector, and the deputy chief inspector, who has not been called, is Mr. Cramp.

23 May 1906.

564. Do you come next ?—There are five officers of my rank; the United Kingdom being divided for our purpose into five divisions.

565. Your district includes all the counties you have named, plus Wales ?—Yes.

566. As we do not propose to call all the officers, perhaps you would tell us what are the other districts ?—I have not got full details of them here. Mr. Knyvett at Glasgow takes the whole of Scotland and Ireland. Mr. Maitland at Leeds takes the North-East Counties and Yorkshire, Mr. Richmond at Manchester takes

Lancashire, Cumberland, Westmoreland and Cheshire; then I come at Birmingham. The district further south is administered by Mr. Beaumont from London. There are five superintending inspectors.

567. Confining your evidence to your own area, can you tell us the number of works affected?—The number is 21,648 factories, 28,025 workshops, 271 steam laundries, 265 hand laundries and 6,164 workshops in which only male adults are employed; that makes a total of 56,373 places affected by the Truck Acts according to the incidence of deductions or anything of that kind.

568. Before you pass from that could you give us any idea of the number of places that would be affected supposing that shops were brought inside the scope of the Factory Act, but perhaps you could only give a rough conjecture of that?—It would be a very rough conjecture, but I should say it might amount to about 30,000 shops.

569. Can you now tell us something about the number of persons subject to your inspection in the total of 56,373 places already mentioned?—In factories alone there is a total of 789,917 persons, and in the laundries 6,831 persons; the details as to the employment of persons in workshops are at present incomplete and unreliable.

570. Why is that?—Because the people concerned are so difficult about rendering their returns.

571. Have you any means of remedying that?—They are supposed to render them by a certain period of the year or whenever the Secretary of State issues an order that the return is to be made, but there are so many behindhand that we have not published any at the present moment. I should, however, put them down roughly at a total of about 100,000 employed in workshops.

572. That would be your estimate?—Yes, a very low one.

573. Do you mean that it might be anything up to another 100,000?—It might be, but I should be safer in saying 100,000 than in saying 200,000.

574. If we assume that your guess as to 30,000 shops was a fair estimate, may we not assume that the number of persons employed in them is relatively much smaller than in the factories?—Yes, but not smaller than in the workshops.

575. I was wondering whether the proportion would be about three per place or more?—I think three per place would be a fair average to take.

576. So that it might run up to between 90,000 and 100,000 additional?—Yes, probably to another 100,000.

577. Your statistics are definite with regard to factories and laundries?—Yes.

578. They are in some measure conjectural in regard to workshops?—Yes.

579. And they are wholly conjectural in regard to shops?—Yes.

580. Now I should be glad to have from you a statement as to the results generally of your administration, and in regard to that please tell us first the length of your experience?—I have been an inspector for thirty-four years. My experience ranges over that period, but I learn something every day both respecting the Truck Acts and the Factory Act.

581. Obviously your experience goes back long before the Act of 1896?—Yes.

582. And before the other Act?—Yes. For a considerable time, indeed for fifteen years, after my appointment we had no jurisdiction with regard to the Truck Acts.

583. Then came the Act of 1887?—Yes.

584. So that your experience really covers the three periods?—Yes.

585. You will be able to tell me this, which I am rather anxious to know; as compared with the early period prior to the Act of 1887, what in your opinion was the result of the interposition of the legislation at that time?—It was certainly called for, and the results have been very successful in a large number of instances.

586. In what directions mainly?—In the prevention of excessive deductions and fines of various kinds.

587. Then came the Act 1896; what have you to say with regard to that second interposition?—That has still further narrowed the sphere of imaginative amounts, it has enabled us to keep in touch with any attempt to increase unnecessarily either fines or deductions for damaged work or for materials. I should like to emphasise the value of our administration of the powers entrusted to us.

588. What do you mean by imaginative amounts?—Amounts not fair and reasonable in the circumstances of each case, or amounts unfair and unreasonable under any circumstances.

589. Do you think there still remains a category of unfair and unreasonable charges not yet got at?—There may be such in many places, they are not always got at.

590. As you have stated the matter affirmatively, may I now put it negatively and ask you whether there has been any disadvantage through the interposition of the legislature to rectify the situation that you have described?—I assume you mean disadvantage to anybody, employers or employed.

591. Yes, concurrently with the advantages you have named?—No, to my mind there has been no disadvantage.

592. Have you found in your experience that the interposition of the legislature in that way has been regarded in any instance as cramping the freedom of contract—I mean in any improper or fettering sense?—No, I don't think so, and I do not think my colleagues have reported meeting with any objection of that kind.

593. Has it ever come under your notice that legislative interventions of the nature of those described have hindered the operation of trade or imposed fetters upon it which were considered unnecessary?—No, I cannot think of any.

594. And now I think you can tell us something about difficulties that have been settled by remonstrance?—The administration of the Truck Act by us is set forth more or less in the Home Office memorandum; it states that we are to keep ourselves generally acquainted with what is going on, not to interfere unnecessarily in every technical point, but to interfere where it is possible to do so with advantage in cases of hardship and injustice.

595. Have you interposed in that way?—Yes, we have interposed on several occasions with reference to what we consider or what were made out to us to be unjust stoppages or deductions. Of course the matters were the subject of a great deal of argument at first with the employers interested, but in most cases, indeed I think in almost all, where we have remonstrated and pointed out what should be done, we have arrived at a result satisfactory to the workpeople concerned or to the individual aggrieved.

596. Can you give us any concrete instances of that, for they might be very helpful to us?—There are concrete instances in our prosecutions, but I suppose they would not come under the same category.

597. I was rather referring to cases in which you have made a representation to the employers and thoroughly thrashed the matter out with them with a beneficial result?—There was a case connected with the lace trade at Nottingham which was brought before me, or rather the district inspector had it brought before him, and he subsequently referred it to me. If a district inspector sees his way clear he need not do more than report to me, but he refers to me in cases of difficulty. He brought before me an instance of a man who had been stopped so much a week to the total amount of 31s. 6d. for spoilt work in a piece of lace. It struck me that this was putting it rather high to charge a workman at that rate for a piece of lace. We made some enquiries and found that in the shop in question, and, indeed, generally in the lace shops in Nottingham these deductions were made with the concurrence of a shop committee. If a man is being stopped for a bad piece of work the master says "I shall stop you so many breadths or lengths" as the case may be, then the shop committee, which consists of two or three of the men have the piece brought before them and they adjudicate upon it, and they say yes or no as the case may be, as to the amount of damage that they think may fairly be stopped.

598. Who are on that committee ?—A certain number of the workmen in the shop act together in that way, but I do not know whether there is always a committee absolutely appointed.

599. By "shop" I assume you mean a workshop under the Factory Act ?—Yes, a lace-making shop.

600. The committee you speak of is a committee of workers ?—Yes, they are all members of the lace-makers' union. These cases were brought before us originally by Mr. Appleton of the Amalgamated Society of Operative Lace Makers, with whom we entered into communication on the whole subject. At first it appeared to me necessary to deal with the parties as making an illegal charge for damaged work, but I could get no evidence from the men at all as to the details of the matter. By dint of making a great fuss about it I had a letter one day from Mr. Appleton, who had heard from the man in question, saying that the whole of the stopped money had been paid back to him. Now, I had not threatened anything of that kind, because I believe it is almost compounding a felony to tell a man how he may best satisfy an aggrieved person; but I have told you what was done in this case, and I believe the result was largely brought about through two persons not quite agreeing as to whether the piece of lace in question was spoilt or not.

601. Were these two on the committee ?—No, they were interested in the purchase of this piece of lace; they did not appear to think it was damaged; but if we had not made a fuss about the matter I do not think the lace worker would have got his 31s. 6d. back.

602. How was the amount spread over ?—It was spread over several weeks. I think they were stopping him at the rate of two or three shillings a week, and unfortunately one has not much help sometimes from the men. I asked the aggrieved person to come to see me on a Saturday afternoon at the factory offices in Nottingham and to bring evidence of these stoppages; but he came to see me without any evidence at all to satisfy me as to when these deductions took place, and he could not exactly remember. I mention this in order to show our difficulties, and that we are sometimes rather handicapped with regard to the actual proof of deductions.

603. The deductions had been going on for fifteen or sixteen weeks ?—Yes, for a number of weeks; they were going on until suddenly stopped by the repayment of the amount.

604. At the rate you mention the instalments may have been going on for nearly four months ?—I have here some of the tickets, the pay tickets, which, although they contain no date, show deductions amounting respectively to 2s. 6d., 2s. 6d., 2s., 3s.1½d., 3s. 1d., 5s. 6d. and so on. As the man got the whole of the money back I only mention this as a case where our intervention proved to be of some service.

605. That represents one type of case. Can you conveniently cite to us another case where remonstrance has been effective ?—In the potteries, where the question of truck has been a burning one with me for some time, I have found that when certain people became aware that we were following up a point in which we thought them to be wrong they have paid up the amount in dispute without our having insisted upon such a course or, indeed, suggested it.

606. Has that occurred more than once in your experience ?—Yes; I think one or two of the lady inspectors could corroborate what I say with regard to the potteries.

607. These are cases in which you think there has been a breach of the law as it stands ?—Yes.

608. And in which, rather than have the question tried, there has been a settlement between employers and employed ?—Personally, I would as soon have the question tried as not.

609. I was referring to the feeling on their part ?—Yes. I may say with reference to these cases of repayment that practical justice is done to an aggrieved person at the very smallest amount of expense all round. We save the man being put in an awkward position by bringing him up as a chief witness against his employer; and if the employer were fined the workman would probably get nothing at all, whereas, in the cases I have mentioned, he gets back his money.

610. Of course, in all these cases, it was no part of the province of your department to go beyond the law; all you could do was to advise both parties that either a breach of the law had in all probability been committed or that they were sailing very near the wind ?—Yes, that is the position.

611. Some of the Committee wish to know how these cases came to your knowledge ?—One very simple way would be, presuming a man had got a conspicuous placard and the Act of 1896 on his lintel, if the inspector has nothing special to look after at the moment in the way of machinery or sanitation, some item may strike his attention, say such an item as "sitting on a wheelbarrow, 1s.," as was the case in a certain ironworks. The inspector might go and ask why sitting on a wheelbarrow should be such a costly operation to the worker. Such a case might come under the inspector's notice, and he would refer it to the employer or proprietor, who would make his explanation and probably say that it formed a mode of keeping good order and decorum in his factory; or he might give some other reason: he might probably add "I will think about removing it," and the inspector might say "I think you ought to remove it," or something of that kind. I do not think a charge of the kind I have quoted is very reasonable, but it represents an actual case.

612. That is brought under your notice by the act of the occupier himself ?—Yes, many cases come to us in the form of complaints—not so many as the committee might imagine, but still many. A worker may write and ask a simple question as to deductions he has suffered, or the secretary of the union may call our attention to cases.

613. Have you found the action of the unions to be helpful to the department ?—Very much so, especially in such cases as I have mentioned. I have in view the trouble taken by Mr. Appleton in going into that lace case; it is true I have not always got so much help as I should like, but perhaps one expects too much. There are certain unions the operations of which absolutely relieve us from a great deal of technical responsibility on the question of charges and deductions; such a case is that of the brass founders at Birmingham. The deductions in that trade are practically the subject of agreement between the masters and the men, represented by Mr. Timmins on the one hand, and by Mr. W. J. Davis (who was formerly inspector of factories) on the other hand. Through the working of that arrangement and the attention of the union to the subject we have had practically no complaints of deductions in the brass trade.

614. What do you say to this view that I present to you, namely, that so far as the action of your department is concerned as an inspecting body to see to the efficient administration of the Act, the organisation of labour is a helpful circumstance ?—Most decidedly.

615. Of course, when complaints reach you from any source, you must go into them ?—Any complaint that reaches us, whether it is anonymous or signed, is dealt with not only by the local inspector or his assistant, but it comes to me. The assistant has to send the complaint to the local inspector, who may take action upon it if he thinks fit to do so, or he may relegate the matter to me if he chooses to leave the responsibility upon my shoulders. I have to see that the matter is properly investigated; and, if necessary, the complaint may be returned for further particulars.

616. With regard to the industries in the district covered by your supervision, these seem to be of all kinds ?—Yes, I have got a rough list of them here.

617. Would you please name half a dozen of the principal as examples ?—The principal industries in my division include brass work at Birmingham, iron and steel work in the Midlands and Glamorganshire, a large railway coach and carriage building industry in the Midlands, blast furnaces both in the Midlands and in Wales, carpets at Kidderminster, gloves at Worcester, etc.

618. May I assume that there is very little female labour employed in the first four of these, namely, the brass works, iron and steel works, coach and carriage works, and blast furnaces ?—There is a great deal of female labour employed in the metal trades in the midland counties. It is extraordinary, in fact, to notice the number of women and girls employed in connection with metal work.

619. What kind of things do they make?—They are employed in nearly all the metal factories in the midland counties.

620. Do they attend to machines?—Yes.

621. As part of the general staff?—Yes, I have hardly ever found girls employed at machine shops in the South.

622. I understand you have some observations to make on the Hosiery Wages Act?—The Hosiery Act is practically a survival of a bygone day. The old hand frames have gone out, and the Act is now almost useless owing to the different conditions of labour which exist. The Act was intended to prevent undue rents being charged for the use of hand frames, but now the hand frame is becoming a thing of the past; indeed, it is hardly ever seen, and the ordinary conditions of labour supervene. I have found no breach of the Hosiery Wages Act. I made an inquiry concerning it a little while ago, and I think Mr. Holmes at Leicester—which is the name, I believe, of the gentleman who is secretary to the union there—would back me up in saying that there are no breaches of the Hosiery Act as it is.

623. You mean the Act of 1874?—Yes. The Hosiery Act is not one of those which we have to administer; but it is very like the Truck Acts, so we look into it when we get the opportunity.

624. In what sense do you look into it?—In this way; a little while ago the inspector from Leicester consulted me as to a complaint he had received about the workers in a certain village being paid 5 per cent. reduction upon the wages paid in Leicester, and being charged for needles. We went over there and spent some time in an inquiry. The 5 per cent. reduction did not turn out to be a Hosiery Wages case at all; if it was anything at all, it was probably a case under the Truck Acts.

625. In respect of what was this reduction made?—There is a scale of wages in Leicester for certain work, and when a man does the work in a village outside, the cost of labour is presumably not so heavy, so he is paid the Leicester rate of wages less five per cent. It is not a deduction at all; it is the union rate of wages arranged by the workmen and their representatives for that district outside the working area of Leicester.

626. That is to say, an outsider gets 19s. for the same work as costs £1 in Leicester?—Yes, the Leicester man inside the borough, or within the prescribed area, gets the £1. We found that was not a breach of the Hosiery Act, or of any Act at all, but simply an arrangement, and I instructed Mr. Sedgwick that we did not propose to interfere on the subject of the 5 per cent. reduction at Earlshilton, near Hinckley, but it seemed to be necessary that we should take some note of the manner in which the needles were charged for or supplied. Mr. Sedgwick was to see that the law was carried out with regard to these deductions for needles. That was under the Truck Acts and not the Hosiery Wages Act, that being an easier way of dealing with the question.

627. That is to say, under the Hosiery Act these charges for needles would not fall under any of the things denominated in that Act?—I did not think it worth pursuing whether they fell under the word "charges" in the Hosiery Wages Act. The conditions of labour had completely changed, and we get the same result by requiring any deductions for materials to be in accordance with the Truck Acts

628. When did this occur?—Last December.

629. According to information the Committee has received, this system is going on yet of charging a sum more than double the actual cost of the needles. Is that in accordance with your experience?—This is something like the case you are putting to me. I have recently heard that the reduction in the price of needles of which the employers have been availing themselves has not been given to the workers, and that consequently inquiries were to be made about it.

630. Ex facie, that would seem to be an illegal system, would it not?—I should so deal with it if it came before me. I have here a note of a case, not at Leicester, but in Derbyshire, in hosiery. This is a new thing that has just come before me, but it is on those lines. Women and girls, knitting machinists, are charged 1d. each for needles; the wholesale price being (?) 35s. per thousand, or not quite ½d. each; so that they ought not to charge 1d. each, if we can verify that information.

631 I put before you a case at Leicester, in which the wholesale price is 3s. 6d. per hundred, and they charge 8s. 4d, that is to say, 1d. each. Suppose that case occurred, that would, in your view, be a case for action by your Department?—Certainly. It probably will come before me very shortly. There is one point you ought to understand; the court before which the case is brought is the actual arbiter as to what is reasonable or unreasonable. We may have our opinions, but we can only fortify them by the court being on our side with respect to that. I may say that it will probably be sufficient for the inspector to state the matter to the proprietor of the works for it to be stopped.

632. I should assume so. I mean, there is no money in it, really?—It is hardly worth while fighting about.

633. I quite assume that. Now will you go to your experience in the pottery trade. Charges are made in that trade for the supply of power, for the supply of light, and for the provision of special requirements under the statute. Before you enter upon it, I should be glad if you could possibly illustrate it by actual instances?—To plunge into the middle of it, you would like to know what stoppages and what earnings a man in the potteries has.

634. No. What I want to know is, could you give us, so as to get it on the notes, a list of the things in respect of which definite charges are made by way of deduction for the wages received. I am rather anxious to get on the notes the specific things that we are dealing with?—There is the pugging of the clay—mixing the clay—which is done by machinery, to save the actual operative the bother and trouble and time of doing it him self.

635. The pugging mill is supplied by the employer?—Yes

636. It is constructed for this work specially?—Yes.

637. And both parties know when they enter into the contract that the work they are doing will be work with the assistance of the pugging mill?—Quite so.

638. Then the employer charges a certain sum for it?—Yes.

639. Will you give the rate of deduction in respect of the use of power?—It is generally about 6d. or 1s. in the pound for pugging.

640. From 2½ to 5 per cent.?—Yes. The pugging, as I have explained, is to relieve a man of the personal labour of preparing his own clay.

641. Before you pass from that, I would like to see how these charges have arisen; it is most interesting. In point of fact, in the present state of development of that business, is there any manual labour exerted?—Oh yes, a good deal.

642. So that the operative can get employment where he has to do his work instead of the mill doing it?—Yes; there are some places where there is no power.

643. I assume, where you have power is in advanced and developed factories?—Yes. Some of the smaller places have no power; the men prepare the clay and make the china; there are all kinds of places.

644. Take a man who has gone from a place where there is no power to a factory where there is power; does he get the same rate of wage as before, less a charge for the saving of manual labour?—Before he moved he would probably have had to pay two assistants, a woman and a boy, for something or other; when he goes to the place where there is power he does not pay for those people; they supply him with power, and he has a deduction from his wages which amounts to about the same thing as he earned before when he was a hand worker.

645. Can you figure any injustice that would occur if the net wage was struck in the latter case?—My impression is that the fixing of a net wage is simply a matter of calculation, and that none would be any the worse for it.

646. It comes to that, of course, in the end?—Just so.

647. If the net wage were struck, then there would be no room for checking the calculations by which it is made up?—No, when the old system of deductions is once wiped out.

648. What I mean is this. So long as they go upon a system of having a gross wage and a system of deductions from it in respect of power, the duty of the Department is to consider whether those deductions are reasonable and so on?—That is the position.

649. Whereas, if you had a net contract, the parties would have settled everything beforehand for themselves?—We have nothing to do with it; in the case of net wage nothing comes in for us to interfere about.

650. Now with regard to deduction for the supply of light; will you tell me how that originated?—The potters used to bring their own tallow candles; and, so conservative is the whole place, that they consent to pay for the use of gas even now-a-days; they have not struck the balance between the provision of gas and the cost of the old candle work.

651. How does that bear upon the account of wages?—There are various rates; 4d. and 3d. a burner, or 4d. and 3d. a week; it is the same charge. That is not pro rata with the wages; that is a definite charge.

652. Then you note here, "Special requirements under statutory obligations." I should like instances of that?—They charge for the accommodation of a mess room, which under the special rules under the Act (which I need not go into here) they say are required for the comfort of the persons engaged in injurious processes, such as the use of lead. Some potters charge for the use of this mess room, and for the use incidentally of the gas stove, and for hot water. They would not provide that, a great many of them, unless they were obliged; not, I think, because they are not well disposed towards their people, but the potteries themselves, a great many old works, are a jumble of sheds and places all put together, and there is no room for a mess room. The larger potteries have nice mess rooms, but with the older buildings it is very difficult to provide mess rooms.

653. Is there obligation on them by statute to do that?—Not by statute, but by special rule, which has the function of legislation when it is passed.

654. It is substantially a statutory obligation?—Yes, you can call it a statutory obligation, but it might be withdrawn to-morrow. These rules can be withdrawn, as well as enacted.

655. Is not the situation this: that unless they comply with the special rule, which has statutory effect, they would be flying in the face of the law of the land?—Yes, they would probably be prosecuted if they did not supply a mess room.

656. Now, what is the rate of charge for the mess room?—About 2d. and 1d.

657. Plus the gas stove and hot water?—It includes the gas stove and hot water.

658. In the pottery trade are the people paid by time or by piece?—Both; there are day workers and there are pieceworkers; but most of the people we are interested in at the present time are the pieceworkers. It is mostly by piece. It is according to what they call an oven, that is, the amount of stuff that fills an oven or a kiln and so on; or according to dozens and scores; and dozens are not dozens nor are scores scores, very often. It is perfectly understood between them that a dozen is not a dozen and that a score is not a score.

659. What we are anxious about is the comparison. Take the manual worker first of all?—His output is less.

660. Then he goes to where there is steam power; his output is more, and his piecework is subject to a deduction?—Yes.

661. Could you help me upon this; take the net wage of the piece worker with, say, steam power assistance, and compare it with the wage of the manual worker with no steam power?—It would be about the same.

662. So that this deduction works back in piece work results to pretty much where you started from?—Yes.

663. Have you any other instances of charges made for what you call statutory obligations?—Yes.

664. I am rather anxious to get a list of those?—There is cleaning water closets, which I think is a very improper charge; but it is not for me to decide that point. The proprietor of the works is required to keep his water closets clean and fit to use in every way; but in the potteries and in many other places there is a cry that unless the people are made personally responsible for the state of these closets they will not keep them clean, and they consider that they cannot keep them properly clean without making them responsible in some small amount for it.

665. Is there any other instance?—Then, among the potters in potteries the places have to be carefully swept by an adult male at certain times so as not to have the dust whether it is clay dust or lead dust, flying about at any time near the periods of employment for the workpeople Now the proprietor can make the men do that themselves; I mean it might be one of his rules that the man did it himself, being an adult male.

666. Would that be within the rule?—Yes, I do not see that there is anything to prevent him doing it. But they provide a man to do it, and the men would rather leave the sweeping. They do not want to come back and do the sweeping after they have done their day's work, and they would much rather have this fellow on sweeping at night; it is generally done at night. I mean to say that it is constantly a source of difficulty with us who are engaged in potteries so constantly, as to whether the price for the sweeper is fair and reasonable in all the circumstances of the case. I can give you a concrete case that arose not so very long ago, in fact it is, in a mild way, sub judice at the present moment. I found the sweeper one night was paid £1 1s. 6d. for sweeping, but the collections in the factory I found amounted to about £2; so that unless I have a very clear explanation forthcoming the firm, on the face of these facts, would seem to be making a sovereign a week on the provision of a sweeper under a statutory obligation. I shall probably find that there is something else in that—that it is not quite so bald as I have stated, but it looks like it very much at the present moment.

667. Is there any other provision that you can instance?—Then there is another statutory provision—the washing of overalls. Mrs. Tennant knows a good deal about that, I dare say, and I dare say she agrees with me that, although it is practically at present left undecided, it is not a thing for which the workpeople ought to be charged. Certain workers in the potteries are obliged to wear overalls by Statute, and women have to have them provided and maintained by the proprietor, and they have to be washed once a week. A great many of the proprietors there, taking advantage of the third section of the Act of 1896, containing the words, "something to be done or provided," charge for the washing, and charge, as I consider, and I dare say Mrs. Tennant will agree with me, exorbitantly. They charge 4d. for washing an overall and a cotton bonnet.

668. The normal rate would be, perhaps, half that?—I do not know; I should say 3d. They are singularly behindhand in the potteries. It is the sort of place where a laundry for the purpose of washing these things at a reasonable rate ought to do very well for everybody, but there is no such thing.

669. Is there any other instance?—Those are representative instances.

670. Now, here is a thing which I think personally (and my colleagues I think would agree), is a great blight. Could you give us a wages bill—an actual wages bill—a specimen wages bill of money actually paid to the workmen, with a note of all the deductions, bringing out the net sum each worker gets? Are there such things extant?—I could get one from the potteries, I daresay.

671. In paying the workmen is there a specification of the various items of deductions?—Yes. In some cases they have them printed with indiarubber stamps—"sweeping mess-room, cleaning closets, washing overalls," and so on; that is put on the settling book, and then 2d. or 3d. or 4d. or 6d. is put down. In other cases printed slips are used. You can see those, certainly. I will try and get one for you..

672. If you can possibly get one or two of those for us we shall be glad. The next question is this: Do you think that those fines that you get of that kind are substantially the same for all people in the same class of work; they are not in the nature, as I understand, of individual fines, but in the nature of something like fixed charges?—Well, they are fixed charges, these that I have been quoting from the potteries.

673. Do you think that any advantage accrues from stating the wages bill in that way, or any disadvantage, as compared with stating a net wage?—I should say that the statement of the net wage was to the advantage of everybody.

674. Will you give your reasons for that?—In the first place the compilation of these various deductions must take up a great deal of clerical time in the office of the proprietor and waste his time. They are, to a certain extent, extremely confusing to the workmen, and by time the workmen get oblivious of what they should pay and what they should not pay. They have a stamp put on it, but they never look at it, do not know whether they get or do not get exactly what is due in individual cases. Thereby a hulking girl or boy of sixteen, without any great intelligence—indeed I have known grown-up people—never bother to look at the weekly note to see whether their payment ticket has been correctly filled up or not, or whether their items have been correctly filled up or not. I think the abolition of deductions would be a great advantage to the workpeople, because a net price is a net price, and they know what it is. As far as the poor inspectors are concerned, of course it would be a great comfort if they were abolished.

675. As you have explained the system, it is to a considerable extent, at all events, a survival?—It is a survival of the old system when a man took his gang of boys and girls and his candle to the pot bank (as they call potteries in Staffordshire); he took a lump sum and paid his boys and girls and paid for his candle and everything. Now those things are provided for him, and he gets what the workmen themselves have accepted as the equivalent.

676. Do you find any difficulty with the pottery trade specially?—The difficulties arise here because there are so many things that seem to be unjust, and it requires very great care to separate what is right from what is wrong. The first view one has of a man being charged, for instance, 5s. a week for a certain amount of steam and machinery is that at a certain time the proprietor has repaid himself the expenditure on that sort of thing; but then, on the other hand, suppose he suddenly left off when he had done that, the man would have to have a woman or a man in again, or he would have to pay somebody else.

677. That is what prompts my question to you again. Do you see any disadvantage in a net price?—No, no disadvantage in a net price.

678. Have not you just suggested one (I only put this for the purpose of testing it), viz., that the existing arrangement, i.e., whereby power is employed, might come to an end. I suppose your reply would be that there would have to be another net price fixed for the new state of circumstances?—There would be then two net prices; one for a man with human assistance, and one for a man with power assistance.

679. Have you attempted to reach this haven of net price by any conferences with the people?—Yes; I have had two conferences; one long conference with the master potters, in 1902. I was not then so instructed as to how many loopholes there were in the Truck Act as I am now, and I took rather a strong view of it; I represented to them practically that a great many of their deductions were illegal. We had a very long and friendly conference about it, and they agreed to see what they could do. The result of it was that some of them have kept their wages on in the same way, and that about fifty per cent. of the association, that is half of them, have made net prices. But then, the association is a very small body, and others in the potteries do not bother themselves about what the association does.

680. But we are rather anxious as a Committee to know what has been the result of the fixing of net prices; has it interfered with the trade in any way?—I am afraid I cannot say anything about the trade.

681. Would there be anyone who could give us information about that?—Any of the fixed price people would, I daresay, be glad to give you that.

682. You see the importance of the point, if we are to make any recommendation to Parliament. I mean the responsibility of making a recommendation of a large change would be very great unless we were apprised that some experiment had proved on the whole successful?—One does not know always what the opinion of the men is on the subject. Generally speaking, they say 'Oh, we ought not to pay this, and we ought not to pay that;" but if you analyse the various advantages against the disadvantages and so on of the old state of labour there, they will admit very often that they are better off than they were; that is, from the men's point of view. In fact, I have had long conferences with three respected secretaries of unions there; they are not very strong unions, or rather they were not; I do not know whether they are increased in strength now, but they were not very strong, and I did not get very much help; there was not that cohesion with them that enabled them to say that they could come and tell me and not be afraid of what was told me, I think.

683. Do you happen to know whether there is any general desire upon the part of organised labour to make their ideal system a net wage system?—I think if the potteries were canvassed now there would be a large proportion.

684. We shall have to get evidence about that. Do you happen to know this. After the net wage system has been adopted in the way that you have described, have any of those places gone back upon the old system?—No, not that I know of. The option of the net price system does not always please everybody. I know one case in which, owing, I think, a good deal to my continual pressure in talking about this question there, four men were put on net wages, and three of them immediately left; so that it does not please everybody. But then the representatives of the men were good enough to meet me two or three times and have a long talk about it, and they would be quite satisfied, I think, to say that a net wage was the proper way to deal with the question.

685. On the whole you have found them rather conservative?—The trade itself is excessively conservative, I mean in their manners and methods and everything; they are old-fashioned in the way they work, and everything.

686. They would not like to be pushed out of this habit, would they?—No, I do not know that they would, all of them.

687. There is one reprehensible thing you were going to call our attention to?—That is a thing I cannot deal with at all—I have tried to deal with it—beyond saying to the men "why on earth you stand it, I do not know." We have not been able to do anything. I mean this. When a man has either less or more than a sovereign as wages, one penny per sovereign is deducted for the convenience of paying him in change; that is to say, for his convenience, and for what the employer considers to be his trouble in getting small money from the bank to pay his workmen's wages. At the first I thought that was a breach of the Truck Act, but unfortunately we could not get any further with it, and left it in the hands of the men.

688. It turned out then that the workmen did not get his full wages?—Quite so.

689. And therefore it is for the workmen to sue for it?—It is under the Employer and Servant Act; that is what I considered it to be.

690. It is not a general practice?—No, As I say in my memorandum, it is a survival that lingers in a few old fashioned places, that one wanted to have dealt with if anything was forthcoming. Then, talking of the payment of wages, there is an old fashion that still survives which you cannot always get hold of, that the foreman makes 6d. or 1s. by advancing the wages before pay-time sometimes.

691. Of course, that is a private transaction?—That is a private transaction between the foreman or the manager or cashier and the workman, not the master; still I think it could be brought home to both.

692. Have you any experience whether this deduction of a penny for change applies to biggish works?—No; it applies to a very few very small, old fashioned, places,

I brought that up before the members of the association, and they all of them utterly denied the use of it; but it has been so public that I have actually seen it printed on the truck notice, "Change, 1d. in the £.".

693. Could you give us those truck notices?—Yes, I can give you several truck notices if you want them.

694. We should like them very much. Now, will you come to the subject of fines. What are your instructions to employers about "fair and reasonable." You have made in your instructions a recommendation that it should not exceed 5 per cent?—That the total amount of the fines in a week on any one person, except in a case of any act causing damage to plant or danger to life or limb, should not exceed 5 per cent. of the weekly earnings

695. Will you tell us what led you to that conclusion as a Department?—That is not a conclusion of the Department; it is my individual way of dealing with the question. I have seen fines exhibited on placards which I have considered grossly unreasonable, especially on young people earning small wages.

696. Could you give us any of those lists?—I could furnish you with several of them by and bye.

697. If you will send them in they will be printed as an appendix to your evidence. Then you say that the 5 per cent, even is somewhat vague?—Yes, in this way. I started this 5 per cent some years ago when I first came into the Midlands. I told the inspectors that that was what I should consider not unreasonable, but it must be the maximum. Some of the people have taken that too literally. For instance, I had a notice suggested for my approval—not that we approve notices as a rule, because that is a very dangerous thing to do, but a truck notice was sent to me which gave a series of notices, saying, "one-twentieth part of the wages." So that they proposed to fine up to the maximum for everything that happened, just because I had given them that lead by making that instruction. That is a thing that at the present moment I am altering in respect to that particular firm; that is why I say it is a vague way of leaving it.

698. Then you object to the power of the employer to state an offence. What do you mean by that?—Why should an employer say that a man must be fined 1s. for sitting on a wheelbarrow? That is the sort of thing I mean.

699. That actually occurs, does it?—Yes, it has occurred within my experience.

700. Fines for what appear to be trivial breaches of order?—For trivial breaches of order like that, it seems to me that some slight check should be put upon a proprietor's power of doing a thing of that kind.

701. And even with regard to offences, do you suggest a maximum—a statutory proportion of the wages?—Yes, I think there should be a maximum. It is very difficult to decide on a maximum in the case of acts calculated to damage plant or to cause danger.

702. Now you will excuse my being a little anxious about this. Is not there a point reached at which money is of no consideration, at which the employer must consider the work as a whole and say: "It is not a case for settling with you individually; you have done a thing that involves danger to other people and I must treat with you not by way of a deduction, but you must be no longer my servant"?—Yes, I should prefer that, perhaps, to a fine,

703. But I mean, even assuming fines, and even assuming fines under the condition of a maximum, being a percentage, does it not occur to you that it would be dangerous to characterise offences as finable things, if the offence involves danger to other people?—Yes, it might be so, and probably would be so. I have not considered it in that way before.

704. Just let me put it in this way. Is there any danger in apprising beforehand workmen that, if they commit an offence which would endanger the works or endanger their fellow workmen, the measure of that offence is a certain pecuniary sum; does it seem to you that there is a danger in that?—Yes, there is a certain amount of danger.

705. I suppose the answer, in one way, would be that, while the maximum is permitted, it is always open to the employer and the workmen to separate; dismissal is not forbidden, is it?—Oh no, it could not tie the occupier's hand so far as that is concerned, surely. He could say, "This is too grave for me to deal with under this tariff, whatever it is; I must deal with you in another way; you must have a holiday for a week."

706. No doubt there seems a severity in that, but on the other hand a tariff for offences involving danger to other people seems to me to have dangers itself?—I see what is in your mind.

707. To that extent you would agree, would you, that the imposition of a maximum should perhaps be reconsidered?—In cases of danger and damage to plant, yes.

708. Then you suggest whether there should not be some amendment of the law by way of defining an offence. You say, "The abolition of disciplinary fines must result in suspension or dismissal"?—I think so.

709. I suggest to you that there may possibly be a line through this; that if the discipline is in the region of making a man in himself and in his own purse suffer for a slight delinquency, then you might get your maximum; but if it is in the region of making every other body in the place run danger or suffer, it would be a pity to have sanction to fines for that. I would like the other members of the Committee to note this point, because I think it is a most important point, and one that we should have elucidated?—You think the man might be mulcted as far as his insubordination or whatever it is related to himself, but not as far as it related to possible danger to his fellow workmen.

710. I am suggesting to you that that is one view of it; I do not say that it is my own view. I suppose the true answer to that is, what I originally mentioned to you; that the fines do not conclude the matter, but the option of dismissal remains behind?—I do not suppose the fine would conclude the matter in the case of any offence.

711. Probably that is the answer?—That would be my view of it

712. Is there a list of fines put up near the gate of the factories?—There are constant lists and tariffs, and notices put up in factories; they are either put up in the rooms, when they are put up, or sometimes they are not put up.

713. So that when the worker enters the employment, if he is scrupulous, he can see all the kind of traps that he has to avoid?—Yes, but I am afraid many of them do not read down these traps; they take the thing on trust before they go in. I do not think a man in his senses who read that he would be fined 1s. for sitting on a wheelbarrow would go with a clear mind into that works, although it is a very big one.

714. Now let us come to the thorny subject of damaged goods That, in your opinion, is the most difficult point of all?—I think it is the most difficult point to arrive at justice being done. I would illustrate that, if I am not anticipating anything you are going to ask, by the case of a tile. I am taking this as a concrete case at the present moment. An ordinary majolica tile which is a thing like this. (The witness drew a diagram.) It has to be painted in majolica, which is a leaded colour—a dangerous process—and then it has to be fired in the kilns. It is stamped like that; it is stamped out by one man. After that is done, and it is dried, in biscuit, it then goes to the paintress to paint it. It then goes to the kiln man to put in the oven and harden the colours on; that is practically what it is. There may be a pattern—one of William Morris's cabbages, or something of that kind—impressed on it, and the die that presses it may be blunted; the pattern on the die may be slightly blunted, so that it does not raise the dividing lines of the colours sufficiently on the tile underneath. The next process then of any importance is that it goes to the paintress. Now the paintress dabs on a lot of colour there; another colour there; another colour there; another colour there; and another colour there; it then goes into the kiln and is fired, and the colour is fastened on, and the effect of a glazed tile is produced. But when you take it out of the kiln the person in the shop (I mean the shop where it is sorted out for payment and being put in the warehouse) says: "Oh, this is not right." Then in nine cases out of ten they put it down to the majolica paintress. That is a point upon which we have a great deal of difficulty. If these lines which ought to contain the colour, which ought to be slightly raised above the body of the tile, are not cut sufficiently sharply by the die, the person in charge of the die is responsible to a certain extent, because the wall—that which divides the colour—is not sufficiently high. Then the man who mixes the colour glaze may be responsible. If the glaze is not absolutely properly proportioned and the chemicals are not acting, as they are meant to act, together, he may cause some damage, because when it is put into the kiln one colour runs or dries before another colour, they not having been properly balanced, and the colours run together. Then the girl herself may paint carelessly and smudge over these lines. Then when it is put in the kiln (it is supposed to be done with a spirit level) it may be the least bit tilted by mistake and all the colour runs down there. The result when that tile comes out is that there are some browns and some greens all mixed up together at the ends of it. The difficulty we have is to find out who is responsible for that and it is an almost impossible question to solve. The unfortunate person who is generally supposed to be responsible for it is the female, the paintress, because she has the least protection, I suppose, of the others in the works ; the men can defend themselves.

715. Each operator at the four stages disclaims responsibility, of course ?—That is exactly the point. That is a concrete case at present within the last few days in my hands to decide.

716. You have presented a great conundrum to us ; now can you help us to solve it ?—I do not know about any solution of it. Then another further extraordinary part of the case is that upon submitting one of these spoilt tiles, which I certainly should not like to pay for as a good tile, and put into my grate—that submitting it to an authority, to an expert in the tile trade, he said: "Oh, I should not call that spoilt at all ; I do not mind those runnings there ; it gives it a sort of artistic effect which it would not have otherwise, and I should sell that tile for a first-class tile." In the middle of these difficulties one has to steer one's course. That only illustrates the difficulty of deciding as to who is the actual person at fault in most cases. They may not be so difficult of detection as they are in this case, certainly.

717. Where the damage can be liquidated—to use the legal expression—can be fixed by a reference between a bad article in the market and a good one, then the difference is the damage ?—Yes. There is one point—I do not know whether you are prepared to express an opinion upon it—upon which I feel very strongly ; that when a man produces a piece of bad work and the employers say they will not pay for it, that does not come under the Truck Act at all, because it is wages that have never been earned. Where a man makes a second class job out of a first class material, and the proprietor has to sell it as a second-class job, then you can adjudicate as to the difference ; the damage is the difference in price as you say.

718. Of course if a man is working upon time, I suppose you could hardly say that he has not earned his wages, although the result is unsatisfactory ?—No, I was thinking more particularly in that case of piecework ; I had not considered it from the point of view of time.

719. Take a piece-worker. The condition of the work would be that he puts out pieces ?—Yes, so many pieces.

720. You say if one of those was damaged, it may be part of the contract that that was to be treated as non-existent ?—If it is damaged so as to be unsaleable, but if it is damaged only so far as to be saleable at a lower price, then I think that that comes within the terms of the section, that the deduction should be "fair and reasonable," and that some explanation of it should be given in the ordinary way.

721. You only put this to show the difficulty you have, and that we would have, in attempting any definition ?—Yes, that is the point.

722. Then we come to the thing which you have been already alluding to—materials and things to be done and provided. Fuel is an instance ?—Yes.

723. Is not your only difficulty there two-fold ; in the first place that the fuel should be charged at the cost and no more, and secondly, that there should be some provision made which will secure that the loss for waste of fuel to some extent falls upon the workman who has incurred the loss. Have I made that clear to you ?—Yes.

724. The only value of putting it by way of a deduction would be that the workman would have a joint interest with the master in avoiding the waste ?—Yes, he would.

725. But you say the scheme opens the door to possible injustice if there is an unscrupulous employer and a defenceless worker. That injustice can be obviated if you keep the charge made for the fuel exactly to the on cost ?—Yes, but I was not referring there so much to the case of fuel. I was referring there to other things of which the price could not possibly be ascertained. Take the case of needles that we have been talking about. That might be magnified to any amount in the case of a defenceless body of workpeople.

726 Still, you can see the difficulty that occurs. Waste or breakage might be reckless if there was no interest in the avoidance of that by the workman ?—Yes, that would apply, you would say, even to needles. One of the common arguments advanced in favour of charging for needles is, "they would be less careful in the use of them if we did not make them buy them."

727. Let me put this to you. Suppose you had left the matter entirely to the ordinary situation of confidence between employer and workman—confidence to begin with, with the risk of dismissal if that confidence was found to be unwarranted ; no fines about it ; no charges for on-cost ; no charge for waste, but just that the employer and his foreman look to see who are good, prudent workmen, with the sanction of possible dismissal. What do you say to that alternative ?—It would be a highly desirable alternative, if it was not too Utopian.

728. It is just on that latter point that my mind is troubled. You are aware, of course, that in certain works there are no fines or deductions at all ?—Oh, yes, some people have reached that confidence.

729. Even in a Utopia, it is a Utopia of the worst kind in some cases, because there is the risk of employment being lost for life ?—Quite so. I have a case here ; I do not know whether it is a Utopia at all ; it is the North Stafford Railway. They decided to abolish all fines, and they say that "suspension and dismissal will follow the usual offences."

730. When was that done ?—At the end of 1896.

731. Can you give us any information as to how that has worked, whether it has worked harshly ?—No, I cannot tell you whether it has been successful or not at the present time. I think that would affect all employees—rolling stock employees as well as fitters and so on.

SIXTH DAY.

Wednesday, 30th May, 1906.

PRESENT.

The Right Hon. THOMAS SHAW, K.C., M.P., Lord Advocate for Scotland (Chairman).

T. E. BETTANY, Esq. (Secretary).

Mr. J. A. REDGRAVE, H.M. Superintending Inspector of Factories, Birmingham, was recalled; and further examined.

Mr. J. A. Redgrave.

30 May 1906.

By the Chairman.

732. You can now please continue the evidence you gave at our former meeting. I think you had reached the subject of deductions for waste?—Yes, but the inquiry towards the end of my last day's evidence was getting a little more into general principles.

733. I would now like to bring you back to any point you wish to present to us especially connected with this question of deductions. May I assume that the whole question of waste arises under the clause of the Act about deductions for "materials supplied or things done or provided" by the employers?—I think it would come under the category of damaged goods. Upon the last ocasion I illustrated the difficulty of deciding where the responsibility should lie by giving the history of what was called a spoiled tile. I quoted that as an instance of the difficulty, but added that other cases might not present such great difficulties where the succession of processes through different hands was not so elaborate

734. Substantially I assume that the illustration you gave pointed to the difficulty of allocating the fine upon the true delinquent?—That was what I intended to illustrate.

735. Have you any special point that you desire to mention with regard to the phrase in the Act about "materials supplied and things done or provided," by the employer?—It seems to me that these words allow an employer, as I read them, to charge for the expenses he incurs in carrying out statutory obligations. That is only an opinion of my own, but if I am right I don't think he ought to be allowed to make such a charge. I differentiate between fining a man for disobeying a clause in the Factory Act and charging the man for providing sanitary or other measures under certain regulations. For instance, there was a case in which some years ago an overseer was fined a sovereign for not carrying out a provision of the Factory Act. The High Courts decided that it was a legal fine. That was the case of Crewdson. I don't say that £1 was not an excessive amount, but that was not the class of difficulty that I was dealing with. I was rather referring to workpeople having to pay contributions towards the expenses incurred in carrying out certain proper sanitary and other requirements such as sweeping the shop, especially where there is clay or lead about, as in the potteries, or in providing accommodation required, or for washing overalls, which employers are required to provide and maintain for the use of the operatives.

ıam v. dson 55 J.P.

736. I understand your proposition, or rather suggestion, to be that wherever there is obligation set by statute or even by the rules of the Department, which have statutory effect, that obligation should be discharged without importing the discharge of it in any way financially into the contract between the employer and the employed?—The cost should not be included.

737. Would you permit me to suggest another point, namely, wherever you have what may be called steady charges of on cost in the business, things which can be estimated from month to month and from year to year, is it in accordance with your view that these also might be excluded from the category of deductions, or have you any view upon them?—I feel very strongly that the time has come when such regulated costs as the provision of tools and power and things of that kind might be put a stop to, as deductions.

738. Let us please exclude tools in the meantime, for this reason, that tools may be the subject of wastage, to which you have already referred, whereas the provision of a standroom, the provision of light, and things of that sort, are on a different footing. Have you any opinion as to whether these things should be excluded from the category of possible deduction?—I have a strong opinion that that should be done; and that it is possible to be done by a readjustment of prices.

739. The first proposition that I understand you assent to is that where the employer is bound to do certain things by statute, it should be reckoned an improper deduction to make any charge for costs incurred in fulfilling his statutory duties?—Yes.

740. Are we agreed upon that?—Yes.

741. I now suggest to you a second point, namely that where there is a steady charge of on cost in the business as, for instance, standing room, light, and the like, Parliament might interpose to say that that should not be a deduction from wages, but that wages should be fixed irrespective of these things?—I agree with that entirely.

742. Then we come to the third category in which wastage by the workman himself is possible. Do you think that Parliament might interpose to prevent these deductions, or would there be danger in preventing deductions for such wastage?—I am afraid I cannot give a very decided answer on that subject. I presume you refer to deductions in respect of damaged goods, which is a serious question. It is more for the decision of this Committee, and I do not know that I can help you much.

743. Would you assent to the view thus far, that a maximum of deduction should be prescribed?—Yes, a proportion in relation to the man's wages, a maximum proportion.

744. Perhaps that is as far as we are entitled to press you. Do you think there is a possible injustice because of the risk that an ignorant workman may be charged a deduction actually for the fuel used in the boiler furnace?—If there was a deduction of that kind, the employer might for common furnace coal charge his workman a deduction at the price of ordinary household coal. I am only putting that point with reference to the use of coal.

745. Even with regard to that, are you not carrying it rather far? Is there not a check provided by the Act of Parliament: namely, with reference to the charges being fair and reasonable in view of the cost?—A reference to the words "fair and reasonable" necessitates an inquiry at once into the matter. The aggrieved person probably does not bring the matter before us, and we may not hear of any arrangement unless by chance. We have just heard that in the hosiery trade there has been a reduction in the price of needles, for which workpeople have to pay, and that some employers have not given their workpeople the benefit of that reduction. Probably if an inquiry had not been instituted within the last fourteen days, we should not have heard of the matter for some time, and needles might in some cases have been charged double their retail price.

746. Coming now to questions of remedy, is it your opinion that a fresh Act is required ?—There is a good deal of tautology in the two first Acts which is, I think, apt to confuse people.

747. Do you refer to the Acts of 1831 and 1887 ?—Yes, reading them together. The conditions under which these Acts were passed have considerably changed. In my experience, Truck in the sense of the exchange of commodities for labour is almost a thing of the past, or has become so, and the whole of the Act of 1831 is directed to the prevention of that system. This was followed upon similar lines by the Act of 1887, and the conditions called for by that Act are disappearing. That is my view of the matter.

748. Would it be possible to consolidate the legislation ? And to bring the more valuable provisions of the Act of 1896 into a general statute covering the whole ground ?—I should humbly suggest the preparation of an Act embodying the principal provisions of the Act of 1896. and if that Act leaked at all any amendments could be introduced. But I should reconstruct the legislation, taking the Act of 1896 as the basis.

749. I wonder whether you can help the Committee in a matter which is no doubt in the mind of all of us, whether any expedient occurs to you for saving the situation caused by the vagueness of the words " fair and reasonable " ? I suppose you recognise, to begin with, that these words being there involves an inquiry, which inquiry can only be started by an individual workman who is probably in humble circumstances ?—Quite so.

750. Does anything occur to your mind to save that in any way, by giving a sort of ready appeal for remedy without all the circuitousness of a prosecution and the like ?—A disputed reference to the words " fair and reasonable " in the circumstances of a particular case can only end in a prosecution, or in the withdrawal of the plea of the aggrieved, either by himself, or by us acting for him.

751. In order to evoke your opinion, I would incline to demur to that, by suggesting this to you, might there not be some means of appeal to an officer on the spot representing the department ?—Then you would have to define the words " fair and reasonable " much more closely.

752. That is what I wanted to drive you to ?—I should be glad to be driven there, because I think the point wants settling.

753. Can you give us any guidance upon it ? In the first place with regard to goods supplied I presume the elementary standard would be cost, to begin with ?—Yes.

754. That would be the prime element in the consideration of such a point in the first instance ?—Yes, quite so.

755. Then at the other end, you would have a maximum to end with ?—Yes.

756. Starting with cost at the one end, and with the impossibility of deducting too much by reason of the percentage at the other end, can you guide us between these two points to anything except a reference on the spot to an inspector ?—No, I am afraid the individual worker would have no means of reference, except, if he belonged to a union, to his secretary or to the inspector. I do not exactly see the way out of it if he is uncertain on the point.

757. I point out to you the hardship on both sides. You might feel constrained as a Department to institute a prosecution in order to try the point ?—Yes.

758. And with the best intentions in the world, that is likely to cause some friction, and may end in a complete acquittal ?—It might.

759. Would there be no means short of that of getting so simple a point tried ?—In respect to materials it is simple enough, because we can ascertain the price of the materials, and we know at what price they ought to be supplied, take the case of needles to which I have referred.

760. Well, take that point. Would it be necessary for you under the present system to institute a prosecution in order to settle that question, and would not a suggestion from the Home Office, acquiesced in by both parties, be sufficient for the purposes of the department ?—I will instance a proposed action in the case of the needles. The district inspector will in each case on my instruction go to the employer and point out " these needles I know cost so much, and you are charging the workmen so much more for them." Unless the employer hopes to disprove the evidence of the inspector, I do not think he could do otherwise than stop the overcharge at once.

761. Is it within your experience that such cases do happen and thus save the necessity of a prosecution ?—Oh, yes, constantly.

762. So that in practice you have a system substantially of appeal to an independent officer ?—Oh, yes, there is.

763. I undertand one of your suggestions for legislation is that the terms of any ordinary contract should be defined. Will you please explain that ?—I submitted to the Committee within the last few days a copy of an old contract from a large malleable iron company in Derbyshire, and I instanced from it at the last meeting such a regulation as this, that a man should be fined 1s. for sitting on a wheelbarrow. The list of fines is an old one, and I do not know whether it is in operation now, but there are in it two or three charges of a similar character, which I think are somewhat arbitrary. I can account for some of them by supposing that the experience of the employer is wider than my own, as to the necessity for fixing such a charge. For instance, the employer or firm in question may have had experience of men sitting on a wheelbarrow, and the barrow tipping up so as to injure the men, so that employers have constantly either to lose their services or to pay them when they are laid up. There may be some reason of that kind.

764. There is, I understand, a special point you wish to refer to, as to a decision with reference to the lace trade ?—The principal lady inspector, or the local lady inspector, would probably give better evidence about that, because they conducted the case, but I understand it resulted in putting out-workers outside the pale of the Truck Acts, unless they actually carried out the work manually themselves.

765. With reference to the contract notices which you referred to on the last occasion, I see one signed by the Governor and Director of A (see Appendix III., Exhibit No. 1) ?—Yes, that is a large concern at Derby.

766. I observe that there is a list of thirty-six fines ?—That is the sort of thing I wish to call attention to.

767. No. 29 refers to insubordination, or incivility, to officers of the company, for which the fine is 1s. or summary dismissal ?—Yes, I consider that somewhat vague as an offence. I know that people must not be insolent anywhere, but I think that insubordination, for instance, is a very vague expression to lay before an inspector of factories as justifying a fine of 1s. We want something more definite.

768. I see that Offence 36 is using a barrow for purposes of a seat, fine 1s. ?—That is the case I referred to. Probably there was some explanation of it at the time. If I am not interrupting the course of the evidence, may I state my belief that notwithstanding the formidable list of offences during the seventeen months which preceded the time at which the list was handed to me, there was only about £2 10s. paid in fines at the works, whereas the wages amounted to £40,000 during these seventeen months. The proportion of fines was therefore small and insignificant.

769. It is quite fair upon your part to say that ?—I can give the exact figures, if you like.

770. You have forwarded to us in your letter of the 24th inst., a notice which I have in my hand. It is marked number " 4 " in green, (see Appendix III., Exhibit No. 2 A.). Is it a sample of what may be called a generally reasonable schedule ?—I do not say that all the items are defensible ; indeed there is one item that is challengeable, but the form of the notice seems less arbitrary and irritating than some of the more elaborate notices.

771. Exhausting these notices, let me now call your attention to another one, marked " 3 " in green (see Appendix III., Exhibit No. 2 B.); what have you to say with regard to that one; are there any items in it that you wish to call attention to?—No, I do not know that there are any particular items in it that are objectionable.

772. Then I now call your attention to the one marked "2" in green, which sets forth that the operative will be "subject to the undermentioned fines, stoppages, and subscriptions." (see Appendix III., Exhibit No. 2 C.). Now, I am rather anxious to ask you a question or two about that. Are the fines set out there?—Yes, they are.

773. Are there any of them that occur to you as the subject of observation?—There are two that I think are rather excessive. One is 1s. for leaving scraps in the shop; and another of 1s. for wasting water. Leaving scraps about is against the regulations; workmen are obliged, under the special rules, to work in a cleanly manner, and to remove their scraps. Neglect of this is really a breach of a statutory regulation, but 1s. fine for that, or for wasting water, seems to me to be excessive.

774. Where does that notice come from?—I do not know; I have had it by me for some years.

775. We may now come to your comments about deductions?—I have made a general observation with reference to the supply of gas. Men are often charged 6d. per week for their gas. I have often asked for that to be reduced and in some cases it has been reduced, but firms say that 6d. is as little as they ought to charge in order to pay the gas bills.

776. Have you as a department ever gone through the operation of checking the bills?—I cannot say that I ever have personally; but I think two or three of the inspectors have done so, and have been satisfied that the statement was fairly correct.

777. Can wastage occur under that head?—Yes, if a man neglects to turn off the gas when he leaves his work; he may leave the jet burning.

778. Would there not be sufficient supervision to prevent that?—The Potteries are places by themselves, with hardly any supervision. It is in that respect rather an extraordinary trade. That is a point upon which I am personally often grumbling in the Potteries—the want of supervision. The trade was conducted in the old days independently by the men themselves, and the ordinary discipline of a factory or machine shop is not brought to bear upon them.

779. There is a third item of debit, viz., subscriptions. Is that for a club?—The items are as follows, viz., "Club, 6d. per fortnight each member; benevolent, 3d. per month; club levies, 6d. on the death of a member's wife; 1s. on the death of a member; infirmary 3d. per month." Under the decision in Hewlett v. Allen, we have given up taking any account of these at the present moment.

780. Have you an opinion as to whether it is on the whole a sound enough system?—I think that mutual insurance and such arrangements among workers are on the whole sound and good, as long as the workmen have themselves some control.

781. We may have to get evidence upon that as to whether these clubs are under the control of the workpeople?—Yes. These notices have no head line to show where they come from.

782. I now show you another notice from the Potteries marked "One" in green. (see Appendix III., Exhibit No. 2 D.). Have you any special observation to make with regard to that one?—No; I only sent it up to show what an elaborate thing it is.

783. Where does it come from?—I don't know. The only reference upon it is the "Tunstall" postmark. These were some of the notices asked for in 1902. Persons were then required to send in copies of their notices, and some of them came without any mark or reference to identify the firm.

784. I suppose you have no doubt that all these five documents are genuine notices which are, or have been, in operation?—They were sent in obedience to a letter from the district inspector, a copy of which I have here, asking the firms to forward to him copies of their placards and notices under the Truck Act.

785. Mr. Yarrow has asked me to put a few supplementary questions. One of them is this, will you tell us whether, in all the factories under your supervision, the conditions of employment, giving the hours of work, fines, deductions etc., are put up in some conspicuous place?—They are not put up in all cases. The hours of work and other matters coming within the scope of the Factory Act are exhibitied in all cases.

786. But not such particulars as fines and deductions?—Not in all cases.

787. Do you think there should be any rule about that?—Any deductions at all of any kind, whether for a club or for medical assistance or anything of that kind, should be a matter of common knowledge and exhibited at the works.

788. In the cases where such notices are put up, where are they generally affixed?—Generally at the timekeeper's office, or close to it.

789. Would it not be a good plan to insist on these regulations being affixed outside the works, so that any applicant could study them before going into the place?—I do not know. No doubt they could be displayed in the lobby where applicants have to wait before being taken into the works.

790. You would go that far?—Oh, certainly.

791. Can girls who seek employment study the conditions before applying for a berth?—Yes, where the rules or regulations are exhibited, as they are in a large number of well conducted places, they have those opportunities of studying the notices, if the girls look about.

792. Let me put before you another suggestion from Mr. Yarrow, viz., would it be a good plan for these notices, setting forth the hours of work, the fines, deductions, etc.—to be put into a printed form and exposed in the shop window, so that not only present or prospective workpeople could see them, but also that the public who make purchases in the shop could form an opinion as to the labour conditions at that establishment. Would that not ensure a certain amount of public opinion being brought to bear on the matter?—I cannot go so far as to recommend that expedient.

793. Mr. Yarrow follows up the last question by this one—If an employer objected to that plan, would it not be some evidence that he had reason to be ashamed of his methods?—I don't think an employer would like to have the whole working of his place exposed to the comment of everybody who passed or who might stop out of idle curiosity.

794. Probably we are a little at cross purposes. We were rather hitting at places not under your supervision, viz., the shops?—Then I think I must not speak for the shopkeepers.

795. One suggestion is that if there was a general system of publicity of that character the best employers would rather favour the public knowing the good terms upon which they gave employment?—I don't know whether the suggestion is workable. We should probably have a great deal of trouble with it.

796. You were good enough to get me a firm's syllabus of wages and specific stoppages (see Appendix III., Exhibit No. 3)?—I got that from a firm on Saturday—from B, and the pay tickets are there, showing the stoppages, etc.

797. These show deductions for gas, sweeping, cooking, washing overalls, etc., supplemented by small items for infirmary, sick club, benefit fund, etc.?—Yes, all the departments in these works do not pay exactly the same stoppages.

798. If the fines and deductions extended to a list of from fifty to 100, the form of receipt produced would not suffice?—Not if the whole of the fines were inflicted at one time.

899. Would you approve of any system of settlement under which the worker is not specifically apprised of what are to be the debit items against his wages?—No, certainly not.

800. I am sorry to detain you so long over your evidence, but there is one other point. The secretary of this committee has had a letter of which the heading is, "National Amalgamated Iron Plate Trade Society, 12, Tividale Street, Dudley Port, Tipton, Staffordshire, May 25th, 1906." The writer of that letter states that in that trade there are certain grievances, and I understand you have made inquiries with regard to allegations of grievance set out in that letter?—Yes, I was only able to start the inquiry yesterday, as I did not get the particulars until yesterday morning. The letter is from Mr. Simeon Webb, who writes on behalf of The National Amalgamated Iron Plate Trade Society. That name puzzled me for some time, and Mr. Webb himself admits that it is not the happiest way of describing his society, because it does not deal exactly with the iron plate trade. The proper description of work carried on by its members is the galvanised wrought hollow-ware trade. When I first saw the letter I was inclined to think the society had reference to the manufacture and rolling of iron plates. It was some time before I could localise the reference. This hollow-ware trade is the manufacture of galvanised buckets and baths and things of that kind, and it is conducted to a certain extent in the Midland counties and at Bristol. The complainant writes that, "With a small section of employers in the trade the old system prevails of making a deduction of from 4d. to 6d. for light from their employees wages out of which we venture to think a profit is being made, and, although the provisions of the Act are not complied with, the factory inspectors do not trouble to interfere, although complaint has often been made."

Mr. J. A. Redgrave.

801. What is your observation upon that?—My observation upon the reference to ourselves is that we have had no complaint from the trade at all. We cannot find any trace of such a complaint at our offices—not at Wolverhampton, or at South Staffordshire or at Birmingham.

802. Then are you able to say whether this complaint which has just come before you for the first time, is well founded or not?—I think the history of this correspondent's reference to us is as follows—Some time ago his Society took proceedings against a bucket-maker for not giving a contract and the particulars of deductions for gas. They did not refer the matter to us, but went on their own. By some extraordinary perversity the clerk to the magistrates instructed the magistrate that an individual could not proceed on his own account under the Truck Act, but that the prosecution must be conducted by the factory inspector. The matter has been mentioned in the House of Commons.

803. There is no real warrant for the suggestion of the clerk to the magistrates?—Not at all. The parties were not prepared to go to the expense of upsetting the decision, but they then came to us and said, "You must go on with this, you must take it up, the magistrates' clerk said so," but the defendant in the case had complied with the Truck Act; immediately upon it being pointed out to him by the factory inspector that he ought to have a contract and to give the particulars he did so at once.

804. And so you did not interpose?—No; we do not always prosecute people upon technical points at once under the Truck Act, and this case happened three weeks before the factory inspector represented to the defendant that he had got certain things to do, which he did. Under these circumstances I would not consent to the district inspector taking the chestnuts out of the fire at the request of the Society.

805. And now you may take the second point of complaint?—He writes that, "In some factories there exists a system of fining a man 6d. each time he is late or absent from work, and this where the men are on piece work." I asked Mr. Webb to tell me who the delinquents were to whom he referred in complaint No. 1; he pointed to C., and to D. I went to C. Consequently I found that he deducted 4d. a week for gas, and that a sub-contractor who employed twenty-four people paid a lump sum of 2s. 6d. per week for gas for his underlings. All this was set forth in written and signed agreements under the Act of 1896. I saw those agreements. Then I went to D. in the immediate neighbourhood and found that for several years they had ceased to charge for gas. I had not time to go to the other firms complained of, because one was at Wolverhampton and the other at Bilston. Mr. Webb also informed me that E. were in the same boat. That is a Birmingham firm, and there is their contract (handed in), so that practically the complainants' information was not quite correct with reference to these people not carrying out the contract form and that sort of thing. This has reference to the first subject of complaint. With reference to the second subject of complaint, reference was made to F. at Bristol, but that is out of my beat, and I could not make inquiries there. Meantime our local inspector was making inquiries at Birmingham and went to E., whose contract, I think, specifies some fine for being late.

806. I think what you are probably referring to is the regulation that if workmen are not there by a certain hour they are not permitted to enter the works until two o'clock?—I thought there was a specific fine for being late, but perhaps F. is the only case. We now come to the third complaint, which is "a further evil exists in some factories of a weekly deduction from wages for provision for the first fortnight after an accident out of which employers are making a sufficient profit to pay practically the whole premiums covering the insurance of their workpeople under the compensation Acts."

807. Have you ascertained whether that is so?—I have not had an opportunity of ascertaining the alleged profits of employers in reference to it, but I learn that two firms, namely, C. and D., of Lye, have such an arrangement.

808. Do you mean that they make a weekly deduction from all the wages?—A weekly deduction is made. At C. the workpeople collect it themselves; one man collects it in the yard.

809. Have you any opinion about that?—I do not think it is a bad thing, for it covers the first fortnight, when otherwise the injured workman would get nothing. The workman have absolute control of that, and it is not contrary to the Truck Act.

810. Is it under the same category as subscriptions?—Yes. D. do the same thing. The subscription is one penny; C.'s men benefit during the first fortnight; D.'s men benefit during the first week. I make no comment on that system. I got the details and found the firms perfectly frank on the matter.

811. The fourth complaint in Mr. Webb's letter is as follows:—"Another bad system which we think amounts to truck is that the foreman having a business as draper, clothier, etc., favours the workman whose wife makes her purchases at his shop"?—I have not yet had an opportunity of going into that. I know the firm and the name of the foreman. I am advised by Mr. Webb himself that the firm are most respectable, and would not tolerate such a thing if they knew it. It is a very simple matter to check that, and I shall have it dealt with at the right moment, so far as necessary. It is alleged that workmen who buy goods in the foreman's shop get put upon the best jobs—the best paying jobs—I do not know that there is any other difference suggested. I think it is probably within the power of the factory inspector to stop any such practice.

812. You remember my anxiety on the occasion of your last giving evidence to get actual copies of those lists. There is one which, for convenience, I will just use in asking you a few supplementary questions; that is, the list of E. Rule 2 is, "Any workman not being at these works at 8.15 shall not be allowed to work until 2 o'clock, unless he gives a satisfactory explanation for his absence." So far as that rule is concerned, none of the legislation can touch it?—No, it is absolutely independent of money, as far as the terms of the arrangement go.

813. But minutes of absence may be transmuted into hours of loss of work?—Yes.

814. Then Rule 3 is, "Any workman not being at these works by 2 on any afternoon shall be suspended for the remainder of the week unless he can give a satisfactory explanation." That comes in the same category?—That is in the same category.

815. Rule 4 is also in the same category, "Any workman losing more than one morning during the week shall be suspended for the remainder of the week"?—That I cannot interfere with.

816. Then I ask you about this Rule 6, because some of our number have been anxious about the matter of sick club subscriptions: "No workman will be employed at these works unless he is willing to join the sick society at the works and be subject to the rules of the society." Have you any observation to make with regard to that ?—No, none.

817. Rule 8 is, "Each workman will be charged 6d. a week for the use of gas between September 1st and March 31st, which will be deducted from his wages; any workman found using gas unnecessarily will be fined 6d." Have you anything to say with regard to that ?—The only question is whether 6d. is not too much for a burner. This is an old and burning question that has never been properly settled; I have always thought 4d. would be the proper sum; but still, I cannot regulate people's gas bills; and I do not say that I can find any great fault with some means being provided for checking waste of gas.

818. But I point out to you this. That rule provides for the two things I was referring to; there is a fixed on-cost charge for the light, and then there is, by way of a protective charge, a fine for unnecessary use of the light ?—I quite follow your point.

819. I put it to you that the two things are unnecessary; if there is a protection by way of fine for waste of gas, everything beyond that forms a fixed charge in the works, which can be regulated, without being the subject of deduction ?—The charge for light altogether should be abolished; that is my view.

820. And you are fortified in that opinion, I presume, by seeing that they take precautions in the same rule against the unnecessary use of gas ?—Yes.

821. Then Rule 9 is, it seems to me, very serious: Any work that is made wrong through neglect of the workman shall not be paid for, and he shall have the cost of the material deducted from his wages." Have you anything to say with regard to that ?—I consider that that is not fair and reasonable. It is the first time it has come under my notice, but it is a charge on which I shall raise a question; I do not consider it a fair and reasonable charge for damaged work.

822. There is a double penalty there ?—A double penalty is attached to it; there is no payment at all for the making, and the spoilt material is to be paid for by the worker.

823. Then Rule 10—"Each workman is required to get a check on entering these works and to deliver up same on leaving; failing this, a fine of 6d. will be made in each case" ?—Not giving up checks is a thing people commonly do fine for; I really cannot say whether the matter is so important as to necessitate a fine of 6d. It is very confusing if the check is not in its proper place either at or about the proper time, there is no doubt about that.

824. Then Rule 11.—"No smoking, bad language, or beer shall be allowed in these works; for each offence a fine of 6d. ?—A man may indulge in eighteen-pennyworth at once! The beer question is a very difficult question; I do not know how to deal with it. In rolling mills and those places they must have beer; they will have it—quarts and quarts a day. If an employer says that his men are not to have beer, I suppose he has some right to prevent them taking it. I have seen men going in with beer under their aprons, and so on, illegally, before now. I suppose the employer, if he feels strongly about beer, has a right to make some regulation about it. I do not know whether 6d. is not a good deal for the fine.

825.—Then Rule 12—"All fines deducted from the workman's wages to be paid into the funds of the sick society at these works." If there are to be fines at all I presume you would think that that is the best distribution of them ?—Undoubtedly.

826. These questions are only put because we happen to have the actual document as a sample before us ?—Quite so. I have very little experience of the Shop Hours Act, but I have some particulars of it; I do not know whether you want to know anything about what is done with regard to the Shop Hours Act. You will have very much better evidence from the shop societies, I daresay, than I can give you. I only wanted to mention that in Birmingham the Shop Hours Act is carefully administered.

827. Probably, we should hardly take evidence from you upon that ?—No, but I was asked to get some information about it; I do not know that I have anything very interesting to say to the Committee on the subject.

828. If your officials can get us evidence at first hand it will probably be the preferable course ?—Certainly, the officials of the salesmen's societies will probably give that evidence.

829. I do not mean the officials of the Home Office, but those who are connected with the administration of the Shop Hours Act ?—Yes. I have a few memoranda here; they are not very important; it is only to say that practically the placards required by the Act were generally put up in shops in certain towns; and that in Birmingham certain people were fined last year for failing to observe the Shop Hours Act of 1892. Birmingham considers that it leads the way as a well governed city always, and they have gone into the new Shop Hours Act at Birmingham and they find that there is not a case for fixing those days. "They do not consider that a prima facie case for a closing order" (this is under the new Shop Hours Act) "has been made out, and they cannot recommend that any further action be taken in the matter." Then in the borough of Leicester the old Shop Hours Act is administered in the usual way by the sanitary staff. At Nottingham one case of waitresses in a restaurant was referred to the inspector of factories, hoping that he could interfere in their behalf, but he was unable to do so. At Worcester the sanitary official specially appointed administers the Shop Hours Act. The City Council of Hereford have a closing order in draft under the new Shop Hours Act. At Cardiff the old Shop Hours Act appears to be carried out; I have notes about various places in that district; it would perhaps take up too much time to bring them before this Committee. If it would be of any use to you I will draw up a short memorandum conveying any information that is likely to be interesting to the Committee.

830. There was one communication that you were good enough to make to our secretary as to a memorandum by your predecessor as to some fines existing in the case of a retail draper in South Wales. I think we might have that (see Appendix III., Exhibit No. 4) ?—It was not dealt with, of course, because we have no power to deal with that clause with regard to shop assistants under the Truck Act.

831. In this establishment the information was that in 1897, there were eighty persons employed, sixty being counter hands, and there were eighty-three fines for the counter hands in the shop. Now, before we go further, I am anxious to get evidence about that at first hand ?—I do not know whether this is exactly evidence at first hand. It is a memorandum in my predecessor's handwriting of cases which came under his notice. It is not in my handwriting, and I have not been to the place, so that I know nothing about it personally.

832. Can you localise it further than saying it is South Wales ?—Yes, I can tell you the name. It was G., a draper, of Swansea.

833. According to the memorandum there were eighty-three fines for the counter hands in the shop, and forty for the same persons in the house ?—Yes, forty domestic fines—fines for their conduct in domestic life as apart from their shop life.

834. That is a total of 123 fines, ranging from 3d. to 2s. 6d. This was not a private memorandum, as I understand ?—No. I have been turning up the files in my office of old Truck Act cases, and these appeared amongst them.

835. It is officially filed ?—Yes. It would have been available for my predecessor for him to refresh his memory, if he had been giving evidence here.

836. Will you give us one or two instances of the fines ?—For showing more than two or three boxes or drawers at one time, 3d. For putting a wrong number or wrong date on duplicate, 3d. For standing on chair or counter, 6d. For not introducing at least three articles to each customer, 3d. For gossiping or making unnecessary noise in business, 6d. For asking questions of cashier respecting checks, 6d. Any assistant taking counterfeit coins will be held responsible for the amount and be fined 3d. For jumping over the counter or not dusting properly, 6d. For any unbusinesslike transaction, 3d Assistant standing at door talking with friends outside, or entering into conversation with travellers, 1s. Assistant leaving or entering by a certain entrance (I think that means the back entrance) during business hours, 2s. 6d. Assistants, young men and ladies, holding conversation in passages or upon the premises will each be fined 2s. 6d.

Mr. J. A. Redgrave.

30 May 1906.

837. These are all applicable to the work in the shop?—Yes, those are in relation to the retail shop. Then, rules in the house; assistants entering their bed rooms during business hours, 1s., assistants entering kitchen, 2s. 6d.; cleaning boots in bed-rooms during business hours, 1s.; assistants standing at street door holding conversation with friends, 1s., and (my predecessor says) "after all this provocation, an assistant found swearing or using bad language will be fined 1s."

838. We should like if possible to verify this. Is this firm carrying on business now?—I do not know, but it is easy to find out. I will try to get you the exact information.*

By Mrs. Tennant.

839. You drew a distinction between allowing a deduction from the workman in respect of a statutory obligation of the employer, and allowing a deduction by way of fine for a breach under the Act on the part of the workman?—Yes.

840. Do you not think that the administration of the Factory Act in respect of breaches by the workmen might be left in the same position as it is in respect of breaches on the part of the employer; do not you think that the workman might be prosecuted for a breach of the Factory Act, and that that would be a safer machinery than allowing the employer to fine him?—Well, I do not want to increase the number of fines, but I certainly do not think there is the same ground for stopping a fine in the one case as there is in the other. In the one case the occupier is putting the money into his pocket for a statutory obligation; in the other he is simply exercising a certain amount of discipline; it may be harsh or otherwise, but it is purely a question of discipline.

841. Of course there is a difference, but still, the workman owes an obligation to the State in respect of the observance of the law, does he not?—No doubt.

842. You do not see some danger in making the workman feel that he is owing that obligation to the master?—I should not encourage such a fine; I should take no steps to encourage such a fine.

843. But you are not prepared to say that you would like to see the abolition of the power to fine for the breach of a statutory requirement?—I should like personally to see all deductions and fines stopped, but I do not absolutely see my way in the matter of fines; that will be for this Committee probably rather than for me.

844. Have you any experience, in respect of deductions for the supply of materials, of cases in which the workers complain that they are supplied with bad materials; say in the case of needles—that the needles break very constantly, and that the employer is rather indifferent as to the excellence of the material because the workman has to pay for it?—I have no concrete case, but I have heard such a complaint in past years about defective needles being supplied. I have nothing that I can refer to on the point.

845. If we do receive sufficient evidence about it, do you think that that might be taken in balance against the difficulty that is urged on the other side, that the workers would waste the material if they did not have to pay for it?—There is something to be said for that.

846. You spoke about deductions for the price of materials going down; let me take, for instance, the charge for gas; if the price of gas went down do you think it would be within the province of the inspector to set out upon an inquiry as to whether the charge for gas was reduced correspondingly?—He ought to see to that; it would be part of his duty.

847. He would not wait for complaints, but if he heard that the price of gas was reduced in his district you think he ought to set about finding out whether the deductions paid by the workmen were reduced in proportion?—I do not know that he would start on it unless it came closely home to him in the case of some particular firm or place. No one better than yourself knows how many things the factory inspector has to do when he is at a place.

848. That is really why I asked the question. It seems to me to be one of the advantages of not calculating wages by that system that it would remove what is a very considerable obligation on the factory inspector?—I should ask the Committee to abolish the charge for gas altogether, if they would.

849. It is one of the many things which, if properly carried out, entails a great deal of work on the factory department?—It does.

850. When objections have been raised by the inspectors to the charge for certain materials—say a charge for cotton—have you any experience of the employer saying: "It is quite true I am charging a farthing more a reel at the present moment than the price at which it might be obtained outside, but in that I am allowing for fluctuations of price"?—No. I have heard of that some years ago down in the south, but the reason given was that their cotton was the best cotton, and it must be used, and that the employees' cotton bought at an ordinary shop would not be satisfactory for the work. If I recollect rightly, that was the usual reason given to me, if there was a difference.

851. You have no experience of cases in which there was no dispute that the cotton was exactly the same?—No, I cannot say that I recollect that.

852. Then you also seem to have experienced yourself no difficulty in getting evidence from the employers as to the cost of materials to them?—No, I do not think there is much trouble in that matter.

853. You are not familiar with that difficulty with other inspectors?—No. It may happen, but it has not come before me. I may have an exceptionally good class of employers to deal with.

854. Then on the question of mutual insurance in various sick clubs, do you see any difficulty in the case of workpeople who have been subscribing to clubs for some time and who leave the employment of the firm and leave their money behind them?—Yes; they are at a disadvantage, of course, unless they can immediately enter a corresponding club the same week at the next place they go to. If they leave from being invalided or past work, or something of that kind, of course they lose.

855. They would not carry their money into the next club?—No, but they will probably get the same advantages in the next club; they would not carry the amount of their subscriptions, but when you subscribe to a society you subscribe to the full benefit of it at once.

856. Not always. I have heard objections raised and I wondered whether you had heard them, to that particular situation?—No.

By Mr. Ramsay Macdonald.

857. I think you said in an earlier part of your evidence that you found considerable difficulty in discovering the existence of fines?—Is that exactly what I said? Is it not qualified in some way? Do you mean in getting full particulars from the workpeople?

858. Yes, and not merely full particulars but getting the complete statement of the circumstances under which fines and deductions are made from wages?—I cannot quite pick out the place where I said that, but I can illustrate it, I think, by mentioning that it was in reference to the Truck Act in the Potteries. I had two or three conferences with the then secretaries of the various unions, which I said were not very strong unions, and I wanted particulars from them as to the actual deductions which they thought right. I prepared several schedules of paper headed in that way, giving the workman's calling—hollow-ware dresser or printer, and so on—and I drew columns for reasonable deductions, net wages, gross wages, and so on, and I asked for this to be filled up and supplied for me. I could never get any of them; only one ever came back to me out of the whole trade. That practically put me into rather a difficulty, for I could not really get at the bottom of what the men thought they might be expected to pay and what they ought not to be expected to pay, and I have not quite got it yet.

859. I want to follow that up and to ask you whether you can assist us in any way by telling us if any statutory provision which we can recommend would help you in that way. I suggest for instance this—to give you an idea of what is running in my mind. Supposing we scheduled a form of fine register ?—I quite understand what you mean. There is an informal register of fines (fines—not deductions for materials and things) in existence at several places now. They do not all keep them; sometimes they do not fine, but you are referring now to materials and damaged work more particularly ?

860. As a matter of fact I am referring to both ?—I think, if the present statute thought fit to require a register of fines, there is no reason why you should not also require a register of deductions.

861. You think that if we do require a register of deductions, it would assist you in a more accurate inspection of what the deductions amount to and why they have been imposed ?—It would certainly assist us, because at the present moment we are depending on the men keeping their pay tickets or wages books, and they very often throw their pay tickets away and their wages books are not always available.

862. Then there was another point that you referred to, I think—a little difficulty in administration—the point of the exhibition of the tariffs of fines; I am referring now to fines in particular. Also with reference to the exhibition of the general conditions of employment. Has it struck you that there are so many notices shown at the timekeeper's office or by the entrance to the factory gates that the men get accustomed to pass by those notice-boards without looking at them ?—They very seldom do look at them.

863. As a matter of fact there are so many things shown that nothing is shown at all; it is like a hoarding in a street ?—Well, there are several classes of works where notices are exhibited, and I am confident that the workpeople—whether girls or men—have not the time to stop and read them all.

864. Would you favour a form of notice which should not be exhibited merely, but given individually to the workpeople ?—I think you are required to hand the form of contract to the workpeople as it is, but I think it would be an excellent supplement that there should be a notice exhibited as well; it need not be at the entrance to the works; why should it not be in the shops ?

865. Take that formidable list of fines, part of which we have just had read to us—the fine list of the Swansea draper. A complete copy of that need not be given to each of the employees in the shop ?—Yes, if there is no contract in writing.

866. Is not exhibition enough ?—No, the words of the Act are: "The employer of any workman or shop assistant who is party to any such contract shall at the time of making the contract give the workman or shop assistant a copy of the contract or of the notice containing its terms."

867. Then there was another point you made. You said that you would be willing to fix a statutory proportion of wages as the maximum fine. Would not there be a great danger attached to that of that maximum becoming the usual fine ?—That has happened practically within the last fortnight. A firm on my recommendation prepared a new list of fines, and I said: "Now please understand that I shall consider anything not fair and reasonable that exceeds 5 per cent. of the weekly wages." Then they put all the fines down at 5 per cent. of the weekly wages. That is an illustration of what you mean; but I am remedying that in their case, and I think it might be remedied in the case of other people.

868. Would you mind telling us how you propose to remedy it ?—I am telling the employer that he must put down certain specific fines of smaller amounts; it has not been done yet; he has not made out the new list; he is recasting it.

869. If we prescribed a certain proportion and made it statutory, it would be very difficult, would it not, for the inspectors to insist upon a smaller amount ?—Yes; I did not anticipate that difficulty.

870. Now, I come to another point; with reference to disciplinary fining. So far as the evidence appears to have gone up to now, whilst the statement of disciplinary fines looks very formidable, when we come to the actual amounts paid by the workman under that heading they are very small ?—That is so. The moral effect of the disciplinary fine is greater than its actual practice, I think.

871. That is just the point I wanted to ask you about. Have you carefully considered in the light of your experience this point—whether, as a matter of fact, the disciplinary fine is of very small value as judged by the smallness of the sum paid or whether that smallness must be taken to indicate that the disciplinary fine has actually got a considerable effect ?—I think the mere fact of there being a disciplinary fine prevents the disciplinary fine being inflicted, to a great extent. Mr. J. A. Redgrave. 30 May 1906.

872. That is to say, the workmen are coerced by the existence of the disciplinary fine into good conduct ?—They have the moral pressure of a disciplinary fine before them. That I illustrated by the particulars I gave of the fines at the firm A. The amount of fines out of a total of £40,000 of wages in seventeen months was about £2 1s. 3d., I think. Mr. Bettany has the exact details of this.

873. Then pursuing the point a little further, let me take a case within your own area of jurisdiction. May I refer to Mr. Cadbury's place at Bourneville. Three or four years ago it was stated, I believe, officially by the firm that it was impossible for it to get good work done without fining, and the illustration was given of the smallness of the fines actually levied; and the deduction from that was that the system of fines was effective. Then a change took place in the firm (I have no doubt you know the facts, and you will check me if I am wrong); all the disciplinary fines were removed, with, according to the reports, most beneficial results. The conclusion there that I would suggest to you is that as a matter of fact the smallness of the amount actually paid over does not indicate the value of disciplinary fines; it indicates the existence of a state of mind on the part of the workman which makes disciplinary fining unnecessary ?—I believe it is coming to that.

874. So that you would not object very much to the abolition of fines ?—I should like to see the abolition of fines and deductions if I could.

875. You do not think the men in the factories and workshops would suffer very much if they were removed ?—They might at first. The alternatives are so serious in the case of disciplinary fines, are they not ?

876. That leads me to my next question. I suppose in your opinion the alternative is suspension ?—Suspension or dismissal.

877. Or you might have something like what his Lordship read from that series of fines, where a person not putting in an appearance at a quarter past eight would not be allowed to work until two o'clock, and so on ?—Yes.

878. In your experience is that power of suspension or dismissal exercised to a large extent for minor offences ?—I do not think it is.

879. Of course for grievous offences it is bound to be exercised ?—No doubt. I do not think they are very seriously oppressive in any way.

880. You do not think it is a very serious alternative for us to face; if for other reasons we come to the conclusion that fining is unnecessary, the danger of suspension and of dismissal for minor disciplinary causes need not trouble us a great deal ?—I am afraid it is a matter of experience. We should have to wait for experience to give a really decided answer.

881. You think, for the moment, that your experience has not been gathered from circumstances which enable you to come to a very decisive conclusion ?—Not to give you a very satisfactory answer.

882. Then with reference to the statutory obligations which an employer has to meet not being properly the subject of deduction. Would there be any objection in your opinion to stating in a new Act simply that such statutory obligations should not be the subject of deductions ?—I think that is a proper way to put it; I should put it that the expense of carrying out statutory obligations should not form the subject of a deduction from the wages of the workers in that process.

883. Would you in addition to that put the expenses of carrying on a business under normal industrial conditions; for instance, that would include gas and water and standing room ?—Yes, I do not see why those gas and water and standing rooms should remain the subject of deductions; it is simply a survival of the old habit in the trade; there are hundreds of trades where you do not pay for standing room or anything else; you are paid for your work.

884. One other question about compulsory sick clubs, I should like your views with a little more detail on the point Mrs. Tennant made. Do you not think that when a man is bound to subscribe to a sick club as a condition of employment, if this is recognised at all, he should be enabled to draw from that sick club at any rate the payments that he has made to it on his having to leave the works?—That is almost a question of political economy, is it not.

885. It depends upon this. In your experience do you not find that men who have to subscribe to these sick clubs leave their work and leave behind them the subscriptions that they have paid into their clubs?—They do, there is no doubt about that.

886. And as a matter of experience they do not draw anything?—No, if they have not been beneficiaries during the time they have been at the works. Your idea is that there should be something of the same procedure as that of giving up a life insurance—that a man should be able to close his contract and take something away with him.

By the Chairman.

887. The analogy is the settling or the surrender value?—Yes; that has not really struck me before, but I think there is a great deal in it.

888. But is there anything like a policy taken out: is the contract on anything like that footing?—No, not as a rule. I thought Mr. Ramsay Macdonald was speaking rather of possible recommendations.

By Mr. Ramsay Macdonald.

889. My point is simply this. On the one hand you have got compulsion, and on the other hand I think you ought to have some recompense, and at the moment I do not think you have got it?—I do not think all these sick clubs are actually compulsory; I know that a great many are.

By Mr. Cawley.

890. In regard to these sick clubs I rather understand that excepting in the case of a man leaving and getting no other situation, in most cases there is no hardship, because he leaves one employment and leaves behind him what he has paid into the club, but he goes into another employment where there is a sick club, and immediately steps into benefit?—That is what I presumed—in the same way as leaving one insurance society and going into another.

891. He has paid no premiums at all, and the first day he goes in he enters into benefit?—Certainly, if it is a compulsory club, directly he enters that employer's service he enters as a full member of that club; I presume so; I do not know.

By Mrs. Tennant.

892. He does not always.

By Witness.

893. Then there would be some special contingencies of which I have no experience. I would not like to say anything about that.

By Mr. Cawley.

894. In regard to fines, in your opinion, outside the retail trades such as that of a draper, do you think there is any grievance, or do you think that fines create any dissatisfaction among the employees?—They do not like being fined; they grumble at the fines; but I cannot put my finger on any man complaining bitterly about being fined. I have some fancy fines of the Midland Railway Company here, but I never heard of anybody being subject to them.

(The Witness read a list of fines in the Locomotive Department of the Midland Railway Company, at Derby, dated January 31st, 1901. It was arranged that he should put in the list of fines now current at those works.)*

By Mr. Cawley.

895. Do you think that fines, although in the aggregate in almost all cases they amount to a very small sum, have a preventive effect?—They have a moral effect, yes.

896. Then do you not think that it might possibly be a greater hardship to the workpeople to have fines abolished, because the accumulation of a number of small offences which fines would have prevented them committing might involve their dismissal?—Well, it is difficult to say; I have no experience of concrete cases. In a factory that has been conducted with a nominal list of fines, as we say, the fines might be abolished and it might be found that the discipline was equally good without the fines. The question has not been brought before me in any way.

897. As I understand, Cadbury's place is an enormous works?—Yes, a great place.

898. And yet the aggregate of fines was extremely small?—Yes, I do not know what they were.

899. So that it is a little difficult to say, except that there was a large increase of offences, whether the fines had not much effect as the fines were so small previously?—One has to deal with works a great deal on their merits, and on the classes of the people employed in them; there is no doubt about that.

900. What I want to get at is this. Should you be prepared to say that in the interest of the workpeople alone it would be better to abolish fines altogether?—I do not know that it would altogether always be in their interests, but I should be glad if the abolition of fines could be carried out.

901. Could you differentiate in any way between fines, we will say, for being late in the morning, which is a matter entirely personal to the workman himself, and an offence that might be attributed to carelessness or one that the workman might not actually always be able to prevent?—If a man does not get to work in the morning he does not earn his money, so that he is out of pocket to some extent on his own account.

902. If he is only three or five minutes late the employer may not stop any part of his wages?—But it is usual to stop a quarter.

903. The employer may stop a quarter; but do you not think that it is better for a man to be fined a small sum for being five minutes late than to be stopped a quarter. What I mean is, being late in the morning is a thing absolutely at the will of the man himself; I am putting to you whether you would differentiate between offences of that sort and offences that may not be altogether preventible by the workman?—But does not the being late in the morning come more into the realm of unearned money rather than actual fines.

904. His not being there at the proper time may prevent other people earning money?—It does sometimes.

905. It is not his own individual loss only, because the machinery is running round; there is the loss of power?—There is loss of power to the employer; there is no doubt about that. They both suffer from it.

906. And some other workmen may suffer?—And somebody else may suffer. You want to know whether a man should be actually fined the absolute sum or simply be at the loss of the time that he has wasted.

907. What I am really putting to you is whether you could not abolish fines altogether except for that one thing—that there should be no fines for anything else except being late?—I would not restrict it to that.

908. You are really not at present in favour of fines being abolished?—I am not at present in favour of fines remaining; I would let them go. You put it that all fines should be abolished except for being late; I would not make that distinction, but if fines were to be abolished I should abolish them all.

909. But you are not in favour at present af abolishing all; you have not got that far?—I have not got so far that practically I am convinced about it. However advisable I think it might be, I am not altogether convinced that it would be possible to do without fines of any kind; although I should be glad if they could be abolished.

Mr. Maddison.

910. With regard to compulsory sick clubs, you said you thought it ought to be a fair deduction under the Truck Acts for compulsory sick clubs?—I do not know that I referred to the Truck Act particularly. I said I did not see anything unsatisfactory in sick clubs.

* Now see evidence of Mr. Guy Granet where the list of fines is set out. (Question 11692).

911. At present it is a legal deduction for compulsory sick clubs ?—The Truck Act hardly touches it.

912. It does touch it in some way, does it not ?—No; I think it is reckoned to be outside it.

913. It does not come within truck ?—No.

914. That is my point. Now has this view ever presented itself to your mind. A man, or a woman, or a girl under one of these notices is compelled to join a sick club; by doing so they may not get as good value for provision for sickness as they could get outside, and by that means they have to that extent a deduction from their wages ?—Yes, but is not that a question for them to consider whether they will go to a place where they are obliged to join an inferior sick club.

915. But it is a condition of employment ?—Yes, but they can go next door where it is not a condition of employment, if they know that this is a sick club of an unsatisfactory character.

916. But the next door place may be equally unsatisfactory ?—Well, I do not know that I can go into the constitution of sick clubs.

917. My point is this, that unless you can have some guarantee that the sick club does give what I would call the average advantages for the same money, and if it is made a matter of compulsion, to that extent the worker loses by it being a condition of service ?—Then may I suggest that it is for the Committee to fix that.

918. I wanted your opinion, because we should be largely guided by it ?—I should be only too glad that all sick clubs should be guaranteed to be of the best and most satisfactory quality.

919. But assuming that it was desirable, is it in practice really possible to get any such guarantee ?—The sick clubs appoint their own doctors.

920. There are many things—the amount to be paid in, the medical attendance to be given, the time they are allowed sick pay, and all the things that go to make a good bargain in sick provision. I ask you whether you think that, unless there is some such guarantee that the workman is getting as good value in a club where it is a condition of service as he can get in a friendly society, it does not amount to a deduction from his wages ?—I do not know that that is a question I can very well answer.

921. Then I will put this point. You said that you did not think there was any great loss if a man who had subscribed to a sick club in one works had to leave that works without getting any of his money back, because he would immediately enter upon the benefit of another sick club in the next works he went into ?—I presumed so.

922. You will probably be aware that there is always a period of probation; you do not pay your first week's money, and then if you are ill the next week get payment ?—I was not aware of that.

By Mr. Tennant.

923. I ventured to tell Mr. Redgrave that there were some such cases; in fact, I never met a club where you entered into the benefit immediately you joined the club.

By Mr. Maddison.

924. Therefore I submit to you that, in those clubs where there is a probationary period, obviously if a man started in a new club and fell ill during that probationary period he would lose to that extent ?—If that is the case there is no doubt about it.

925. Has this also occurred to you. Suppose a man is ten years in a compulsory sick club and he has made no provision elsewhere and is in no friendly society; he may leave that works and may go to another works where there is no sick club ?—Then, as I said, he would be at a disadvantage.

926. He would be at a disadvantage not only on the question of probation, but he would have to pay a higher fee if he wanted to go into any other benefit society; he might for instance have to pay a higher fee merely on account of his age. However, I will not pursue that point. Now I was going to ask you whether you are aware that in some railway companies they have seen the force of this. For instance on the M. S. & L. they have given the men back the proportion actually ascertained, of their pay that has not been exhausted during the period of their payments for sickness; and not only that, but they give interest as well ?—I believe that is so.

Mr. J. A. Redgrave.

30 May 1906.

927. Now with respect to fines. Has one form of injustice ever occurred to you, namely, that in all fines there is never any contract, if I may so put it—any real working contract between the two parties as to what the fine shall be. The workmen, as far as I know, never have anything to do with the fixing of what the fines shall be ?—No. You mean it is always settled by the master, and the workman either signs the contract or reads it on the wall.

928. Yes. Does that strike you as being an injustice ?—I think that might be altered.

929. Have you known any cases where there is a mutual arrangement about the amount of fines ?—No, I cannot say that I have; I do not know that I have inquired into the matter specially; but it has not come before me that the fine has been fixed by mutual arrangement.

930. Then you would say as a general principle, at any rate, that as it is really part of the bargain, the contract between employers and employed, which involves a reduction in wages, if there are to be fines there ought to be some mutual arrangement as to the extent of the fine or the nature of the fine ?—Well, there is a sort of mutual agreement when a man signs on and enters the works. I do not see how you are to say that no man shall be fined unless he agrees to the amount that he is to be fined.

931. But are you satisfied with the vague term that all this is covered by the conditions of employment, having regard to the fact that men after all have to give way to the need of employment—the mere fact of saying that is a condition of service and therefore makes all fines more or less proper, does that commend itself to you as being fair ?—I have already said in my evidence that I think there should be some limit to the description of an offence on the part of the master for which a fine should be imposed.

932. At any rate you will agree to this, that a fine is always, in your experience, a one-sided arrangement imposed by the employer, unless it comes within the category of being fair and reasonable ?—I know a lot of work people who fine each other for being late in the morning.

933. That was a joke of yours, I suppose ?—No; I know actual cases of piece workers who fine each other if they are not at the works at the proper time; there is no time limit—no quarters. They have to put down sixpence if they are not there by eight o'clock in the morning.

934. Would you not extend that principle of fining as between the employer and the ordinary workman ?—It is not a bad principle if it could be worked out.

935. Would you say that a long list of fines such as we had read out to us in the case of that Swansea shop, quite apart from the merits of that particular case, is objectionable and unfair—I mean, surrounding a body of people with such innumerable regulations must in itself be most humiliating and irritating and therefore should not be permitted ?—I think the object should be gained by a short sheet such as I referred to early this morning as being a reasonable sort of placard to exhibit rather than that long list of fines. I mean exactly what you say, I think.

936. I have only one further question, and that is with regard to damaged goods or spoilt work. In the case of an employer who makes a deduction for damaged goods, in your experience is the assessment of the value of the goods in the hands of the employer ?—There is generally some provision that the workmen can be shown what is supposed to be deficient or, as in the case of the lace makers at Nottingham, a so-called informal committee of the men in the shop are shown the piece and they examine into the matter and say whether the work is right or wrong.

937. Is that exceptional or is it the general practice ?—I should say that that is exceptional.

938. Quite exceptional ?—I will not say "quite" but it is exceptional; usually the workpeople are not able to follow out the damaged work.

939. And also it follows from that that the amount of the loss incurred is fixed by one party to the contract ?—The amount of the loss is generally fixed by one party.

Mr. J. A. Redgrave.

30 May 1906.

940. Now in the case of the employer not paying the amount of money that the employee thinks is proper, or that is agreed upon, the remedy of the employee is in the courts, is it not; his only remedy against the employer is in the courts?—Yes.

941. Do you see any objection to putting the employer on the same footing about damaged goods?—You mean to recover the damage from the employee by process in the courts?

942. Yes?—He never would recover it. I think if I were sitting as a magistrate I should be very loth to deal with a case of that kind to the disadvantage of the employee.

943. Now do you know anything of what the practice is in the weaving trade, which is outside the Act of 1896?—No, I do not; I have got some cotton sheds in my area, but I have not gone into that matter.

By Mr. Delevingne.

944. With regard to the question of sick clubs; Parliament, as you know, has made some provision for regulating the conditions on which men may be compelled to join a sick club in the Shop Clubs Act of 1902?—I have had no practical experience of the working of that Act.

945. It is not enforced by the factory inspectors?—No.

946. Have you ever received any complaint as to it being ineffective?—I think one or two men connected with it have been up to our office, and have been referred to the office of the chief constable because we have nothing to do with the matter.

947. You have really no experience of it?—No. I recollect its being passed some three or four years ago.

948. Do you know if the police took any action?—Yes, I think there was action taken in Birmingham by the chief constable of police.

949. Can you get us particulars of that?—I will get particulars from the chief constable; I think he was the authority; I am not quite sure.

950. On the question of the enforcement of special rules against the workmen. Mrs Tennant asked you whether it was not really better that the workman committing a breach of a special rule should be prosecuted rather than be fined. What is the practice now, both among employers, and on the part of the factory department as to enforcing special rules against workmen?—We proceeded against some workmen—we have had to do it very much against the grain—with reference to smoking in lead processes. You cannot put a stop to smoking without some of the men being prosecuted.

951. Have you done that in many cases?—Very few, I should think.

952. Does the employer ever prosecute the workman for breach of special rules?—No, but an occupier lately appealed to us to prosecute some of his workmen for refusing to leave off eating in a certain room; that was in the case of a scheduled process in the Potteries. I suggested to the inspector that I should prefer him to go and catch them himself if he could. I found that these girls insist on making a practice of it, and they had scouts out and that sort of thing, and it is impossible to catch them at present; we must wait for an opportunity when they think the matter has died down a bit. That is the last case I have had of an employer asking us to prosecute workpeople.

953. Perhaps you know that in mining the owner of the mine very frequently prosecutes the men he employs for breaches of the special rules in the mines?—Yes.

954. Do you think it would be a good plan in factories that instead of fining, the inspector should call on the occupier to prosecute the man who commits a breach of a special rule?—I think the Mines Act is a very good precedent for that.

955. One question on the provision in the Act of 1896 that deductions for materials are not to exceed cost. What in practice have you treated as covered by the word "cost"—simply the bare cost to the employer of the materials, or have you reckoned or allowed for any such items as establishment expenses?—What I have tried to get done—I do not know whether I have been right, but I think it is right according to the lights in which I have been working—is that a man shall not be paid except for the actual labour he has expended on the spoilt work and that he should not be charged for the spoilt material at all.

956. I am rather on the question of the cost of the materials which the employer supplies to the workmen. What have you treated as being covered by the word "cost"—merely the actual amount which the employer pays to the wholesale dealer from whom he buys the materials, or have you allowed items in addition, such as establishment expenses, the salary of the clerk who has control of the materials, and so forth?—I think one has practically limited it to the cost, but I do not know whether one was altogether justified in doing that. The cost of administration might be included in it.

957. Have employers ever raised that point with you?—No, I do not think I have had any case brought before me.

958. Is it any advantage in any case to the worker that he should have his materials supplied by the employer; does it ever happen where a man is treated fairly by his employer that he gets an advantage by getting the material cheaper and of better quality than he could get it outside?—He ought to get the best materials and the cheapest through the employer. I should conceive that it would be the object of the employer to give him the best things to work with.

959. In that way the worker might have an advantage?—Certainly.

960. In those standing charges in the Potteries which you gave us some instances of, have you taken up the point that they are covered in many cases by the provisions of Section 3 of the Act of 1896 as being things "done or provided by the employer with relation to the work"—such things as mess-room, cleaning, sweeping, washing overalls, and so on—have you been able to secure any modification of those charges under Section 3 of the Act of 1896?—We have secured in certain instances some abatement of the charges for sweeping, and only last week we managed to reduce the charge for washing overalls in one instance—not to abolish it, but to reduce it.

961. To bring it within reasonable limits?—Exactly. When I was here before I referred to Mrs. Tennant particularly as to whether 4d. was not a largish amount of money to pay for washing of an overall and a cap. Miss Anderson and I went down last week and we got the charge reduced at once in one place to 3d. So I shall take that standard of 3d. now, and require them all to reduce the charge to 3d., because I find it can be done. We shall work on those lines.

962. About the chain trade. Complaints have been made recently that truck still exists in the chain trade in the Midlands?—A long inquiry has been made by the staff at Wolverhampton and in the south Staffordshire district. Practically the truck business, the payment in articles instead of money, has practically ceased. There is no evidence of those statements made by a certain person with reference to the Black Country some three or four months ago. One or two cases still exist of near relatives of masters having public-houses, but so far we have not been able to trace the actual use of those public-houses in any disadvantageous way by the workpeople; although we have heard stories of such things, there is no one prepared to come forward with evidence. While I have been here, some years ago there was a case reported to us of a beer-house keeper giving the men their money in beer. On inquiry I found that there were four people employed by this beer-house keeper in a little shop; one of them was his own son, who was an adult; two of the others were teetotallers, and the fourth man never drank any beer in the governor's shop if he could possibly help it or at his expense. Things of that kind come up. I do not believe there are any cases of the supply of goods for money in the Black Country at the present moment. One case was mentioned in which it had been done, but the proprietor of the shop died about three months ago and the thing has lapsed. There are one or two instances which are being followed up of a supply of beer by people connected with the firm, but not actually the employer's workpeople. I think the substance of all that is in some reports which have been sent by Mr. Duffield to this office.

By Mr. Yarrow.

963. Can you express an opinion about this. Do you think it is wise in the interests of the industry of the country as a whole for Parliament to interfere with the freedom of action between employers and employed to the extent of regulating or interfering with or limiting the fines. Take it as a general question, do you think it is in the interests of the country for Parliament to do that ?—I think that is too general a question for me to answer.

964. It is a very important one ?—No doubt.

965. With regard to sick clubs, you would be of opinion of course that it is a wise thing to encourage thrift in the workmen ?—No doubt.

966. Do you not think that to make it compulsory to join a sick club is one means to encourage thrift ?—It is certainly advantageous in this way, that it makes such people as might be wasters more thrifty in consequence of having to belong to a club, and they do not live on charity; if they are forced to belong to a club they contribute to their support themselves. There are always wasters.

967. With regard to the notice being stuck up of fines and deductions; you stated that they were stuck up in some works and not in others, and that in those works where they were stuck up they were generally at the door of the office or some place like that ?—Yes, I presume they would be there.

968. In those places where they are not stuck up at all, when a man or woman applies for employment they are more or less in ignorance of what the conditions are, and even if it is exhibited in the time office, they will not see it till they have entered the yard or are in the act of entering. What is the objection to its being put up outside ?—Well, they would be pulled down every night, I should think, by boys and that sort of thing.

969. I think it might be put out of the reach of boys as far as that is concerned. We should have no difficulty in keeping notices up in our place, I am sure; but it does appear to me—I do not know whether I am right—that it is a very wise thing before anyone applies for a berth that he should have a very clear indication of the conditions that prevail in the factory, so that he may apply or not if he likes ?—It is a most admirable thing, I think, certainly, that they should know before they go in what the conditions are, but I do not know about these placards outside. I do not know how long the notices outside would last; that is the only thing.

Mr. J. A. Redgrave.

30 May 1906.

970. We do not find our windows broken, and I think the boys would be quite as fond of breaking windows as of pulling down notices. Now you told us about this shop in Swansea, where they had a number of fines and some of them appeared very hard. Why should not those fines be put up in some conspicuous place; why should they not be put up in the shop window ?—They ought to be put up in some conspicuous place, but I do not know that the shop window would be the best place for them.

971. Is it compulsory to put them up in some conspicuous place ?—Yes, if there is no written contract.

972. However, you will give us particulars of that ?—I expect that our inspector copied them from the original notices; but I will get you the actual particulars.

973. Do you think it would be a good thing for the general public to know something about these fines, because I imagine the public do not know anything about them; there is a rumour that girls in drapers' shops at the West-End of London are treated badly, but I think the general public do not know the real facts. You think it would be a good thing if the facts were made public ?—Yes; certainly.

974. Would there be any objection, as far as your experience goes, to these fines being exhibited at the works first ?—As far as exhibition inside the place is concerned ?

975. I do not mean inside, but why should not the notices be put outside so that the people could read them before they go in and apply for work ?—I do not know where you could put the notices.

976. You could put them in the shop window; would it not be a wise thing to do that ?—I do not know; that is quite a new idea.

977. That does not make it a bad one ?—Not at all but it rather tends to take one's breath away.

SEVENTH DAY.

Wednesday, 13th June, 1906.

PRESENT.

The Right Hon. Thomas Shaw, K.C., M.P., Lord Advocate for Scotland (Chairman)

E. A. Brotherton, Esq., M.P.
Frederick Cawley, Esq., M.P.
Malcolm Delevingne, Esq.
J. Ramsay Macdonald, Esq., M.P.
Frederick Maddison, Esq., M.P.
Mrs. H. J. Tennant.
A. F. Yarrow, Esq.

T. E. Bettany, Esq. (Secretary).

Mr. J. DODGSON, one of His Majesty's Inspectors of Factories, was called; and Examined.

By the Chairman.

978. You are, I understand, in charge of the Sheffield district ?—Yes. Before proceeding to give my evidence, may I say that the representatives of the workmen at Sheffield in their associations and trade unions desire that they may have an opportunity of being heard by this Committee before any change is made in their unwritten laws, and I have a similar request from the Employers' Association.

979. Will you kindly communicate to Mr. Bettany, Secretary of the Committee, the names of those whom we shall have to cite as representing those parties ?—I will do so.

13 June 1906.

980. Will you please tell us now what is the extent of your jurisdiction as inspector ?—I take the whole of South Yorkshire, striking across from the south of Goole, south of Pontefract, south of Wakefield, and halfway to Huddersfield from Sheffield.

981. How long have you been in your present position ?—For nearly three and a half years, but I had seven years' previous experience in Sheffield, so that I have had altogether about ten years' experience in the district.

13 June 1906.

982. What is the particular nature of your work in that district ?—The principal industry is the steel trade, heavy steel productions, after which come the cutlery trades and the electro-plate trades. The latter two are so much associated that we can scarcely separate them.

983. The cutlery and the electro-plate ?—Yes.

984. Now, with regard to your relations to the other officials in similar service, who is your immediate superior ?—Mr. Maitland.

985. Have you anybody under you ?—I have two juniors and an assistant.

986. Have you any particular rota in which you go through the district ?—We try to visit all the factories once in twelve months, but from the limited staff which I have that is impossible. Of course, some large places have such a large number of accidents that they have to be visited perhaps twelve times in a year.

987. So that in addition to the periodical visits, you have special visits ?—Yes, in cases of complaints and accidents.

988. I understand you are prepared to give us evidence especially with reference to the cutlery trade. Please do so in your own way, as I assume that you know exactly the object of this Committee's inquiries ?—Keeping first to the cutlery trade proper, I have noted three terms of letting shops and hulls, namely in (1) wheels solely subject to the owning occupier; (2) wheels partially subject to owning occupiers and (3) wheels wholly rented off.

989. You must take us as laymen who do not understand anything about these terms, and you must please interpret them to us ?—The term "wheel" is the ordinary name for a Sheffield cutlery factory. A wheel is an aggregation of tenements which may be to a certain extent under the control of some person as owner, or which may be wholly and separately independent. "Wheel" is the name of a factory in the Sheffield cutlery trade. They are generally divided into cutlers' shops and grinding hull's, the latter being a place wholly devoted to the grinding of cutlery in some form or another. I ought to explain that the cutler and grinder in Sheffield is a man who considers himself entirely independent of any person employing him, no matter what may be the relationship between them. A man is his own master in the sense at least that he claims the privilege of coming to work and going away again exactly as suits his convenience. Now in order that a man may be enabled to do this, it may be assumed that he is largely employed on piece work, and that is done under a system which is the growth of possibly 200 or 300 years. Whilst H. or any prominent manufacturers in Sheffield, may call a factory their own, and although the people there may be solely employed by them, they are not under control in this respect, that they can come and go exactly as they like. Certain firms like H. or I. employ usually the whole of the people on their premises. They have warehouses from which the material is given out for manufacture and the men take it to one of the tenements where the engine power is controlled by the employers' engine-tender. These workmen pay so much for the use of a grinding hull or trough. They have to pay so much rent for the trough, or in the case of cutlers so much in what is known as side rent, which really means an amount of space about the vice large enough to enable a man to work. It is generally represented, or was originally represented, by the length of the arm on each side from the elbow to the tip of the finger, but rather more space is now provided for them, where there are perhaps fifty men paying rent in a shop. The space may now represent anything from 2 yards to 4 or 5 yards. In addition to the vices there is at the end of the room a short shaft, anywhere from 2 to 4 yards long, at the top of which are ranged glazers, dolly-mops and buffs. The men own their own tools, their own emery wheels and their own buffs, which are strips of calico used in polishing the knives or the other materials which are under process of manufacture. The workmen pay anywhere from 1s. to 1s. 6d. in a private wheel for the privilege of using the machine power, and they will probably use that power about one-tenth of the time they are in the cutlery shop.

By Mr. Cawley.

990. Do you mean 1s. to 1s. 6d. per week ?—Yes.

By the Chairman.

991. Have you now described the case of the wheels belonging solely to the occupiers ?—Yes. These form the best type of factories, which are kept going by one firm. H., for instance, will not allow the work of any one else to come into their factories in addition to the work which they give out.

992. Before you go from that type, let us be quite clear about it. In that case, the building belongs to "A" the employer ?—Yes.

993. The power belongs to "A" the employer ?—Yes.

994. And the standing room, which is of course part of the building, belongs to "A" the employer ?—Yes.

995. Then "B" the workman, supplies his labour and supplies his own tools ?—Yes.

996. "B" is paid by piecework ?—Yes.

997. And is the nett wage struck by deducting from the amount earned in piece-work the charges for the accommodation and power ?—That represents it entirely. There is another point, viz., with regard to the varying number of articles to the nominal dozen. For instance, in the case of razor-making they are fourteen to the dozen and there is a set price. In the case of scissors they are fourteen to the dozen, spring-knives fourteen to the dozen, table-knives, twelve to the dozen, electro-plate generally twelve to the dozen, and in files thirteen are allowed to the dozen. Scales are bought at the rate of thirteen to the dozen.

998. Who buys these ?—The person who gives out the work to the cutler. I have found cases of fifteen to the dozen. That was, I believe, in the edge tool trade. I may say that the custom is not the same throughout the whole trade. In some places they give a certain price per dozen and receive the fourteen articles in exchange, but in other cases so much is paid per dozen and so much for the extra ones.

999. Does it occur to you that there is any doubt in the mind of both parties, or of either party, as to the terms and conditions; do they each know whether a dozen is to be reckoned as twelve or as a baker's dozen, or as fourteen, and if so there is no point in that, so far as I can see ?—No, there is no complaint received in connection with it in the cutlery trade or any representation that men consider themselves to be treated unjustly.

1000. Is this system the result of a growth of years ?—It is.

1001. I think you may now pass on to the second category; namely, wheels partially subject to owning occupier ?—In that case the owner has perhaps half the hands in the factory who pay rent for their sides or troughs and receive nearly the whole of their work from the owner of the wheel, but when that firm is not busy the workmen are at liberty to take work from any employer in the town.

1002. The work is done in "X" factory, although it is "Y" who has employed the workmen ?—Yes, that is so. There is one other little point I should like to mention. In some of these, such as the razor trade and the spring knife trade, and also the table cutlery trade, the cutler as a rule finds all material, such as wire, resin, and lead plugs, which become part of the manufactured article. The lead balances the handles.

1003. Is the cutler the workman ?—Yes.

1004. Does the workman buy the wire and lead plugs, etc., from his employer, or wherever he likes ?—Wherever he likes.

1005. He is independent in that respect ?—Yes.

1006. You might now give us a general description of the third category, namely "wheels" wholly rented off ?—These are the bane of Sheffield life, I wish we could mend them or end them. Every broken-down cutler sets up in them on his own account, and gets work from any master who will give him it to do. The worker works on his own account as a master in every sense of the word, but he is simply an under contractor subject to wretched conditions often.

1007. In what respect are the conditions wretched ?—In the other factories there is generally someone who is responsible for the tenements, and to whom we can turn in asking for any remedial measures such as cleansing, etc. But in the case of a public "wheel" we have so many occupiers working independently of one another that we cannot get the same attention.

1008. Although you call it a public "wheel," I suppose it belongs to somebody ?—Yes, as a rule it belongs to a limited company, or it may sometimes be held by trustees. In such cases it is difficult to find owners with whom we can deal direct and straight. There is another point of difference. Whilst a man may have to pay from a shilling to 1s. 6d. for working room in a private "wheel," he will have to pay at least 2s. in a public "wheel," or 3s. in the case of light grinding. The amount may rise to 5s., 6s. or even 7s. Indeed, I have known as much as 9s. 6d. paid as trough rent. (Witness here produced photographic representations of grinding "wheels.")

By the Chairman.

1009. I have some difficulty as to whether this evidence of Mr. Dodgson's comes within the range of the reference to this Committee. This is not a case of our endeavouring to adjust the relations of employers with workmen. The workman knows exactly what is to be his nett wage, and I doubt whether all this comes exactly within our limit.

By Mrs. Tennant.

1010. No doubt there are many varieties in the cutlery trade in Sheffield ?—Yes, scores of them, such as adzes, forks, knives, scythes, etc.

By the Chairman.

1011. What we want to get at is not so much the system of independent contracting as the system which rules the relation between the wage earner and the wage payer. Do you follow me ?—I do.

1012. So as to see whether there are any illegitimate deductions or fines, and to see whether there is any system of truck. Could you confine your evidence particularly to that ?—In that case I should have to put aside evidence with regard to most of the Sheffield cutlery trades. The cutlery trade is divided into nearly fifty different sections, and the present conditions have arisen during the experience of a long series of years. When steam power was introduced owners made some special charge or deduction for the use of their premises and power. The workmen do not consider themselves treated unfairly but they accept the ordinary terms, although the terms are not exactly the same at every place. No doubt both masters and men might welcome some means of adjusting their wages so that there should not be so many variations and deductions to calculate with regard to each of the various trades. There are very few cases in which I can say that a hardship was inflicted by the arbitrary disposition of the masters against the men. They have their trade rules and they abide by them.

1013. Are these trades pretty well organised ?—Yes, very much organised.

By Mr. Cawley.

1014. May I confirm the suggestion of the Chairman that if the men thoroughly understand the nature of the arrangement, and no question of truck comes in, we need scarcely extend our inquiry in that direction ?—Then I should have to put the cutlery trade altogether on one side. It is unique in every sense of the word ; you cannot find any trade like it, but how you are to alter the conditions I hardly know. It is purely a matter of contract between the employer and the workmen.

By the Chairman.

1015. You have explained to us about the side rent and the compulsory payment of the rent, which seems, after all, to be simply a speculation entered into by both parties ?—That is so.

1016. Then you have explained to us the variation in the number of articles to the nominal dozen, but that is a matter of plain contract between the parties ?—Yes.

1017. Is there anything you wish to explain with regard to what you describe as "trade list price, variable under system of discounts" ?—Nothing, except that when the trade is busy the discount varies. It may be 5 per cent. over and above what the workmen pay for their troughs or side rent, but that varies according to the local state of trade.

1018. You have told us that as a rule the grinder and cutler provides his own tools ?—Yes.

1019. But suppose he does not ?—In that case there might be deducted to the extent of 40 per cent. on the wages, I have known deductions for the use of tools. Some masters provide the various implements and charge a discount which may range from 5 per cent to 33½ per cent. What is deducted as a rule for the tools where they do not belong to the workman is from 3d. to 4d. in the shilling.

1020. Is it in such cases possible for a man to vary the position by bringing in his own tools ?—In some cases yes, and in other cases no.

1021. Where he takes the tools supplied to him must he take them at the rate that is fixed ?—Yes.

1022. Have you made any investigation in order to see whether that rate is fair and reasonable ?—It would be difficult to determine that or to calculate the exact extent of the use made of the power and tools.

1023. Have there been any complaints ?—Never, but it is sometimes felt as a grievance that there should compulsory payment of rent whether sufficient material be given out for a week's work or not. One firm is commencing a different system by allowing a discount when it does not provide full work.

1024. That complaint is more of the nature of complaint of bad trade, is it not ?—Yes.

By Mrs. Tennant.

1025. The grievance is that of paying rent in respect of accommodation which is of no use to them ?—Yes, I know of one firm, and it is the first to my knowledge in the spring-knife trade, which allows 10 per cent. reduction from the rent until the workmen are able to earn 30s. per week. I know of only one such case in the whole trade, and that only came into vogue about a month ago.

By the Chairman.

1026. Confining yourself now to cases of "wheels" or factories solely subject to the owning occupier, do you represent that there is any complaint falling within the cognisance of this Committee ?—I do not.

1027. Do you think that that is because both parties thoroughly know beforehand the terms of the bargain ?—Yes ; thoroughly.

1028. And the workmen are well organised ?—I do not know any better organised. There are about twenty trade unions in the various branches of one trade.

1029. The second case is wheels which are partially subject to the owning occupier ?—You can say the same with regard to those ; they simply have one privilege which is not accorded to the other of taking work in so as to make up the full amount of the week's work when the occupier himself cannot give them sufficient to keep them going for the week.

1030. The real grievance arises on the third case, I understand, that is to say, where the wheels are wholly rented off ?—Yes ; I cannot say that there is any question arising there, because each man makes his own bargain with the master of some other place in town.

1031. Still I gather from you that your own desire would be this. You think that the lot of the workman would be improved if that system was not so general ?—I think so, and yet I cannot make any suggestion as to how to alter it so as to make it better for the workman.

1032. In this third case the men are really the most independent, as I gather from you ?—That is so.

1033. Do you think that in that case they earn less on the whole ?—On the whole, yes.

1034. Probably that largely arises from their own habits to begin with ?—That is so. You generally find men who work in these public wheels have been in pretty nearly every place in Sheffield before they went there, where there has been no responsible authority at the head of the concern.

1035. In all these cases I understand the deductions are of this kind. Is there a fixed rent for power ?—Yes.

1036. And that fixed rent for power includes place room ?—Yes.

1037. Then there is a deduction for tool money if tools are supplied ?—Yes.

1038. There is nothing else, is there ?—No.

1039. Is there any charge for light ?—In some cases there is a charge for light, and in others there is not, but we come to a different class of tenement when we get to that. I will give you one or two instances. It is easier for me to mention names. Take H. for instance; they employ a very large number of blade forgers; they make no charge at all for persons forging in their premises. The men are at liberty to go and fetch whatever coke they require from the stores and forge their implements with the accessories provided by Messrs. Rodgers.

13 June 1906.

By Mr. Maddison.

1040. They pay no rent?—They pay nothing. In one or two other works unfortunately they do. They pay as much as 4d. per week for standing room perhaps, and 3d. a week for coke or coal that is necessary, and perhaps 6d. a week for light. It is so variable that I can only try to give you a sort of general idea.

1041. But I want to be clear as to whether the next instances you are now going to give us relate to firms similar to H. ?—I am speaking of one firm which to all intents and purposes perhaps is as great a competitor to H. as anybody.

By the Chairman.

1042. Could you give us any of the documents showing these deductions ?—That I cannot do, because there is no expressed rate, and it varies very much with the premises.

1043. I should like to get on the notes some idea of the charges ?—Take another firm, K. who are perhaps the second producers in Sheffield. In the case of their forgers a day's work is fixed at so much, and they have to do so many blades or so many implements to constitute a day's work. That is rather different to the usual system. That is in the case of forgers if they work outside for others as well as the firm; that is if they are employed by several firms; they have to pay 6d. to 2s. rent for tool and hearth money; that includes everything, lighting and so on. If a man works partially for them and partially for others they are charged 6d. to 2s. for the hearth on which they do their forging.

By Mr. Maddison.

1044. Are those men on the task work system ?—That is what is laid down here.

1045. When they are working for employers like that ?—Yes.

By the Chairman.

1046. What I want to get at is this; are there cases in that trade which have come before you in which there are fines or deductions from wages ?—Scarcely any at all.

1047. The only deductions are those that you have just mentioned ?—That is so; that is in those trades.

1048. Now in regard to those that you have just mentioned. Are you able to say whether those deductions can be checked in any way ?—I am afraid not.

By the Chairman.

1049. I do not see my way to ask any further questions about the cutlery trade from this witness.

By Mr. Maddison.

1050. There is one thing that is troubling some of us; are these people workmen ?

By the Chairman.

1051. That is just the point. My own opinion after this evidence is that these are independent contractors.

By Mr. Delevingne.

1052. Can you say whether or no in a case like H., the man contracts to work for H.; is he under a contract to work for H. ?—In the case of H. that would be so, but in their case with regard to forgers they had not a man who pays anything at all in the way of deductions.

1053. Are they under contract with the occupier of the factory for that work ?—I always imagine that they are left at liberty. In the case of H. I may say at once that they have their own material on the premises.

1054. Then they are simply workers, and if they are workers the Truck Act applies ?—Yes. They have no charges against those men in that case, but in the case of other people who work out there are some who pay a fixed charge for their hearth and for lighting and for coke.

1055. Is there a notice under the Truck Act posted up in those cases ?—In the majority of those cases I would point out those men are at liberty to bring work into the place for other people and to contract for somebody else besides the original master. I wish you to understand that in the cutlery trade every man regards himself not as an employee, but as a master on his own account. In some trades there has arisen this question of charging something for light, because men come at any hour they please practically. If the men would come at eight o'clock in the morning, say, and do a reasonable day's work, the question of light would not arise, but some of them come at noon and leave at midnight; then naturally there must be a charge for the use of light when it is unnecessary.

By Mrs. Tennant.

1056. The charge for light is not made only in respect of hours which would be outside the ordinary hours ?—No. When we get to the electro-plate trade I shall have something more to say about that. In the scissors trade it is almost universal to charge for light. The charge varies from 2d. to 6d., which I consider wrong.

1057. The man who comes within the hours which may suit himself, but still are the authorised factory hours, is charged for light just as much as the man who does not ?—Precisely. The system varies in different places, but when they have a system fixed for one place, then whether they use the light or not they pay the charge for it.

1058. In the first system which you describe, where the wheel is a place in which only the occupier's own workmen work, you told us that no other work is brought in there ?—That is so.

1059. Then the workman there may happen to be independent and come at his own time; but still he is a workman—he is employed ?—He is employed, but still he does not consider himself under the control of his employer.

1060. Are truck notices put up in those places ?—In some cases yes, in other cases, no. Of course in cutlery establishments there has to be a certain amount of fining which is always going on to maintain discipline in the establishment. I have a number of those rules with me—not specially for cutlery establishments, but in most of the places I should say it is recognised now except where it comes in as part of the trade terms.

By the Chairman.

1061. Has the Home Office no policy with regard to these establishments of compelling truck notices to be put up ?—Yes.

1062. Then they are all there ?—Yes.

1063. The truck notices are exhibited ?—Yes, but amongst them we do not have these old trade customs which have gone on so long and which are so well understood between the men and the master. For instance, we have nothing put up about the man paying so much for a hull, so much for a trough, and so much for side rent

1064. It has been elicited from you by Mrs. Tennant that there are what you call disciplinary fines; that is the point we are wanting to get at. Can you give us any samples of that ?—I cannot give you any samples of neglect of the ordinary truck notices.

1065. But what kind of discipline is there a fine imposed for ?—There are a large number of places in which the men are subject to deductions and there there are notices, but in other places there are customs and arrangements between the firm and the employees. The fines I should say are very trifling so far as these places are concerned.

1066. That is quite true, but that is a matter of opinion. What we want is to know how the fact stands. In the first place, what are the things for which fines are imposed, and in the second place, how much for each thing; that is what we want to get at ?—They vary a great deal. I cannot give you one as a sample which will fairly apply to the rest; but at the same time we insist upon Truck Act notices.

By Mrs. Tennant.

1067. In these places you have an abstract put up?—Undoubtedly.

1068. That in itself implies employment?—Under the Act there is a notice put up at the entrance to the place for the general guidance of the people, but there is no one there representing the firm to see that the Factory Acts are carried out on the premises, with the exception of these places of the first type—wheels solely subject to the owning occupier.

1069. In the second type you have got an owning occupier and a person who is doing work for him. The custom of the trade allows that man to take in other work from other people?—Yes.

1070. But from two o'clock to six o'clock in the day he may be doing work for the owning occupier?—Yes.

1071. Surely he is his workman, even though the custom of the trade allows him to take in work for someone else?—Undoubtedly he is partially the workman; the owner has the first privilege of getting the work done by this man.

1072. Therefore would not you say that the fact that he took in work from somebody else does not remove from the owning occupier the obligation to observe the Truck Acts?—It would be rather difficult to say. While he may be working for one employer during part of the day, he may be working for four or five other people during the rest of the day.

1073. I understood you to say that in one firm some attempt had been made to arrange for a discount in respect of occupation which was of no service to the man because no work was being given him?—We reckon every hull and every cutler's shop as being a separate factory to itself; with the exception of those few clauses which are put in containing the provisions of the Factory Act, we consider them as separate individual factories.

1074. On what lines exactly have you gone in requiring truck notices, accepting them in some cases and not requiring them in others?—In every case where we found that there had been any deduction with regard to light we have insisted upon notices being displayed; in every case where we have found that there have been deductions for materials supplied we have had notices put up in each individual case. We have done that, no matter whether they were tenements or ordinary factories.

1075. For standing room or for any accommodation of that kind you do not require any contract?—No. We do now in the case of persons who pay money for the use of a vice. Where money is deducted from wages for the use of materials we have in every case truck notices displayed.

1076. In some trades the workmen would very much prefer not to have charges for rent and not to have charges for light. Would you say that in Sheffield the workmen prefer to have those charges and to have their wages so calculated?—With regard to light, I think there is an offence created in many cases in Sheffield. My own feeling is in regard to the charge for light that it is one of those things that should be taken notice of and should be in some way adjusted, so that it shall not appear under that particular item. I am convinced that there is a hardship created in it and I believe that in many instances it is an unjust charge. I have recently received complaints of three works in which deductions of this kind were made, which prima facie range from 200 to 2,000 per cent. above the cost to the employer.

1077. What action did you take upon that?—I may say that those particular cases only came to my notice just as I left to attend this inquiry. I am leaving them to be dealt with when I get back. The case of 2,000 per cent. is a case of button manufacturers.

By the Chairman.

1078. Have you reported that to headquarters?—No.

*1079. I suppose you will do so?—I shall do so, most decidedly, if the allegations are proved.

By Mrs. Tennant.

1080. Now, considering it not as a matter of offence necessarily against the Truck Act, but as a matter of opinion, can you say that the workmen in Sheffield would prefer the system of having these charges made and having their wages so calculated?—This is the statement that was made to me by one of the trade union representatives: "Of ourselves we would do nothing; it would be impossible for us to come to any better terms with our employers than we have at the present time; but in regard to that particular matter we should like to appear before the Committee and see whether such a thing should not be adjusted by law, and then there would not be much difficulty with regard to it."

By Mr. Ramsay Macdonald.

1081. I suppose we may take it that there have been no prosecutions under the Truck Act so far as you are concerned?—I have had prosecutions under the Truck Acts.

1082. In the cutlery trades?—No: these were cases of fining boys to force them to work at illegal hours.

1083. I was referring particularly to the cutlery trade?—No, not in the cutlery trade. It would be difficult to get a case showing hardship and to get the Stipendiary in Sheffield at any rate to recognise the evil.

1084. With reference to the first kind of wheels—I think you instanced the factory of H., an abstract of the Factory Act is shown there?—Yes.

1085. And the Truck Act notice?—The Truck Act notice is shown in all parts where, apart from side rents and trough rents, any deductions are made.

1086. But you say there is no document affecting the contract for standing room there?—No.

1087. How is the deduction made from the wages?—That is a trade question that we have not taken any account of, because these men are regarded as individual contractors.

1088. Do you draw a distinction between a trade custom and a deduction if the wages are actually reduced in consequence of the deduction?—In Sheffield it has been recognised as a reasonable thing. The wages subject to the usual deductions constitute a trade custom accepted by both parties, and we have not interfered in the absence of complaint or clear injustice.

1089. In what form then are wages paid to workers working in the first class of wheels; is the gross sum calculated, and then the net wage made out?—That is so.

1090. The gross sum is reckoned first of all, and then the details of deductions are made and taken off the gross?—Yes.

1091. And the net is paid over to the workman?—That is right.

1092. And yet you do not think that that is a case of truck?—I do think it is a case of truck, but, as I have already said, it is a method of arriving at wages sanctioned by the usage of years and concurred in by both parties and in the absence of complaint or manifest injustice we have not felt called upon to interfere.

1093. Now, have you ever made any attempt to discover whether the rents charged are fair and reasonable?—So far I have never made the calculation, but as they are accepted by the trade unions, I regard them as fair and reasonable and that we could not hope to convince a magistrate that they were otherwise.

1094. The payment for light has also been accepted by the trade unions as fair and reasonable, and yet you have just discovered that there is an excess charge of 200 to 2,000 per cent.?—The question of charges for light hardly arises in the cutlery trade. The cases to which you are referring occurred in a button factory and are now being investigated. I do not know that these workers have any trade union.

1095. Finally, are there any deductions for spoilt material?—There are not. The only thing required is this, that the operative, if the matter has been the result of his bad manipulation of material, simply has the material given to him again just to make that loss good.

* Mr. Dodgson subsequently wrote the Secretary as follows with regard to this:—

"Later investigation proved—

(a) The firm (a small concern) had become defunct about the time I gave evidence.

(b) My colleague had been misinformed. The charges for gas had ceased some years ago. Out of a large number of employees only eight persons (engaged in a special process) were subject to a deduction, for which proper provision had been made by Truck notices.

(c) Included tools as well as gas—which reduces the charge to proper limit."

Mr. J. Dodgson.

13 June 1906.

1096. He simply loses the time?—He simply loses the time.

1097. He is not charged for the loss of the materials?—No, never.

By Mr. Brotherton.

1098. With regard to damaged goods, I take it that if say a knife should be damaged, and it is not approved by the employer, the workman will be consulted as to whether it is to be discarded as bad work?—Yes.

1099. It will not rest entirely with the employer as to whether the work is finished properly or improperly?—Yes. I never heard of a technical deduction being made on that account. The only thing the cutler is required to do is simply to take out a fresh supply. Suppose there is such a case with a table knife; he will take out fresh materials for a knife and put them together again without suffering any deduction. In the first instance, this figure of 14 which was put down for a dozen was to admit of spoils and damaged ones, but I understand that these men are so expert, and the material that is given to them is so good as a rule, that probably they do not get a spoil out of a gross, and then there is no charge against them.

1100. Then deductions for bad workmanship is a very minor point?—Yes.

1101. With regard to light, you mentioned one place, a button factory I think you said, where there was an excessive charge of 200 to 2,000 per cent.?—Yes.

By the Chairman.

1102. That is not in the cutlery trade?—No.

By Mr. Brotherton.

1103. But I would like to ask, have the button workers a Union?—I do not think they have.

1104. If they had a Union, possibly a more reasonable rate of charge would be fixed?—That is quite possible. The button industry in Sheffield is a very slight one; there are not more than half a dozen factories I should think in all. That is a matter I shall go into directly I get back to Sheffield; that is one of the cases I have noted to deal with.

1105. I am not quite clear whether you would call these charges "deductions" or simply "charges." In some cases they are simply charges for facilities to enable a man to do more work and therefore you might term them "charges" rather than "deductions"?—There happen to be both. In a number of places they make this distinction between summer and winter; during the summer they do not charge at all; from October to March they make a charge; I will take the handle finishers in the electro-plate trade, they are charged 4d. or 6d. per week in the winter months. In cases where there is a charge all the year round, they have one charge in the winter and summer alike, 2d. a week.

1106. Have you told us to what these charges refer?—They are put down as light.

1107. But I was referring more particularly to charges that might be made for power. Would you term those "charges" or "deductions"?—I should term them "charges"—charges levied by deductions from wages.

1108. (Mr. Cawley.) As far as I understand, the only case where there can possibly be any misunderstanding between the employers and employed as to the amount of a deduction is on the question of light?—I have not entered into that; we shall get into that when we come to the electro-plating trade. There are one or two circumstances connected with that that I want to dwell upon, and one of them is particularly in regard to the deductions for light as well as the deduction for material.

1109. I am speaking now of the three kinds of wheels. The men that work at these wheels have no grievance whatever and there can be no possibility of any misunderstanding in any case at all except on the question of light?—They know precisely what they are doing. There is no hardship arises out of the Sheffield custom; that is the way I would put it.

1110. There cannot possibly be any misunderstanding in any shape or form except on the question of light?—None whatever.

1111. Does the question of light come in in all the three kinds of wheels?—The question of light only comes in in the cutlery trade in the case of outside cutlery manufacturers, such as the manufacturer of scissors. In the scissors manufacture (which we do not see much of in the wheels) I think charges for light ought to be stopped.

1112. I am speaking of these three kinds of wheels it does not happen in the first kind of wheel, does it?—No.

1113. There is no charge for it?—No.

1114. In the second kind of wheels does it happen at all?—No.

1115. Although some of the men may be working in a wheel owned by one man, and they may be working for another man yet, they are not charged for light?—No.

1116. Then the third kind of wheel is a public wheel where any man can work and a stated sum. Are they charged for light there?—There is no charge from the original proprietor of the place, but the individual occupier may employ girls say in the cutlery trade doing burnishing and polishing and filing of scissors; they will be charged anywhere from 2d. to 6d. for gaslight, or gaslight plus tools.

1117. That is in the public wheel?—Yes. Wherever scissors are manufactured you will find that particular thing.

1118. Are scissors manufactured in all wheels?—No, it is considered a trade to itself.

1119. Scissors are not manufactured in that other kind of wheel H. for instance?—The possibility is that we could find in a semi-public wheel some person making scissors and such a man would deduct 4d. and 6d. for the particular objects that I am speaking of in the scissors trade.

1120. Do I understand that in these public wheels there are different kinds of trades going on—one grinding razors, another doing scissors, and that the one that is doing scissors is charged for light and the one who is grinding razors is not charged for light?—Take a case where you have scissor-making going on in two or three rooms in one tenement; they pay so much for power; the girls who work for them will probably have 4d. or 6d. deducted for light and for manipulating the scissors. Notices are affixed but I consider that an unjust charge, and I think it ought not to continue.

1121. Then there are sub-tenants in these wheels?—Every tenement is supposed to be let to somebody who becomes, in the first instance, the reliable person for that particular shop.

1122. Some of these people charge for light and some do not! Yes? In the scissors trade they do invariably charge, I do not know why, but they do.

By Mr. Maddison.

1123. I do not want to pursue this public wheel business any further except to ask this; as I understand it in these public wheels there will be one man who is really the landlord of the place and he will let it off to various people who work there, and the principal landlord does not give any work out at all?—None whatever.

1124. He may not be a cutler at all?—No. Possibly he lives far away from Sheffield.

1125. And therefore there will be various methods of deductions etc., going on in one public wheel?—Yes. In a public wheel you may have a scissors manufacturer, a fluter, an ivory worker, a spring knife cutler, a heavy grinder, a light grinder, a file manufacturer and so on; you may have fifty different trades going on all at one time in one particular wheel, but in that particular case with the exception of the regulations which are placed upon the original owner of the premises by Section 87, 88, 89 and a Schedule (what are known as the tenement conditions) each man is the landlord of his own place and responsible to nobody except the people who employ him outside. One man may employ a number of other persons, as scissors manufacturers do.

1126. What have you done about it?—I can do nothing about it except to insist that these notices with regard to the Truck Act shall be suspended in that place 1127. But you have told us you consider the charge excessive, and therefore it is a deduction ?—It is a deduction.

1128. And you think it ought to be an illegal deduction because it is excessive ?—Yes.

1129. Now one or two questions about H. You have made it plain that this firm charge no standing room, no vice room, nothing for the vice, nothing for gas ?—No.

1130. And that their men are compelled to work for that firm alone ?—That is so.

1131. But they are still at liberty, I gather, to go in practically when they like ?—Yes.

1132. In effect, what happens at H. as to the time the men go in ?—They will go in at any hour. Many of them will not work at all on Monday; on the Tuesday they may go in about 11 and leave about 5.

1133. Can you give us a similar firm to H. First of all, is there another firm besides H. that you can compare it with ?—Yes, take L.

1134. They do precisely the same thing.—Precisely the same thing.

1135. That is to say they charge nothing for standing ?—Except what is known as side rent, which includes the use of that little machine-power that I am speaking of.

1136. And H. charge that ?—Yes.

1137. That is the only thing that H. charge ?—That is the only thing until it comes to the electro-plating works, but I want to speak about that afterwards.

1138. Take say a blade forger, I want to get at what his deductions are. He gets his material from the warehouse ?—Yes.

1139. Is there any check upon knowing whether that man is paying the proper price for that material ?—Only the same check which falls upon any day labourer or any piece worker, that is all.

1140. But he is constantly using material all his working years and the price of material fluctuates a good deal. Has any case come under your observation where employers have kept up a high price of material when the market has fallen very much ?—You are asking a question now that goes more into the trade itself; that I do not know. The forgers at H. labour under particularly favourable circumstances I should say.

1141. Am I right in assuming that he does pay for material ?—No, in the case of H. he does not.

1142. He does not pay for material at all ?—No.

1143. Therefore it cannot be a deduction ?—No.

1144. Then he gets his material from the warehouse and makes it into a blade and he gets paid so much per dozen, is that it ?—Yes.

1145. So that up to this point there is no deduction made at all ?—None at all.

1146. But there is a charge, as you would call it, for side rent ?—Not to a forger.

1147. But there is with regard to some of them ?—Yes

1148. Does that practically remain the same or does it fluctuate ?—It does not fluctuate at all, but the price given fluctuates, for instance they say, "We will give you so much per dozen with 5 per cent. off," and the workman agrees to that.

1149. Mrs. Tennant elicited from you that there were disciplinary fines ?—Yes.

1150. I was anxious to have a sample of those fines. Can you give us an illustration ?—I never heard of one in a tenement factory.

1151. Take the first class of factory, take—for instance ?—I never heard of one in—.

1152. You never heard of a fine being enforced ?—Never.

1153. Then your general evidence is that fines are very rare ?—They are exceedingly rare in the cutlery trade.

1154. That deductions for light are not frequent ?—They are not frequent in factories except those already specified.

By Mr. Delevingne.

1155. Are all those three classes of wheels treated as tenement factories for the purposes of the Factory Act ?—They are all treated as tenement factories.

1156. Including the first case ?—Yes.

1157. For the purposes of the Factory Act it is not H. who is treated as the occupier, but the tenant of the particular tenement ?—Yes! H. in a sense are model occupiers; but even they say, "We are not responsible for our grinders."

1158. In all those three cases the responsible person under the Factory Act to whom the inspector looks is not the owner of the factory, but the individual tenant ?—The individual tenant of a tenement; there may be thirty tenants in a particular tenement, but we should regard that as one factory.

1159. You mean he may sub-let ?—Oh no. A tenement may employ as many as two persons or as many as fifty; each man out of the fifty—whether it is fifty men or two men—will pay 1s. or 1s. 2d. a week side rent.

1160. Is there a middleman that comes between the tenant and H. ?—Not at all. Occasionally some of the men that I am speaking of will employ a man under them, and in that case, instead of paying 1s. for the side rent, they would probably have to pay 2s.

1161. Then what is the tenant ?—One man is a datal man, the other is a pieceworker. The latter is the tenant or occupier.

1162. But what is the unit which is recognised by the Factory Act ? You say H. are not the occupiers ?—Every individual room where grinding or cutlery is carried on.

1163. Every individual room is a tenement ?—Exactly.

1164. Is there anything less than a room which would be recognised as a tenement, or is the room the unit ?—For purposes of departmental records the room is the unit in tenement factories, even if occupied by fifty occupiers. That has been our great difficulty in Sheffield.

1165. To whom do you look as the occupier in each case; do you look to the person who pays the side rent ?—Yes, but fortunately there are certain tenement regulations which make the owner of the premises responsible for the place in respect of the fencing of shafting, and mill gearing, and in respect of keeping the place clean and so on; as to all those matters the cutler perfectly understands which part of the Act he is to carry out, and the owner understands which part of the Act he is to carry out. Those grinding conditions only apply really to Sheffield. We have about 150 of these places in Sheffield in which this question of owner and tenant is affected by that particular tenement schedule.

1166. Does each person who pays side rent pay it direct to the firm H. ?—Yes.

1167. He is the immediate tenant of H. ?—Yes.

1168. Every person who pays side rent is the immediate tenant of H. ?—Yes.

1169. Do you look upon each person who pays side rent as the occupier of the tenement ?—Yes.

1170. You say that the occupier of the tenement employs datal hands and pays for gas, and you say that some of the deductions are unreasonable. Have you ever recommended any prosecution ?—I never have.

1171. May I ask why not ?—Because the occupiers have complied on their attention being directed to the irregularities. I have had to prosecute under the Truck Acts in other trades, but I do not know of a single case where there has been a prosecution under those recognised trade systems.

1172. You say that some of these tenement occupiers employ datal hands—girls ?—Yes.

1173. Then you say there are deducted from the wages of those girls certain amounts for gas, and those you consider unreasonable ?—I do.

1174. The Truck Act of 1896 says that the deductions must be "fair and reasonable" ?—Yes.

1175. Then that is a breach of the Truck Acts ?—There is the difficulty of ascertaining that they have used as much gas in twelve months as they are charged for. All these places are fed from one common meter.

1176. Still you do recognise the fact that if the charges are unreasonable that is a breach of the Act of 1896, and if you were to establish that fact you ought to get a conviction ?—I ought to.

Mr. J. Dodgson.

13 June 1906.

1177. You have not tried to get one so far ?—I have not had occasion to do so for the reason already stated.

By Mr. Yarrow.

1178. You have not had many complaints of injustice, have you ?—In regard to these matters I receive very few complaints indeed; they come to me only in respect of places that practically do not come under the Factory Acts at all.

1179. Then you practically have not instituted any action against employers ?—Not in respect of their trade systems.

1180. With regard to the charge, for light, I suppose anybody seeking a job knows that the wages they are to have are determined to some extent by that, so that if a lower charge were made for light that would mean their having lower wages ?—I suppose so.

1181. So that although the charge for light may be excessive, still the men have allowed for that excessive charge in the wages that they ask for ?—I suppose that is so.

1182. So that if the charge for light (I am not justifying it) were more moderate, or was not a charge at all they would get less wages ?—Precisely.

1183. If that is the case the matter is practically of very little importance ?—Yes, looking at it from that point of view.

1184. I mean the balance that they get is practically the same ?—That is so.

By The Chairman.

1185. I would like to ask you a question or two before we part from the cutlery trade. You have told us about a definite charge of, say, 2d. a week for light all the year round. Are some of these workers workers who happen to be employed only during the summer months ?—They are generally employed the year round, but the busy time in those trades falls at the latter part of the year; they begin to be busy as a rule about September, and continue so until about the end of the year.

1186. But whether it be a three months' employment or a six months' employment the charge of 2d. is an average charge ?—That is so.

1187. At whatever season of the year ?—Yes. I am referring now to the girls; probably in the case of the men it gets up to 6d. a week or 9d.

1188. Now would you give us your evidence; we do not need to go into it at great length. With regard to the silver and electro-plating trade, I believe the conditions vary very much ?—They vary a great deal.

1189. Are silversmiths generally quite free from any charges ?—At the present time they are free from all charges. When I first went to Sheffield they had to pay 6d. a week for light and standing room; that is all done away with.

1190. Then you talk about "buffers working in teams." Let me ask you what is a "buffer" ?—This picture will enable me to explain to you (producing a photograph). Here you see the buffers at work. After the silversmith has formed the material, the buffers polish it over a rapidly revolving disc made of rhinoceros hide or thick leather with finely ground sand and oil. These girls in many cases are charged 3d. a week for the sand and the oil which is given them to help to polish that material before it goes to the electro-plater.

1191. Are the buffers the people who do that polishing ?—That is so.

1192. They work in teams ?—No. I will give you this one explanation of the difference between an electro-plating works and a wheel. An electro-plating works in Sheffield is an individual place of business, and we have no recognised tenants upon those premises; they may be in parts tenants of a public wheel, but in an electro-plating works we have no tenants and nothing of the system of charges for tools and so on except in that one instance.

1193. Now let me go back to the point I was upon; they work in teams, do they not ?—Very often.

1194. There is one man in charge ?—I may say that they work both ways, but generally in the larger places they work in teams.

1195. How many women has this man in charge ?—He may have a lot or he may have three.

1196. Three to the team, shall we say ?—Yes.

1197. Now are the wages paid to the head man ?—I believe in all those cases they are paid to the girls. On that point there is a variety of practice. In some cases they pay to the girls and in some cases they do not.

1198. Is there a deduction made from the girls' wages for materials used ?—Very often 3d. to 4d. per week from the girls.

1199. What is that for ?—That is for the use of sand and oil, it is really intended to limit the use of those materials so as to prevent waste.

1200. Is it a fixed charge whether they use a lot or not ?—It is a fixed charge.

1202. Are there any other charges made by way of deduction ?—There are three sets of persons that are brought within deductions in electro-plating works. Three-fourths of the people escape entirely from any kind of deductions, but when it comes to this process of finishing or of preparing for the electro-plater—the buffing process that I am speaking of—likewise stampers, likewise burnishers—then we get deductions. As a rule they arrange with one man to do the whole of the buffing—one man or one woman. A woman, say, will take a number of these and do the whole of the work for the firm and only for the firm; there is no question of any work coming in from the outside. The head woman is charged from 5 per cent. up to 15 per cent. for the materials supplied.

1203. What is that material ?—Rouge, lime, leather, oil, calico, swansdown.

1204. Is that material a fixed charge or is it in accordance with the amount that they do ?—The 5 per cent. to 15 per cent. is a kind of fixed charge; it may vary a little according to trade; if the trade is poor they may get 2½ per cent. less.

1205. That is one charge. Then the filers and piece-work burnishers are charged from 2d. to 6d. weekly for gas ?—Yes.

1206. With a double charge for winter ?—That is so.

1207. Then a woman who engages a learner or assistant is charged double ?—Yes.

1208. Have you made any effort on behalf of the Home Office to ascertain whether these are reasonable charges ?—Fairly, yes.

1209. Have they turned out to be reasonable ?—I do not think they have been unreasonable from the amount of gas which has been used.

1210. Then there are stampers and finishers as well as buffers. They are charged 10 per cent. for material, light and power, with occasionally an extra discount for varying circumstances ?—Yes. In the case of stampers until recently it was all handwork and they then had a net charge, but they got the assistance of a pulley that helped to drag up the weight (sometimes it is half a ton weight) to allow it to drop down in the form of the bowl of a spoon. Then it was found that a man could make so much more than he used to on the original wage list and now they make a charge of 10 per cent. off the wages for the power that has been given to the man to help him to do his work.

1211. Have you had any complaints of that system ?—None whatever.

1212. Then the burnishers, in addition to this, buy chamois leather rubbers from the firm ?—Yes.

1213. Have you found in experience that the firm charge only the actual cost ?—That is so. I am speaking of the rule. The workers get the advantage of buying in large quantities, or at any rate, the firm buy in large quantities, and there is not a firm who would not say to a workwoman: "You can buy your own if you like, elsewhere."

1214. Now I want you to give me a list of the payments for gas prevalent in factories and workshops alike for all trades ?—I have here a number of the trades in which we find these payments prevalent; scissors, spoons, forks, saws, fancy boxes, horn, bone, and other scale cutting; buttons, burnishers, and small edge and other tools.

1215. In some of the trades the deductions are only made during the winter months?—That is so. In the chief of these trades, burnishers have a double system; if they pay the year round they will probably pay 2d.; if they pay only in the winter of the year they will pay 4d. to 6d.

1216. With regard to the charge for gas, is this what you were referring to when you instanced an excess charge of 500 to 2,000 per cent.?—I was referring to the three recent instances that I gave you in which we made out that the charge was excessive.

1217. In nearly all these cases there is an extra charge for the use of a vice?—Yes.

1218. What is the amount of the extra charge?—One of the best vices for the purpose will cost about 17s. 6d.; that is the charge for the vice itself—I mean the charge by the vice-maker. Now if the men are charged 6d. a week for the use of the vice, you will see that they will pay for more than one vice in a year's time.

1219. That is what we want to get at; do they do it?—They do it.

1220. Have you taken any action with regard to that?—I have required notices to be put up and am investigating the charge as to reasonableness.

1221. Can you give us any reason why that has not been taken any notice of?—I can. Though the staff have been cognisant of certain deductions of this kind, they have not had the knowledge that we now have; we have acquired this knowledge. These are quite recent instances now under investigation and have come to light in the course of special inquiries made with a view to evidence before this Committee.

1222. Then you think that the investigation of the subject on public grounds is an advantage to the workers?—If you take the question of light, I think so distinctly.

1223. I will take the question of vice also?—Yes.

*1224. In the instance you have given, where for the use of a thing, the actual cost of it is 17s. 6d., a man is charged 6d. a week, so that in nine months' time or so the capital cost is paid, that represents a profit to the employer?—Without doubt, if it should prove on investigation that the charge is correctly stated and covers no other service.

1225. You cannot defend a system of that kind, can you?—I cannot.

By Mr. Cawley.

1226. I suppose a vice will wear out?

By The Chairman.

1227. What is the life of a vice?—Oh, it lasts years.

1228. Now that you have been put to inquiry into the matter you have come to an opinion upon that?—Yes. I think deductions for light ought to cease altogether. I am certain that it leads to a certain amount of injustice and I think it ought to be disallowed straightaway. With regard to the vice, that is a matter that has only just come before us. We had an instance, I think it was about six months ago, where a man who was employing his own sister actually deducted 6d. a week from his own sister's wages for the use of the vice. This led me to undertake a wider enquiry, and then I found that it is quite common in some of the trades in Sheffield.

1229. Then with regard to the brass trades. Have you any instances of deductions there?—I have three specific examples of deductions.

1230. Will you just give us those?—T— M——, a youth aged nineteen, made four dozens of quarter-inch taps; price previously paid 5s. 9d.; on M—— going in on reckoning they only paid him 5s. 6d.; nothing was alleged in the form of any wrong work.

* It was found subsequently in most instances that the charge involved other considerations, as of repairs, tools, coal, etc. In a few instances Mr. Dodgson found, as a result of enquiry, that the charge had been swept away.

1231. That is to say he did not get his full wages?—He did not get the agreed wages. Mr. J. Dodgson.

1232. Why not?—That I do not know. I have not had time to make inquiry about it. It is information I have from one of the representatives of the Rotherham Brassworkers' Union. 13 June 1906.

1233. Shall we have him as a witness?—The Rotherham Brassworkers' Union is petitioning to be heard.

1234. You can really give no testimony as to this beyond the letter you have there?—I cannot. Then a second instance is rather a different matter. W— H—— made some half-inch taps; price should have been 10s. 6d.; on reckoning there was 5s. deduction because the nut at the bottom of the spindle was loose; H—— neither made the spindle nor made the nut which fits upon it, both being supplied by the firm.

1235. Again you cannot testify about that personally?—I cannot, except that this information comes from their union. Then, A— B—— fitted 100 cisterns and was stopped or deducted a sum of money because it was alleged some of the threads were stripped.

1236. Can you testify about that personally?—I cannot.

1237. Then if you will simply leave us the letter we will not trouble you further about those instances. Now you have something to say on the subject of wearing apparel?—You will hear better evidence on that matter from other inspectors in places where this material is produced on a larger scale than with us.

1238. The last point is with regard to bone-cutters. You say they pay 1s. 6d. each to pay a boy for boiling the bones?—Yes, that is something I do not understand. This is a case that was found out by one of my juniors; I have no personal experience of it myself, but it occurred in Sheffield.

1239. Can you give us the name of the firm?—I could forward it to you. This is a case that one of my juniors actually found. These men are piece workers, I think, producing so much per dozen from the bones; and because the bones have to be boiled before they can cut them there is a charge upon these cutters sufficient to pay the boys' wages for preparing the bones for them. I do not know why it should be so.

1240. Has the Department taken any action in that case?—Not up to this moment, This is quite a new case to me; I never heard of it before.

1241. This inquiry seems rather to have been a fillip to the operations of the Department. Is not that so?—To a certain extent, yes.

1242. I mean all in the way of good?—I think you may say so. Taking my own particular district I may say that I have been hampered very much as to what I was able to consider as within the Truck Act and what was not within the Truck Act, on account of these numbers of cases that have come down; as I say, from father to son, till they do not know what on earth to do with them. They may be wrong or they may be right, but at the same time it must have been that they had a system of adjusting their wages perfectly well understood by the men and perfectly well understood by the occupiers.

1243. In performing your duties you had just to take the system as you found it developed?—That is so.

By Mrs. Tennant.

1244. You told the Chairman that you were satisfied in certain cases that the charges for gas were fair. Could you describe the means you took to come to that conclusion?—Only by calculating the number of hours that the gas would be used and taking the burner that was used—whether it was a No. 2 or a No. 4 or a No. 5 burner—and then reckoning what the consumption would be.

1245. The employers gave you all facilities for seeing how much gas they did burn?—Yes. I may say that that only applies to individual cases, but if you take one case—for instance, take M., they deduct 2d. a week for their gas, and we find that that is a fair and reasonable charge, it is not an excessive charge, it is not one that you could say that they made money out of—then it is only fair to consider that another man would use about the same amount of gas charging about the same price.

By Mr. Ramsay Macdonald.

1246. With regard to the notices of deductions. Do you, as inspector of factories require them to be posted outside or at the entrance to the factory?—We have them posted, as a rule, in every room to which these deductions refer; even as regards the "trades customs" which have given us so much trouble, and in respect of which we have had to exercise some option or discretion.

1247. May I take it that "optional" means that if the deductions seem to be reasonable to you you would pass them?—Yes.

1248. But would any notice be put up as to the deductions of say 2d. a week for light or 6d. a week for the use of the vice—would they be exhibited outside?—They would be exhibited in the room. As regards charges for light this has long been observed.

1249. Now with regard to that case where there was a disagreement as to the amount of deductions, would that be brought before you, or one of your inspectors?—Particulars of that case were given to me personally by the acting secretary of the Rotherham Brassworkers' Union.

1250. The brassworker approached his union and the secretary of the union came to you?—I went to the secretary purposely to ask whether there were cases of that kind.

1251. What were the circumstances that you think unjust?—One of those cases certainly seemed to me to be unjust, but the matter is still under investigation. I will see the whole of the brass factories at Rotherham.

1252. May I take it that you would recommend that every deduction that is possible should be posted up?—Oh, yes. Of course there is a difficulty on account of the hundreds of different kinds of materials produced in one particular place. I am quite right in saying that some of these places will produce 500 different implements. It would be a very difficult matter to lay down specifically in every case what they are going to charge for what may be a bad mistake or what may be only a trifling little error.

1253. Do you find in your capacity as inspector that the Trucks Acts want further defining?—Only to the extent that I have laid down here.

By Mr. Maddison.

1254. Have the trade unions never taken up that question of light at all?—They have not; they have regarded it as being a reasonable kind of thing. When a girl goes to work she accepts the conditions; she knows what she has got to make.

1255. The girls are in union, are they not?—They are not in union, but all the other trades in Sheffield are represented by very, very strong unions indeed.

1256. These very strong unions allow this gross overcharge for light to continue without taking any action?—I have never had any representations made to me of hardship in any shape or form.

1257. Have they not negotiated with the employers, or rather, as they are independent men, with the people that they deal with?—In the case of standing room for the electro-plating works, that is the silversmiths and so on, they formerly paid 6d. a man for what you may call standing room and light, but they had a strike and as the result of that strike that matter was swept away. It was a sort of general term "standing room and light"; they do not pay a penny for that now; there is not a case of a silversmith in Sheffield who pays anything.

1258. You consider that there are extremely unjust cases of charge for light where the people on whom the unjust charge is made have a strong union?—Yes, I think so. I think the Scissors Union is a very strong union.

1259. But they submit to this unjust charge?—They submit, yes.

1260. With regard to the instances you gave in the brass trades, I suppose those have been just given to you as instances that have cropped up, but there has been no time to rectify them?—That is right. I only received information of these the day before I came up for this inquiry, a fortnight ago.

1261. I mean, they have not tried to rectify them with the masters?—In two of those instances the man was not working at all, as the result of the fine, until the difference could be adjusted between the secretary of the union and the employer.

1262. But these differences are usually adjusted between the employers and the workmen by the trades union?—Quite so. I do not lay any stress upon those particular instances, because they do between the secretary of the union and the occupier or the firm manage to adjust their differences; they never come to me in my official capacity with complaints.

1263. I should like to ask whether in your view the reason the union men have not objected to several of these strange charges of which we have heard does not arise from the like of the men of the free sort of life they get, which they would not get if they were working under a regular system?—Distinctly. These tenement factory workers will go to a football match on a Monday—or on Tuesday if there is one—and they enjoy that freedom.

1264. One question about this charge for use of vice, which seems to some of us a very striking example of the things we want to see remedied; where a thing the capital cost of which is 17s. 6d. is charged for at such a rate that in nine months the capital cost is wiped out, although the vice has some years of life. Have you ever received any representations from the unions on such a subject as that?—Nothing.

1265. You told us very little about the file trade; I should like to hear something about the outworkers in the file trade. Is there anything arising there, do you think, with respect to truck?—Nothing at all; I never hear of such a thing; every fileworker works on his or her own account.

1266. I do not know whether there are any of these places that are subject to special rules and regulations?—I have several hundreds.

1267. Have they to wear overalls?—Yes.

1268. Is there any charge made for them?—Every person working in his own room puts himself in an independent position; he would be responsible for wearing overalls; they would not be "provided" by any other person.

1269. Then with regard to light. Are there cases where there would be a different charge made to a girl from that made to a man for using the same amount of gas?—Yes.

1270. Then one must be unfair?—I suppose it must; the girl is charged the best price, that is certain.

1271. I think you have told us that you consider 2d. is fair?—Yes.

1272. Then if that is so the man must be charged too much?—You see, this man is not a protected man in respect of hours of labour, and you will find that he will very often work a couple of hours later than a girl will; it is a common thing to see them at work till 12 at midnight in Sheffield in these places.

1273. Suppose you take an instance of a man, using his gas for the same time, charged three times as much as a girl, would not that be some evidence that the man was charged too much?—Yes, it would; there is difficulty, of course, in telling what length of time the protected man will work.

By Mr. Delevingne.

1274. You have told the Committee that you have not considered certain deductions and charges as coming under the Truck Acts, or at any rate that you have not enforced the Truck Acts against them. Just to get it clear, does that only apply to metal trades in tenement factories?—It applies likewise to the charge for side rent and for grinding hulls, but chiefly to metal trades, electro-plating, Britannia metal and silversmiths' work.

1275. Is that carried on in tenement factories?—No; you do not get electro-plating as a rule in a tenement factory.

1276. What action do you instruct your junior inspectors to take with regard to the enforcement of the Truck Acts when they go into a factory?—It is so very rarely we find that a deduction is made, except under the trade customs which I tried to explain to you. Taking the trades of electro-plating and cutlery manufacture, with the exceptions I have given you I should be doubtful if many shillings are deducted a year from the whole trade.

1277. Would you say that in your district, outside the particular cases you have mentioned, there are practically no abuses which require the intervention of the Truck Acts?—No. I have inquired specially in the rolling mills and steel producing works and engineering places, and I cannot hear of such a thing as deductions, although there are a few routine fines on the notices. I have a few of them here. They do not strike me as being particularly severe. I have, however, met with deductions of another kind, hardly under the Truck Acts. One is the case of a burnishing and polishing factory in Sheffield, a very considerable place, employing a large number of girls. There, for the first few weeks of a girl going to work, they make a deduction of perhaps 1s. a week, until they have a full week's wages in hand. When they have a full week's wages in hand they hold it until the girl leaves work; if she leaves work without a notice, they retain the week's wages; if she gives notice, the money is paid over to her. A very similar thing applies to another place, a small manufactory, where there is a certain percentage deducted in the first few weeks until they get a week's wages in hand, and that is kept until the time the person leaves the employment of the firm, or in the case of leaving without notice it is reserved for the firm's uses. I do not know how far to regard that as coming within the law relating to truck.

Mr. J. Dodgson.

EIGHTH DAY.

Tuesday, 19th June, 1906.

PRESENT.

The Right Hon. THOMAS SHAW, K.C., M.P. (Lord Advocate for Scotland) (Chairman).

E. A. BROTHERTON, Esq., M.P.
FREDERICK CAWLEY, Esq., M.P.
MALCOLM DELEVINGNE, Esq.
FREDERICK MADDISON, Esq., M.P.
J. RAMSAY MACDONALD, Esq., M.P.
Mrs. H. J. TENNANT.

T. E. BETTANY, Esq. (Secretary).

Miss ADELAIDE MARY ANDERSON, Principal Lady Inspector of Factories, was called; and Examined.

By the Chairman.

1278. In the discharge of your duty as Principal Lady Inspector of Factories, have you specially in view the administration of the Truck Act?—Yes, we give a great deal of attention to that.

1279. Who is your immediate superior?—Dr. Whitelegge, the Chief Inspector of Factories.

1280. I undertand that the staff of lady inspectors has been gradually increased. Will you please tell us about that development?—When I was first appointed there were four inspectors in my branch, exclusive of myself, but that has been gradually increased until now there are nine, and the number is about to be increased again.

1281. What is the reason of that development?—It is owing to increased pressure of claims in the work.

1282. What I mean is, does it arise in any sense from an idea that previously there had been an insufficient inspection?—Ideas grow as to the work to be done.

1283. As to the extent and need for supervision?—Yes.

1284. The inspectors find their field of work in all the factories and laundries in the United Kingdom where women and girls are employed?—Yes, we do.

1286. We will come to the details by-and-bye, but will you meantime explain how far these out-workers are within the scope of your supervision?—Originally, under the last Truck Act of 1896, it was believed that they were entirely within its scope, but certain judicial decisions, one in Ireland and one in England, have altered that view.

1287. Do you mean the Donegal case in Ireland?—Yes, and the Midland Lace Company case recently in England. Before the latter decision we had obtained convictions in the Magistrates' Courts in England in connection with out-workers cases and penalties have been imposed.

Miss A. M. Anderson.
19 June 1906.

1288. Of course, your efforts must have been considerably paralysed by the decision to which you have just made reference?—Yes, naturally. But I should say the decision did not totally exclude out-workers from the scope of the law. The decision was to the effect that there must be a contract personally to execute the work; in the Irish case there was another point, namely the definition of manual labour.

1289. I suppose you make certain routine inspections, going from one factory to another?—My staff do so.

1290. The nine inspectors to whom you have referred?—Yes.

1291. And I suppose complaints are received from women workers?—Yes, and from their organisations and from friends of the workers.

1292. Is it your experience in managing your branch that it is as well to have organisations of workers so as to form a channel of communication with the Department?—Certainly, much good is done in that way. Organisation is in two forms in connection with women. There are voluntary associations of the workers themselves and there are also what one may call friendly associations assisted from other classes, which interest themselves in the work of women or girls, learn of defects or contraventions and report them to us.

1293. Of course women workers have trade unions, as such, in the ordinary sense, have they not?—There is comparatively little of that amongst women workers. They are highly organised in the textile trades, but in whole groups of industries there are no organisations worth speaking of.

1294. Do you make reports to the Department upon questions affecting women and girls?—Yes.

1295. Have you prepared a table as to women's employment?—I have not a duplicate copy of that table

Miss A. M. Anderson.

19 June 1906.

here, but it is published in the Chief Inspector's Annual Report.

1296. I have here a copy of that Report for 1903 ?—I refer to pages 238 and 239. I have brought the information together from a number of different sources in order that we might have a survey or a review of the whole field of women's employment.

1297. Is this the last available Report of the kind ?—Some figures have been published since that table was drawn up. I think it ought to be brought up to date and I hope to be able to do so, but approximately that table may be taken as a review of the field of women's employments.

1299. When could these be compiled, without undue inconvenience ?—Within a few weeks.

1300. Would it suit you to have them prepared by the middle of July ?—Yes, I think so.

1301. We should rather like to have that information before we separate for the recess ?—I shall be glad to provide it.*

1302. For the purposes of your present evidence you are able to proceed upon the Report of 1903. How many women are there employed in textile factories ?—The total number of women and girls so employed is, in round figures, 648,000.

1303. I observe that in Table A. which is a table showing the women and girls whose work is regulated by the Factory Acts, that the number employed in textile factories is stated as 472,000 ?—That refers to women only, but I include girls in the total I quoted.

1304. Then we take it that there are 472,000 women employed in textile factories ?—Yes, women over eighteen years of age.

1305. And there are 151,000 young persons ?—Yes, ranging from eighteen down to thirteen or fourteen.

1306. And 24,000 children ?—Yes, from twelve to thirteen years of age.

1307. Then as to the non-textile factories ?—They represent 523,000 ; in workshops 356,098, and in laundries 82,652, but a large number of laundries are excluded from regulations. Textile factories, workshops, and the larger laundries are under regulations.

1308. In order to bring out the distinction of laundries you have prepared a separate Table B ?—Yes.

1309. The steam or factory laundries, of course come within your supervision ?—They do.

1310. Does that also apply to the hand or workshop laundries ?—Yes, except where there are only two or less persons employed who are not living on the premises. That refers to small laundries of a domestic character. They are excluded from regulation and they form a very considerable proportion as may be seen from the census return.

1311 Do the convent laundries fall within the scope of your inspection ?—They do not fall within the scope of the Act, but we have visited some of them.

1312. Are they not steam or factory laundries ?—There is a certain proportion of steam laundries among them.

1313. You have not inspected them ?—We have visited them with the permission of the managers or occupiers. Some object to this kind of voluntary visiting but others accept it.

1314. Do hand or workshop laundries come more under that head ?—As a whole there are rather more workshops laundries than factory laundries in convents and religious institutions.

1315. How are you excluded from the convent laundries ?—By the definition in section 103 (4) (b) of the Act of 1901, namely "Nothing in this section shall apply to the inmates of any institution conducted in good faith for religious or charitable purposes."

1316. Then as to Table C ?—I thought it would be interesting to show the proportion of women employed in the various important groups of industries. That is not an exhaustive list, but it includes every case that is of any significance down to 3,000.

1317. In the précis of your evidence there is a note as to some point overlooked ?—Yes, in the making of Table C, lace warehouses were overlooked. In these, over 7,500 women and girls are employed, and that total will be inserted in the revised table.

1318. With regard to out-workers, upon which we are anxious to obtain your views, I understand that complete returns are not accessible ?—No, they are not accessible. I tried to make a return roughly with the help of the census and such tables as were available from out-workers lists supplied to the local authorities under the Act, but it was not practicable to make it complete. In the Annual Report of the chief inspector—I should think it would be for the year 1899 or 1900—there is a table showing the total of out-workers in the kingdom as shown by lists forwarded at that time under Act.

1319. Is that the latest available ?—No, there are some later figures which I brought together and which were published in a paper written for the International Congress of Hygiene in 1901.

1320. Might we have the advantage of that for our proceedings ?—Yes, certainly. The most important industry in which women are employed in out-work is the great group of clothing trades, and the total employed working at home according to the census in these trades is 335,503; but that would include a certain number of domestic workshops where the people are working on their own account and not in the strict sense of the word as out-workers, so we are not able to get a precise idea of the number of out-workers connected with large industries.

1321. The inspectors furnish reports from their own centres, do they not ?—Yes. Under the Act of 1901 out-workers' lists were provided to the local authority in each district, and it would only be by a summary of all these returns that we should get the correct figures ; that, I believe, being prepared. In one district where women's labour greatly predominates, a lady inspector has been for some years in the statutory position of district inspector in charge of steam and hand laundries, and of factories and workshops in which the making of dress and millinery is carried on. This special district embraces seven of the west London boroughs and the urban districts of Acton and district. This method of organising part of the work of the lady inspectors will probably be extended, but the greater part of their work continues all over the kingdom by sample routine inspections in districts not under their charge.

1322. What is your ground for saying that it will probably be extended ?—We are discussing the question of slightly extending that district organisation where women are employed in great numbers.

*In regard to this the following letter has since been received by the Secretary from the witness :—

Dear Mr. Bettany,

On my return from leave I began to try to carry out my promise to the Chairman of the Truck Committee as regards revision of the figures given in the Tables of Employment of Women (Annual Report for 1903, pp. 238–9). I found the way clear only as regards employment in factories and in laundries. Revised figures are accessible for these as late as 1901. Nothing, however, is obtainable as regards workshops later than 1897, i.e., the figures already given in my tables.

To attempt to calculate percentages on an addition of those 1897 figures for workshops to factories in 1901 would only yield misleading conclusions, for there is nothing to show the extent to which workshops have been transformed into factories.

In the meantime, therefore, my tables put in as part of my evidence are as accurate and useful as it is possible to make them, and any attempt to revise them must be postponed.

The chief inspector informs me that the workshop returns for 1901 were not tabulated. Those for 1904, however, will be ready in December. Possibly I might then combine the factory figures for 1901 with workshop figures for 1904 ? The distance between them would still be three years.—Yours sincerely,

A. M. Anderson.

1323. Of course it is part of your duty, if you find anything in contravention of the provisions of the statute, either to prosecute or to endeavour to secure conformity with the law ?—That is so.

1324. Do the inspectors furnish the requisite facts to enable you to decide whether it is a case for prosecution ?—Yes, I do decide; but I have always access to the advice of the Chief Inspector and of the legal advisers of the Home Office—an advantage of which I make very free use 1325. Do you go into court to prosecute cases ?—I used to do so regularly, and all my staff now do so. I am so much occupied at headquarters that I have not much time now for that detailed work.

1326. Do you find such a system works quite well ?—Yes, it is a most important part of the work of the inspectors and is of great help to them.

1327. I suppose the experience of two or three prosecutions usually equips them for conducting cases ?—Yes. Some are more gifted than others in that way; but all acquire the power to do it.

1328. Then the Department does not go through the formality of engaging solicitors and counsel ?—No, that is not necessary, except when some special legal point is known to be at issue, and then it may be well to begin with counsel in order to prepare the case thoroughly for appeal.

1329. The prosecutions, of course, speak for themselves, but do they represent the full scope of the work ?—They form only a small part of the work done in the sense of action on contraventions found under the Truck Acts or Factory Acts. The greater part of our work is done in the factories, or is in correspondence, conference and conversation with the occupiers of factories and the workpeople. Advice, instruction and warning form the larger, and in many ways the most important, part of our work.

1330. I suppose you find your hands strengthened by the fact that a power of prosecution is always behind you ?—That is a most important leverage, but it is only used as a last resort.

1331. How many prosecutions have there been since the beginning of 1897 ?—The lady inspectors have, since that date, prosecuted under the Truck Acts forty-seven occupiers and contractors; or rather, I should say, forty-eight, because I see there was omitted from my original statement a case in 1897 which occurred shortly before my promotion to charge of the Branch in August of that year.

1332. How many convictions have there been ?—There have been thirty-seven occupiers convicted, and there were 108 convictions against them.

1333. One defendant might represent several charges ?—Yes.

1334. Summed up in one indictment ?—In Scotland one indictment, but, in England, in separate information indictments.

1335. How many appeals have there been ?—Appeals have been prosecuted in five instances. They relate to cases handled originally by two of the lady inspectors: Miss Squire and Miss Deane.

1336. Appeals against acquittals ?—Yes. There was the case of Squire v. Sweeney in 1900 re powers of an inspector to investigate observance of acts as regards out-workers at any part of a contractor's premises, and the decision of the High Court in Dublin was in favour of the full exercise of such powers. In the same year there was an appeal Squire v. Sweeney re payment otherwise than in current coin to out-workers in hosiery. The decision was that unless there is a contract personally to execute the work the out-worker is not a workman within the meaning of the Truck Acts. It was decided that knitting is not manual labour.

1337. Do I understand you to say it was decided that knitting was not manual labour ?—Yes.

1339. What court decided that ?—The High Court in Dublin. The Court of King's Bench.

1340. Has that decision regulated your practice ?—Not that part of the decision. The question has never arisen again; but it is interesting that it has arisen once.

1341. It is. And now as to the other part of the decision ?—It prevents us prosecuting cases easily in Ireland in connection with out-workers. It would have involved a great amount of search to find out cases where the worker had pledged herself personally to execute the work, and as a matter of fact, in these districts, we find the contractors gave up paying wages in goods.

1342. Can you describe the kind of work that was done, and the kind of people who did it, and how they lived, and what happened ?—I think you will get the best and liveliest description of all that from the two lady inspectors who were there all the time, and who had hard work in the district. I refer to Miss Deane and Miss Squire.

1343. Then we will get that from them. What was the trade ?—Three trades were specially concerned in Ireland: the sprigging, or embroidery industry; the making of shirts and collars at home; and the knitting of hosiery. It was all light work, done at home by these Donegal peasants.

1344. Will Miss Deane or Miss Squire be able to give us details ?—Yes; and an account of the people's homes, and the nature of the contracts.

1345. I see you have a memorandum of a case prosecuted by Miss Squire in 1901 ?—Yes, that was a case taken to test the question how far the employer could be required to specify in the contract as to disciplinary fines, the kind of act or neglect which would entail a deduction from the worker's wage. The decision of the magistrates that such a rule as "observance of due order and decorum" was sufficient to cover the act of dancing to a harp in the dinner hour, was upheld by the High Court. We found, as a matter of fact, afterwards, that the advertisement thus given to that vague form of contract led to its being adopted in other factories.

1346. Is it not common under the Factory Act for prosecutions, although unsuccessful, to have a deterrent effect ?—Yes.

1347. But this instance is the reverse of that, as the result of this prosecution was to advertise a form of contract of which the Department substantially disapproved ?—That is so.

1348. And it has in effect spread ?—Yes, it spread directly afterwards.

1349. Then I may put this to you: would it suit the Department if the legislature were to correct that decision ?—It certainly would.

1350. And in what sense would you suggest the correction ?—It is difficult, without thought, to make a suggestion as to precise words in a matter that is so important. The point is, to get as close as possible to a definition of the action or omission which will entail a loss of wage to the worker.

1351. Let me put before you this broad question: do you think it an expedient thing to have a general rule of that kind about the observance of order and decorum under the sanction of a fine ?—I do not. There should be no such vague rule entailing a fine or deduction from the wage. The margin in wage is far too small. The payment, speaking generally for women and girls, is a subsistence wage, and it is of the utmost importance that they should not have deductions made unless it be for actions which they know they can avoid.

1352. Where there is definition in the contract ?—Yes. The workers should know that, if fines are to be allowed at all, they should be exacted only under the clearest possible contract.

1353. To begin with, this is discipline pure and simple ?—Yes.

1354. With a fine imposed at the will of the employer ?—Yes. I suppose the theory is that the worker agrees to it.

1355. Do you see any objection in principle to such a contract being made impossible ?—I think such a vague contract ought to be made impossible. There is too much at stake for the worker.

1356. On the other hand, do you think that the employers' powers of discipline would be invaded unduly

Miss A. M. Anderson.

19 June 1906.

if he were left to the ordinary alternative that he can dismiss a bad worker or commend a good one?—The best employers are gradually finding out that they can do better without fines. But that involves a good deal of special intelligence and cleverness in organisation, and it may be that in the existing state of affairs it is wiser not to push the matter to such a point that an employer might employ harder methods of discipline.

1357. Would you distinguish between cases of discipline and cases of actual loss that occur by wastage of material?—Certainly. Deductions of an excessive nature have often been made from workers' wages on account of wastage, and I should disapprove of these entirely unless it be in the form of a fair and reasonable disciplinary fine to prevent damage. Moreover, the employer ought not to be allowed to assess his own damage against the worker—that is, to be both judge and jury, and everything else in the case.

1358. Might not the rule, in the case of Squire v. Bayer have been expressed as, "observance of good discipline?"—Yes. But I disapprove of a vague rule, because I know of cases where a forewoman has been given absolute authority to fine promptly for anything she disliked in the workers' conduct.

1359. Such authority lends itself naturally to caprice, or it may be to tyranny?—Yes, it does, to a remarkable degree.

1360. Suppose the fines are for discipline for specified acts apart from loss; suppose, for instance, a rule that a person must not wear a flower in her coat, or that a worker must not whistle after a certain hour—that, although it is specific, is still pure discipline without any loss?—We object as a rule to fines of that kind entering into a contract, and we generally get them removed.

1361. Then there is the third class of cases associated partly with discipline, and partly with wastage, or loss of material?—In a good many cases the employers have fallen into the way of treating these as disciplinary fines, dropping the idea of restitution to themselves, and imposing a fine that will act only as a deterrent of real carelessness.

1362. In that case you will, I fancy, agree with me that there should be some judge of the fairness or reasonableness of the fine or deduction, apart from the employers themselves?—Certainly.

1363. Would it occur to you as convenient that the inspectors should settle such a point?—Of course, the inspectors are, to a certain extent, already judges upon many such points. The employers do adapt themselves to a considerable extent to the opinion of the inspector, but there is difficulty often in arriving at all the factors. There is the question of the workers' degree of skill, the amount of wage she can earn, the costliness of the material she handles, etc.

1364. Suppose this Committee recommended that in cases where actual loss occurred, and where fines were imposed, there should be an appeal to the inspector by either party, with power to the inspector to view the premises, to call for books and material, and to get full information, do you think that that would afford a convenient rectification of any trouble?—It would be a step towards it, but I think you would want something more. You would want some definition of fairness and reasonableness to help the inspector to decide. It would be a difficult position to put an inspector into to make him or her a judge.

1365. Can you help us towards any other suggestion?—I think one element should be a ratio to the wage.

1366. That seems a good suggestion. Now take the case of female workers; may we say that their average wage is about 12s.?—It ranges from 5s. or 6s. a week to 15s. a week, and rarely reaches 20s. or 25s.

1367. If we take an average of 10s. per week, is there any suggestion occurs to your mind, as to the reasonable ratio of fines to such a wage?—It certainly ought not to be a higher ratio than will let the girl take home enough to pay for her lodging and her food and her clothes.

1368. May I suggest to you a maximum of 1s. where the wages do not exceed 10s., that is 10 per cent. What do you say to that?—I should like to think it over.

1369. Now we are getting to close quarters with the question, and we do not want as a Committee to make any rash or abstract recommendations, but we want to take advantage of your experience?—Some of the inspectors have been pressing for a standard that the total amount deducted from the worker should not exceed 5 per cent. Note has to be taken of the distinction between piece-workers and time-workers. Supposing you have fines for coming late, the piece-worker would in any case lose her wage if she is late; so the same proportionate fine would not be equally fair for both the piece-worker and the time-worker.

1370. Might it be possible to work it out in this way, that loss of time is loss of wages, and that beyond the loss of time the deduction or fine for other causes should bear a proportion to the wage earned?—It would be a great gain to have that definitely stated in the law. We have lost one or two cases taken into the court as regards fairness and reasonableness, through not being able to convince the court of the importance of that element—the amount of the worker's wage.

1371. The suggestion is not that you should leave fairness and reasonableness out, but that you should have a maximum under which the workman would be guaranteed to have a living, so to speak?—Just so.

1372. And then, that being the maximum, that the doctrine of fair and reasonable in your judgment might have scope?—Yes.

1373. Now, the next case you refer to is the case of Squire v. The Midland Lace Co.?—That is a case in 1905 under Section 2 (2) (a) of the Act of 1896. That was about deductions from wages of out-workers in lace-making. The High Court upheld the decision of the magistrates, that as there was not a contract personally to execute the lace-work the out-workers were not "workmen" within the meaning of the section. That was substantially the second part of the decision in the Irish case.

1374. That was Squire v. Sweeney over again?—Yes, that was as regards lace out-workers in the Midlands.

1375. Now, would you again excuse me for asking you to put that into a concrete picture; that is to say, in the past you and your staff had been accustomed to supervise the operation of out-workers in the lace industry?—We had in that and other industries.

1376. And do you think the result of your inquiries had been helpful to both parties?—It had.

1377. In what respects?—That penalties were imposed by magistrates' decisions on employers for paying out-workers in silk sashes and button boots and things like that that the workers did not want, in place of paying them wages. I have a case in mind of a poor old bedridden woman who was paid by a silk sash; of course, she had to sell it before it was any good to her.

1378. Will you give us particulars of that?—I would refer you to Miss Squire for the precise details. There were cases in Somersetshire amongst the glove workers.

1379. Then the result of the two cases, Squire v. Sweeney and Squire v. The Midland Lace Co., has been, I suppose, to impede to some extent your operations?—Certainly in the Midlands. We might possibly have found a case where it was clear that the person had personally undertaken to do the work; but the contracts are so loose between workers and their employers, even inside the factories, that it is very difficult to get evidence on those fine and subtle points.

1380. I do not say that it occurs, but if those decisions stand without rectification, abuses of that sort may grow up?—Certainly.

1381. Would it be your fear that they would grow up?—Certainly. I feel that in some cases these deductions and fines are decreasing under the close supervision of the inspectors as compared with what they used to be in the past, but there is always a tendency for them to arise again.

1382. Would there be any difficulty in making rules which would cover the case of out-workers; does it occur to you that there would be any difficulty at all?—I see no difficulty whatever. The ordinary out-worker wants protection even more than the in-worker, whether she is working with the help of her husband or somebody else at home, or whether she is working by herself. There would be a limit; there would be a certain point; of course, if she became a contractor—a true manufacturing or merchant contractor—she might be held not to be within the limit.

1383. You have just touched the point there. The moment the question of a separate contract comes in, difficulties arise?—On a larger scale, yes. Might it not be possible to fix a limit of money—I mean the gross business that is being done by the out-worker. Something of that sort might come in, just as in some of the accident and invalid insurance laws for workers in Germany they have a limit. People making above a certain amount of income do not fall within the law. That occurs to me as a way of meeting the difficulty. If the worker is really a merchant or a manufacturer then she would not need protection in the same way.

1384. Then the next thing you deal with is the case of Deane v. Wilson and Company Limited?—Yes, that was a case in 1906; it has not yet been decided. We have not had a judgment yet in the High Court.

1385. That was an Irish case?—Yes. The question was whether a sum withheld by the employer, a textile manufacturer, from a weekly-paid wage-worker under the designation of "bonus" as a penalty for coming after the hour of commencing work—the so-called bonus being always paid for the week's work of fifty-five and a half hours—was or was not a "fine" within the Truck Act of 1896. The case was heard on May 15th of this year by the Lord Chief Justice and two other judges of the High Court in Dublin. The Lord Chief Justice said it was a very important case, and they would carefully consider it, and they reserved judgment.

1386. That is as far as you have got?—That is as far as we have got. The details in that case Miss Deane can give you at full length.

1387. She was the prosecutrix in that case?—Yes.

Since this evidence was given the High Court in Ireland have decided that the sum withheld by the employers in this case was not a deduction in respect of a "fine" within the meaning of Section 1 of the Truck Act, 1896.

1388. Then you are going to give us the figures as to prosecutions and convictions?—In all, forty-seven occupiers and contractors have been prosecuted and thirty-seven convicted for various contraventions (I am speaking of the Truck Acts only), the convictions amounting to 108 cases, or 75·5 per cent., of all cases taken by lady inspectors since the middle of 1897, the year in which my direction of the Branch begins.

1389. You have a table of the prosecutions since 1896 (see Question 1639)?—Yes, this sets out for each year the number of cases taken and the total penalties. There are columns showing which case fell under the sections relating to "Excessive, unfair, or unreasonable fines or deductions," "Deductions for rent," "Fines, deductions, and payments without a proper contract or particulars," "Payments otherwise than in current coin," and "Attempts to control the expenditure of wages." The majority of the cases fall under the contract question or omission to give particulars to workers, i.e., 81 in all as compared with 16 for unreasonable deductions.

1390. I see that in each of the years 1903 and 1904 there were seventeen cases of deductions without proper contracts?—Yes.

1391. Do you happen to remember what was the particular form of that outbreak?—I should say that rather than an outbreak it was simply a concentration of the inspector on some area. I have a complaint table (see Appendix IV., Table 1) later that may throw some light on it. In 1902 there were thirteen complaints under that head; that is rather an unusual number and no doubt those were carefully followed up and led to proceedings and to the detection of new instances. I do not suppose it was a special outbreak of any kind; it was merely that the inspector had spare time to concentrate on to that particular group of questions.

1392. That table seems to suggest, however, the necessity of keeping up a pretty shrewd and careful inspectorate?—It does, I think. I could tell you the districts; I have the tables here for this year. These seem to have been mostly cases in factories—shirt manufacturers, wholesale tailors, clothiers, tentmakers, linen and cotton weaving.

1393. You say that the average penalty on each case under the Truck Acts is 32s. 6d. and in each case under the Factory Act 22s.?—There is one element of uncertainty there, and I should like to correct the last section of that table with regard to total prosecutions under the Factory Act. My clerk gave me the figures for the two Acts together. The penalty under the Truck Acts would fall slightly under 22s. and the percentage of convictions under the Factory Act would come slightly higher. I will have that worked out and give you the correct figures. These last three columns relate to the whole work—Factory Act and Truck Acts. The average of convictions under the Factory Act alone would probably be 96 or 97 per cent., and the average penalty would be rather smaller.

Miss A. M. Anderson. 19 June 1906.

1394. There is a remark in your précis which I am rather interested in. You say that, "Often the best practical results in administration arise in the years when difficult cases have been attempted with adverse or rather less satisfactory results in the way of securing convictions"?—I do not know that I should go so far as to say that the best practical results have been attained; but the results are very good. Sometimes, with the mere publicity bringing out these heavy deductions and fines, public opinion is so much against it that the abuses get rectified. It was so in a group of Bristol cases.

1395. What trade was that in?—Clothing. Decided reforms were introduced after those cases, even though we did not secure convictions. Again, in the case of a prosecution in the pen manufacturing trade, the manufacturer the moment he was acquitted came to us and asked us what he could do to meet our views.

1396. A prosecution seems to be considered quite a matter of routine?—Quite.

1397. I am saying this in the interests of the Department. The fact of there being a prosecution is just an element in your administration that is quite recognised by both employers and employees?—Quite. They are avoided if we can avoid them, if we can get results without them, as a rule; although, of course, occasionally glaring cases may arise when the only possible step is to prosecute, quite apart from the question whether the occupier will conform.

1398. What is the meaning of the remark that you make about "Contraventions, many easily provable, are daily found by inspectors under either set of Acts"?—There are technical infringements of the laws daily found by the Inspectors, it is very easy to prove them, but the most important thing is to get them put right at once, and reserve for severe measures cases where the contraventions are very serious and injure the worker.

1399. Where an employer refuses to take a warning?—Exactly.

1400. Or where it is a serious thing and publicity would have some advantage in ventilating it?—Exactly.

1401. What happens in those cases. You say that "The proof is not always easiest in those cases"?—It is not very easy to prove the unreasonableness or unfairness of a fine, because of all these elements of doubt; it is not easy to secure that the magistrates take the view of the Inspectorate. In that case that I mentioned in the pen trade, where the payments for damage amounted to something like £2 and £5 and even £10, and the worker could not possibly get out of debt to the employer, except by instalments spread over years, the decision of the magistrate was in effect that because only 1s. a week was deducted from the wages of the worker the deduction was reasonable. The worker was unable to get out of debt to her employer. We considered that unreasonable.

1402. That was on the principle of payment by instalments?—Yes.

1403. Then has local opinion assisted you after a matter of that kind has been ventilated?—It has; yes. In that case the deductions have been diminshed, but they are still very heavy.

1404. Your view is that the important thing is to bring serious cases into the court?—Well, in the meantime we have had sometimes to take the risk of not securing the magistrates' decision in our favour.

Miss A. M. Anderson.

19 June 1906.

1405. You mean, when you have brought cases merely in order to get publicity ?—Yes.

1406. Then you say, "The decision of magistrates, however, in support of the inspectors have often been of the greatest value both under heads (1) and (2) ?—Yes. There was a very good case in London where a magistrate cleared up a point of law as to the contract. He dismissed the point in the case, because he said there was no evidence that a contract had been made; there was a notice fixed in the workshop clearly stating the offence, but there was no proof that the girls' attention had ever been drawn to it, or that a copy had even been given to her, and the magistrate said, "I cannot agree that a contract was ever made here." That decision helped us very much, although in that particular case it was dismissed. The magistrate also in that case decided that it was quite unfair and unreasonable to deduct from the girl's wage the amount of wage that might have been earned in an hour if she had been there, when as a matter of custom she was not required to be there for that hour. The normal time for the workers to go to work was 9 o'clock; the employer could legally bring her there at 8 o'clock if he chose; if she came five minutes after 9 he deducted, not only the penalty for coming late five minutes, but the proportion of her wage that would be represented by one hour's time. The magistrate said that was quite unreasonable; he said it was impossible to prove that any such damage had been done to the business by the worker coming five minutes late. That ran rather closely on the lines of the bonus truck case in Ireland.

1407. A conviction was obtained on that ?—Yes, on the London case, not the Irish case.

1408. Now, you make an offer to give a detailed table of Truck Act cases, with the trade, the offences, the fines, and so on ?—Yes, I can give you a complete table if you wish it.

1409. We should like to have that if you will put it in ?—I take it it would not be necessary to give the name of the occupier; or do you think that is advisable. The cases have all been published originally in the annual reports.

1410. I think you had better put the occupiers name in too ?—Very well.

1411. Of course we are anxious to have the trade as well ?—I have these columns:—"Date," "Nature of the position of the occupier," i.e. whether he is a factory occupier or workshop occupier or a contractor, "Occupation," "Offence," "Act and section," "Number of cases," and "Result."

1412. Does "occupation" include the actual trade ?—Yes, sprigging, shirt-making, corset and court dress-making, and so on. There are about thirty or thirty-three cases of Miss Squire's and five or six or seven for each of the other inspectors.

1413. Then as to the cases where a decision has been adverse, you incline to the opinion that they have hampered generally the administration where there has been no appeal?—That is in some cases on the question of unfairness and unreasonableness.

1414. I am a little anxious to get that. Do you think it would be expedient to have an appeal about that ?—I suppose it would depend partly on the tests of reasonableness that might be put into the new Act.

1415. If you had an appeal, you must have it on both sides, you might get one magistrate to hold that it was quite reasonable, and on appeal, the Court of Appeal would upset that; on the other hand, the magistrate who had heard your evidence might hold the opposite, namely, that it was a perfectly unreasonable thing, and on appeal, the Court of Appeal, not seeing witnesses, might hold that it was reasonable ?—I think there is a danger in that way, too, and that the main point is to get into the Act some test of fairness and reasonableness. We have had cases both ways from the magistrates—helpful and the reverse.

1416. Then you say that there are technicalities of trade and relative circumstances of the workers, such as their skill and so on, which are extremely difficult of proof ?—Especially in connection with damage. Take, as an example, the pen trade, where each single pen passes through the hands of six or eight or ten workers; there was a very great deal of hard work to be done in that trade before we could get at the elements in the situation. Frequently the absolute smallness of the sum deducted from the worker's wages, say 2s. 6d., obscures the appreciation of the fact that, to her, it means losing one quarter or more of her daily bread through the coming week, for a fault or failure in skill for which she may really not be blameable.

1417. I want you to illustrate the last point—how she is made to suffer, although the fault may not relate to herself ?—I think there, again, the range of instances might best be given you at first hand from Miss Squire and Miss Deane.

1418. There has been enough of evidence to show that very often the penalty falls upon a worker who is one of a series of workers engaged upon what might be called a cumulative set of operations upon materials; not the whole set of workers engaged in the process is fined, but the fine falls upon one individual ?—We have had many cases of that, say, in collar making; at a late stage the worker declares that the damage is not due to her fault; that the injury was traceable to some earlier process; that she could not turn out good work because of something that had been done at an earlier stage.

1419. Instances were also given us from the tile-making trade—about the paint running and so on ?—Yes, Then, again, in weaving, the workers declare that the warps are what they call rotten, or that there is some fault in the machinery that they could not control.

1420. Are these explanations, do you think, true ?—In a certain proportion of cases I think they must be true; the worker has not had a fair chance.

1421. Would that incline your mind to the view that I have suggested to you, that a ready appeal in cases of reasonableness might be given to the inspectorate, who would examine the situation on the spot, rather than having the elaborate machinery of witnesses in a court of law ?—There, again, we do a great deal of that work already, and we only go into court where it seems better to bring the whole of the facts before some authority—before the ordinary courts of the country. It would be making the inspector into a kind of judge.

1422. That is what I am pointing at ?—It is a new idea; it would be easier if there were a test introduced into the Act—some standard—by which the inspector could finally judge; but I should like then an appeal to the Home Office.

1423. I put the point before you in order that we might consider it. You, I suppose, are almost painfully alive to the difficulty arising from the construction of "fair and reasonable" ?—Yes, it has been the greatest difficulty.

1424. If we could get some authority near the spot who would settle matters as between the parties, that would be a great advantage, I suppose you would agree ?—There is a suggestion I make in the paper headed "Suggestions" which I handed to the Secretary this morning. I suggest that we should rule out of the Act payment of damages per se assessed by the employer, and have a special court for disputes under that head between the employer and the worker.

1425. We will come to that presently. Then you are calling special attention to another kind of difficulty in columns five to nine in your prosecution table ?—The impossibility of directly attacking a particular instance of unreasonable or unfair fines where there has been no contract for such fines. We bring the case into court for fining in absence of a contract, and the defendant, if he has got a good lawyer to defend him, will not allow the prosecutor to say one word about the unreasonableness or unfairness of the fine in itself as an element in the case. That arises through the drafting. I do not know whether it could be in any way altered, or whether it is desirable that it should be altered; but the result is that we have to bring a great many cases into court which appear as purely technical, that is, failure to make a contract when a fine has been deducted, when really what we mind is the fact that an unreasonable fine has been deducted from the worker's wage.

1426. But have you not a procedure in England, under which you can bring your complaint and place it upon an alternative footing, that you, the defendant, we will say, have failed to conform to the Act, because you have not had a specific contract, or, alternatively, that the transaction was one tainted by that other matter that you have referred to ?—We are instructed that we cannot lay an information under this existing Act of 1896 for making an unreasonable deduction, where there has been no contract. It arises through the drafting of the Act, I do not know whether it could be avoided.

1427. The assumption is this: first you have no contract, therefore you are an offender against the Statute; but then, supposing the defendant proves his defence—that there was a contract—cannot you under the same complaint say, "or alternatively, if there was a contract which should not have been made, which was itself an offence, because it was unfair and unreasonable;" you have never attempted that, I gather ?—No, I think not; and we would have been sure that there had been no contract before we made an attempt to lay the information for that.

1428. Is it your experience, by the way, that heavy fines are deducted from the workers' wages in the absence of contract ?—That is so, very very frequently, especially in the past; there are still cases arising where there is no contract. There may be some sort of contract, but one that does not cover that particular act or omission in question.

1429. And in these cases you can only prosecute for imposing a fine in the absence of such a contract as the Act requires ?—That is so. The majority of the complaints we receive, if you will look at the table of complaints (see Appendix IV., Table 1), fall under the heading of excessive, unfair, or unreasonable fines or deductions. We received 299 complaints out of 371 falling under that heading; only fifty-nine were complaints of the absence of contract. The total of our prosecutions is, eighty-one prosecutions for not making a contract, sixteen for the unreasonableness of the fine. The proportion is quite the reverse. The workers' grievance lies under the heading of the unreasonableness of the fine; but the great majority of our cases we have had to take under the section that there is no contract.

1430. Where your indictment or information is that there is no contract, you cannot get in the other matter at all ?—We cannot get it in, because of course the defendant will not allow us to speak of a matter that may influence the amount of the penalty imposed by the magistrate; naturally, if he can get it excluded he will.

1431. Then you were going to speak of the trades in which you have found most contraventions ?—The trades in which we have found most contraventions are roughly indicated by the distribution of prosecutions, thus: Textile trades, linen and cotton weaving, five occupiers prosecuted; worsted spinning and weaving five occupiers; hosiery and knitting, ten occupiers and contractors; non-textile trades, shirts, apron, blouse, collar and pinafore manufacture, five occupiers and contractors; wholesale tailoring, seven occupiers and contractors; corset and court dressmaking, two occupiers; patent buttonhole makers, one occupier; glove making, one contractor; sprigging or embroidery, one contractor; lace manufacture, two occupiers; bedstead maker, one occupier; steel pen maker, one occupier; tent maker, one occupier; steel pen maker, one occupier; tent maker, one occupier; earthenware and china, one occupier; lucifer match works, one occupier; laundries, one occupier. Many laundries use a form of contract that was submitted to the Home Office for criticism.

1432. So that the worst offences appear to be in the first three that you have named. At the head of the list stands hosiery and knitting; the next two worst trades are the linen and cotton weaving and worsted spinning and weaving ?—And tailoring; but then these are the largest industries, we must remember that. The majority of occupiers prosecuted have been occupiers of factories, thirty-four in all. Eleven contractors or givers-out of work have been prosecuted; the remainder of the persons prosecuted have been occupiers of workshops or a laundry. The outworkers in the lace industry in Nottingham, affected by the decision in Squire v. Midland Lace Co., were employed by the occupiers of a factory. The outworkers in hosiery, affected by the earlier Irish decision in Squire v. Sweeney, were employed by agents or contractors for the big Belfast and Londonderry manufacturers

1433. Now will you tell us about the formal complaints from workers or organisations ? I think you have already said that they are helpful in drawing your attention to grievances ?—That is so; they are a great help. Miss A. M. Anderson. 19 June 1906.

1434. I suppose you examine both parties, you go and have conversations at the works ?—The complaint indicates the kind of grievance that arises in the industry, and the object is always to see as many of that class of worker and trade as can be fitted in.

1435. You are not impeded in practice ?—Oh no; obstruction of any kind is rare.

1436. Then your evidence is, that women and girls, and I suppose children, probably suffer far more than men in industry from truck in its various forms, as well as from the various uncertainties in piecework rates of wages ?—Probably, I should think; partly because the women's wages to begin with are smaller, and can less bear deductions, but also because the women are less organised, they have less general power of resistance. I think our record of prosecutions shows that they suffer more than men.

1437. With regard to women's wages, your view is, I think, that they seldom at best rise above a bare subsistence level ?—That is so; I do not think you can call 10s. to 15s. much above subsistence level.

1438. Any margin there is goes to the family ?—Broadly speaking, that is so. The married woman is very much liked, I think, as a worker, because she is so very steady, her great object being to work for her family; it is not for herself that she is working.

1439. Your evidence is that it is essential that they should take away all that they earn ?—Yes, that is essential for health, physical, social and moral.

1440. And that their wages should not be arbitrarily reduced ?—Just so.

1441. Do you feel strongly upon that question about a maximum for all kinds of deductions ?—Very strongly indeed. I do not quite see my way, through all the possible abuses that might arise, to absolutely prohibiting deductions or fines from wages, but if they are allowed I do feel that there ought to be a rigid maximum, leaving a margin for subsistence.

1442. Now will you give us your impression of the general results ?—My impression of the general results effected by legislation and administration in the ten years 1896 to 1906 may be summed up thus. (a) Gradual though slow weeding-out of the worst open examples of harsh contracts and long arbitrary lists of deductions for discipline and damage (by "open," I mean it has not been drawn to our attention; there may be cases still remaining). Still, very much work remains to be done under this head in the way of criticising and amending contracts, especially in the direction of getting clearer contracts.

1443. When you say clearer contracts, you would exclude such instances as Squire v. Bayer ?—Yes, the case in which the notice was a general notice as to "observing due decorum"; I should like it brought to a clearer issue. Then, (b) steady growth of understanding amongst employers and employed that deductions from wages may not be made in absence of a contract. This has been accompanied by the development of a tendency to evade the requirements of the Truck Acts by devices or arrangements (e.g., suspension, so-called reductions of wages, so-called "bonus" systems, lock-outs for lateness).

1444. You call that evasion ?—Well, it leads to a serious reduction of the worker's wage. The intention of the Truck Acts, I take it, was to secure that the worker did not have her weekly wage arbitrarily or uncertainly reduced; I think that was especially the principle of the Truck Act of 1896, and if a worker who comes one minute late to the factory is locked out for two hours, and has not only the amount that she might have earned in those two hours deducted from her wage, but a so-called "bonus" in addition, I call that a clear evasion of the Truck Acts. A recent case arose where an inspector objected to the heavy penalties that were attached to certain acts in the factory, and the employer simply drew out a new contract, taking out the fines that were named, and saying that the worker for this would be put on a reduced wage for a week or a fortnight until she had learned to do the work properly. The inspector said that this was also a fine, in her opinion, within the meaning of the Act, and the employer then issued a third edition, in which, instead of the reduction, he said that the worker would be suspended for a week as the penalty for each of the acts that he objected to. Miss Paterson will give you evidence as to that sort of contract. Then, (c) there is a diminishing number of cases of payment otherwise than in current coin, but too little change in the situation as regards compulsory charges to workers for materials (including those supplied under special rules or the general law relating to factories), mess-rooms, hospital subscriptions.

1445. Do you think there ought to be progress in that particular ?—Yes. Then, (d) healthy signs of a growing objection on the part of working women and girls to unfair and unreasonable deductions. Progress in administration under this head is far too slow, partly because of the difficulties under legal proceedings to which I have alluded. Far too high a proportion of wages is deducted, without redress, for damages and disciplinary fines. In certain branches of the clothing trades charges or deductions for materials put into the articles produced are so numerous and complicated that the worker's wage is uncertain ; I refer to charges for cotton and needles and so on.

1446. Do those charges produce uncertainty to such an extent as seriously to invade the actual wage ?—Seriously, yes. In one week a worker's net wage may be only 1s. 8d. or 2s. at the end of the week, because she has had to buy a very costly kind of silk reel.

1447. What would be the wage obtained by such a worker ?—The net wage carried home that week might be 1s. or 2s., because of the sum she has had to pay for a costly reel.

1448. But will you give me the gross wage and the deduction ?—By looking up the cases I could give you that, but I think Miss Squire may have the individual instances ready for you.

1449. Those deductions that you have last referred to are deductions which would be spread over, so to speak ?—Sometimes the employer will spread them over, and let the worker pay by instalments ; sometimes the whole sum is deducted at once.

1450. In the case of what you have described as a bare subsistence wage, that is, of course, a serious hardship ?—Very serious, in so far as the woman is depending on that wage. She may have to get into debt for necessaries to the local shop in the meantime. Recent extension of the particulars section will in time, to some extent, help workers to formulate their grievances in this direction, and to ascertain the real amount of their wage. A great deal of work has been done towards helping us to administer the Trucks Acts through that section. Then, (e) instances, probably outside the present scope of the Truck Acts, have been discovered from time to time, of employers' methods of retaining part of wages in order to maintain control over the worker's movements, e.g., 3d. a week deducted until the amount of one week's wages is in hand, to be given back ultimately to the worker if she gives full notice of leaving, or does not neglect some other rule, but to be retained by the employer if rules as to notice not observed.

1451. Have you taken any action about that ?—That is considered to be outside the Truck Acts ; it is a retention of wage. (f) Occasionally workers refuse to accept a contract for fines unless the resulting fund is given to some institution or public fund by the employer. Provided this is done they show less objection to paying a fine agreed on, than to having it deducted ; they feel that it is more within their own power.

1452. And it eliminates the element of private profit to the employer, which is a distinct advantage, I should fancy ?—It is. A great many employers are already now putting the fund from fines into public objects. Then (g) the absence of compulsory register of deductions for damage has certainly hampered the inspectors' work in reviewing all the circumstances in individual cases, including the relative loss to employer and relative responsibility of the worker. (h) There have been found a few instances of employers giving up all methods of fining for discipline or deducting for damage, and with good results. More instances have occurred of employers giving up deductions for damage in favour of a small disciplinary fine for neglect or default leading to the damage ; this also is a decided improvement. It is very much open to question whether an employer's assessment of damage, with power to impose it on the worker, ever is fair.

1453. Now, I am very anxious that you should give us, as far as possible according to your proof, the suggestions you have to lay before the Committee ?—My first suggestion is that the Acts should be consolidated and simplified, especially to include a clearer and wider definition of "workman," and to clear away all ambiguity about "out-workers" and about "manual labour" and "bonuses" and "wages."

1454. To begin with No. 1. Substantially you would like, with regard to truck anyhow, "out-workers" to be clearly defined as workers ?—They should be clearly included.

1455. Then as to "manual labour" ?—I would have everything included that is not clerical labour. Of course, it may be that in time it would become important to include clerical labour, owing to the condition of the clerical worker ; but that is outside the scope of the Acts that we have to administer.

1456. You give us an instance—the knitting case that you have referred to ?—It was that case that made me speak specially of the necessity of clearing up the position as to "manual labour."

1457. Then as to "bonuses" ?—We are waiting for a decision from the High Court in Ireland.

1458. Then as to "wages," we have had evidence from Mr. Cunynghame with regard to that ?—Yes, I feel it is quite beyond my power to go into all the legal difficulties connected with the question of wages.

1460. Although in point of fact she actually fingered so much money and the household got so much goods ?—Yes.

1461. May I ask you, has this case ever occurred to you—of goods being got by a member of the household of a worker and in your knowledge pawned before the week end for drink ?—No such case has been reported to me. Then I have this note : If the legislature were to decide to prohibit fines and other payments and deductions absolutely, I believe that, under present industrial conditions, such wholesale evasions would spring up that it would be found necessary to obtain power for inspectors to investigate and review the alternative methods of discipline which would be adopted by the less desirable sort of employers. That embodies what I think I have already said about the difficulty I see in the way of absolutely prohibiting fines—that we have enough instances already of employers trying to evade the Truck Act, and that we should find more cases of suspensions and that kind of thing arising. A much harder disciplinary method would be adopted probably by the less kindly employers if fines were absolutely prohibited. And, just because I feel that any uncertainty at all is a very bad thing for the worker with a small wage, I feel that more stringent regulation is needed to prevent cases of hardship. I suggest that as the worker evidently so very much prefers the method of paying over any penalty that is asked of her, it would be better to prohibit absolutely all deductions and stoppages—that is, that the worker should handle her gross wage.

1462. Now have you considered the alternative to that of the possible—I do not say actual—but possible dismissals being more frequent, supposing that no deduction were permissible by law ?—But of course I am assuming that payments might still be made by a worker under a contract to the employers.

1463. I am not quite sure that I follow that. Let us see how you work that out ?—I have already said that I think the absolute prohibition of all payments by way of fines is at present hardly practicable.

1464. For the reason I was suggesting, that it would induce probably more frequent dismissals ?—Yes, but my object is to give the worker a larger share in making the contract, a more clear position of right of control over his or her wages. I suggest it simply as a method of providing her a better position in the contract. There have been instances where the workers seem perfectly willing to submit ; they say " That was my own fault, and I paid it." There are cases where they feel that they must bear a share in the result of doing things that were entirely their own fault ; but the important thing is that the worker should handle the whole gross wage in cash. I am assuming that " wages " will be clearly defined so that it is the whole sum contracted to be paid. Payments and contracts to make payments out of gross wages should be regulated by or under the Act, i.e. the Act should enumerate the payments to be regulated, and the Secretary of State might be empowered to extend the list as need arises. For instance, we have discovered in recent years that further regulation is needed for deductions for messrooms and the services of a cook and the use of a kitchen, and so on. So often there is a gain to the worker in having these things supplied that I think they ought to be permitted, under proper regulations.

1465. The authority to regulate you suggest should be the Home Office ?—Yes, the Secretary of State for the Home Department. Then I would have the principles of the Act of 1896 extended and strengthened as regards contracts and payments out of gross wages. I mean that the worker should be absolutely assured that the employer cannot compel payment from him or her of any sum out of the nominal or gross wage except on the basis of a clear and reasonable contract, subject at any stage to the criticism of the Home Office Inspectors, to which the worker definitely consents, particulars in writing being furnished by the employer to the worker for each payment or instalment of a payment—that is, that at every stage, if you do spread it out at all, there must be clear particulars given about the instalments ; and there should be a register kept of each such payment, open at all times to the examination of the Home Office Inspector.

1466. Now, that is a very elaborate and significant suggestion. Do you adhere to that, and urge it, in view of your experience as an inspector ?—That is my suggestion. I do not know how far it could be worked out.

1467. But you think that would be a great social advantage ?—I think so. There are a good many things that it would be a hardship to prohibit absolutely, such as the supply of messrooms by the employer ; he can do it so much better than the workpeople, and it would be so much a gain to the worker to have it supplied under reasonable regulations that the employer should not be allowed to make a profit out of it, and that the worker should get good value for his money. Then my fourth suggestion is that the employer should be debarred from making any profit out of anything charged to the worker under the contract, or in any way charging to the workers the cost or part of the cost of any statutory obligation. laid upon himself, that is that for sweeping, supplying overalls, the prevention of accidents and so on, the employer should be absolutely debarred from charging them to the worker. Then my fifth head is this: Payment for damage to materials or other property through bad work or negligence should I think be required by the employer of his worker only by way of disciplinary or deterrent fine—that he should not have the power to assess his damages in the way that he has at present—and that the fine should be reasonable in amount in relation to the worker's wage and skill, and should not exceed a fixed maximum proportion of wage. For serious damage due to wilful neglect or misconduct, it is my opinion that the employer ought not to rely on anything but the ordinary civil law, in addition to his power to warn and ultimately dismiss an unsatisfactory servant. Possibly there might be some new development of courts to meet the technicalities of damages in industry. In Germany, I believe that they have special courts ; also in France—the Conseils de Prudhommes. That is a special court, composed of a judge or judges, together with representatives of the employers and employed, and disputes between workers and employers involving sums of money up to a certain limit may be decided by those courts as relating to damages done in work.

1468. We are just in the old trouble that I have been trying to get at, namely, who is to determine " fair and reasonable." I suggest this to you again : Do you think that it would not be possible to have the inspectorate which visits, to determine that in the first instance, with an appeal to the Home Office ?—That would be another method ; that would be quite a workable method I suppose, but it is bringing into the Home Office an enormous burden of new work with all the technicalities of trades and so forth, and I do think that the workers and employers, if the work is properly carried on, ought to be able to settle those questions themselves.

1469. Would you suggest an employers' and workers' committee for a particular district ?—With the help of a judge, so that really judicial training and experience should come in—that there should be proper evidence and proper procedure.

1470. Have you any personal experience of the working of those courts in France ?—I am sorry I have not. I have often wished to go and listen to cases being heard there. Then I go on to suggest that direct prohibition should be made of compulsory purchase by the worker of damaged work, or of any set off on account of damaged article.

1471. You are in favour of direct prohibition there ?—Yes, we have had some good decisions from the magistrates in respect of our contention that the workers should not have damaged goods given to them, but there is an element of doubt in the consideration. Then my sixth suggestion is that charges for the supply of power, machines, standing room, light, heat etc., are tending to lessen, or in some cases disappear. Charges for material such as sewing cotton or needles, used in manufacture, remain very general, (especially in cases where wages are lowest) and are very difficult to adequately control. As to Subsection (b) of Section 3 (1)—that is as to the real cost or the estimated cost, I suggest that the time has come for prohibiting this kind of charge on the workers' wage, because it presses most hardly and with greatest uncertainty on the poorest and worst paid labour. Recent instances where employers have abolished the charge show that it is possible.

1472. Could you give us any of those recent instances ?—There was a case in the bootmaking trade, where the employer set to work to make up his mind what was the cost of the materials used for the work paid for by the workers ; he made it $\frac{17}{20}$ths and $\frac{3}{20}$ths. ; $\frac{17}{20}$ths was the worker's wage, and $\frac{3}{20}$ths in his factory was the amount of charge for cotton and so on. So he abolished all charges, and agreed with the workers on the $\frac{17}{20}$ths wage. He was a good business man, and he did it in that way, and it worked, I believe, quite satisfactorily.

1473. In the case of this humble class of worker, where 1d. or 2d. is a great consideration, would there be any risk on the other side, namely, that there might be the removal of materials and use of them by the worker ?—I think that the employer ought to be able to control that by proper discipline and proper records.

1474. He would have, to begin with, a general knowledge of the material that was reasonable for a particular operation ?—Certainly. Then my seventh suggestion is this. I ask, in order to simplify and strengthen proceedings against an occupier who has unfairly fined a worker an excessive amount, or charged too heavily for materials or damage, and has made no contract for any such fines, etc., can the Act be so drafted as to enable an inspector to proceed immediately for the unreasonableness of the fine as well as for fining at all in absence of a contract ? As the law stands, the defendant objects to any evidence being brought on any point but the fact that a contract did not exist, and the offence is made to appear merely technical. I think a fixed standard of " fair and reasonable " is necessary. Funds from fines should go to some public institution or to a workmen's club, and should be audited. This is the law in Germany.

1475. On that head would you kindly have sent to Mr. Bettany copies of the informations upon which the inspectors have proceeded in this country and in Scotland, because I am not yet satisfied that it would not be possible to frame the matter alternatively ; the alternative that I suggest, if it were competent, would meet the case, would it not ?—Yes ; I will have copies sent to Mr. Bettany.

1476. The case is this ; that you could charge A.B., being an employer, with having no contract with C.D. ; or otherwise with having a contract with C.D. which was not fair and reasonable ?—Of course that would be a purely verbal contract. If it could be interpreted in that sense under this Act, well and good; but the whole Act of 1896 goes to make it that the contract must be in writing.

Miss A. M. Anderson.

9 June 1906.

1477. I see the difficulty. Then you will give us samples of these informations; what I mean is, instances in which you have been obliged to proceed, charging the accused only with the absence of a contract, whereas you are aware in your own mind that the substance of the offence was something behind that, namely, that it was a bad contract that had been made; Do you follow me ?—Yes. Then my eighth suggestion is, that voluntary provision of mess-rooms, medical attendance, etc., by employers for workers (of course from dangerous trades, where they are obliged to provide mess-rooms) is a real gain in many cases to workers. I think it should be allowed, under regulations, but the use of and payment for them by the workers should not be compulsory or part of the contract of hiring.

1478. You say, under regulations; who is to make the regulations ?—I think that is covered by an earlier suggestion of mine—"The principles of the Act of 1896 to be extended and strengthened as regards contracts and payment out of gross wages." As it is, we have complaints from workers about mess-room charges, and it is very doubtful whether those are outside or inside the existing Truck Act. We see that it is a great gain to the workers to have the mess-room; the employers give us information about it quite willingly, and the workers tell us about it. Provided the workers are not compelled to use the mess-room and compelled to pay, and the charge reasonable, we raise no objection. It could be quite easily regulated, I think.

1480. Then about the living in system ?—Suggestions will be made by Miss Deane. That comes closely in connection with the voluntary provision of mess-rooms. Then the ninth suggestion is that the truck contract notice should be confined to truck matters, and should be inclusive. Stray supplementary notices should have no legal force as a contract. The worker should be assured that the one truck notice handed to her contains the whole of the contract.

1481. Are there instances of that ?—A great many. We endeavour to get them all on to one notice, but I think it wants making clear.

1482. So that the worker should know ?—So that the worker should know what is the whole contract. I think that those stray notices should not have any legal force at all. The original notice should contain the whole contract.

1483. Then there is one subject you have not dealt with, and that is shops ?—They come so little within our purview. We have a few cases where a worker is employed both in the workshop and in the shop; they come under Section 31 of the Factory Act.

1484. Have you any doubt that in the shops not a few of the abuses which you have been endeavouring to correct still prevail ?—I have no doubt about it at all; I think there must be still there in force long lists of fines such as we have gradually got rid of in factories and workshops.

1486. And so far as you can see, the duty of the State with regard to interposing is the same ?—I think so, so far as I can see.

1487. You have no difficulty in figuring to your mind cases of possible severe hardship in shops ?—I have heard of very hard cases—enormous fines—fines really almost exceeding those that we have been familiar with in the past in factories.

By Mrs. Tennant.

1488. You have just given us an example of good resulting from abandoning a system of charging for materials and supplying materials instead. I think you also referred to good having resulted from the employer abandoning the system of fines for discipline. Can you give us examples of cases in which the employer has abandoned the system of fines and secured discipline without their aid ?—I think you will get the best evidence of that in detail from Miss Squire and Miss Deane, because they have been on the spot and have seen the factory under the old régime and under the new régime. I have heard them speak of the improved discipline in factories where fines have been abolished. I have had reports from both Miss Squire and Miss Deane as to that. They will be able to speak from personal knowledge of the general results in the factory.

1489. Do you think it would be better to ask them, or have you yourself thought of what might result from the prohibition of disciplinary fines; have you any hope that a new race of disciplinarians—a new race of foremen and forewomen or managers—might arise who would be able to obtain better discipline if the power of fining were removed ?—It is evident from those cases we have seen and heard of that to a certain extent there will be a supply of foremen and forewomen of that sort to the demand; when the demand arises for good disciplinarians who can work without fines, they will begin to come forward. But I have already said that I hardly think the time is ripe for requiring it of everybody. I think that some people would not have the patience—that is the risk—and that some worse method of discipline might be adopted.

1490. Your experience of the present attempts, and successful attempts, to evade the Truck Acts does not enable you, you think, to anticipate the result of further attempts; you do not think that these alternatives could be met by the law ?—I think that if the prohibition arose you would have to give power to the inspectors to survey those new methods of discipline, and it would not be possible to enumerate them all. Ingenuity is very great in those conditions. You might find some new method of discipline rise up that was injurious and resulted hardly to the worker, that was not included, if you attempted to make a complete list.

1491. And you do not think the results so far have been sufficiently widespread of cases in which the employers have successfully supplemented fines by better organisation and better foremen, to enable you to speak as to the possible results of further efforts in that direction ?—They are not sufficiently widespread for me to be able to form a conclusion. We have got cases of employers binding themselves together to improve their contract notices; that is to make them less harsh, but I know of no body of employers meeting together and agreeing that they will try to do without fines.

1492. The individual cases do not supply sufficient experience ?—No.

1493. Now, I see you suggest that among the charges—not deductions—but among the charges which might be made legal, are charges for medical attendance. You suggest that those should be subject to regulation. Would you include in the regulation any provision for criticism of the medical officer who is chosen—I mean as to his qualifications ?—I think it very important that the worker should be free—that there should be no compulsion in it at all—that it should be entirely voluntary.

1494. Then you would not take into account the fact that a thing may be nominally optional and may in fact be compulsory; certain suggestions are made and the worker is made to feel that if he does not accept the thing which is voluntary he will in fact not get employment at that place, though it is not directly so stated ?—Surely the ordinary provision for preventing incompetent doctors from practising ought to have some effect there, joined with the fact that the worker would be free. I am taking rather the existing law, which allows medical attendance to be included, and I have not enough evidence to make me feel that it ought to be abolished; it may be good; it may be greatly to the advantage of the worker; the employer may be able to make such a contract that it would be entirely to the advantage of the worker, just as in the case of mess-rooms.

1495. You would not say more than that ?—No I have not enough evidence to make me feel that it ought to be prohibited.

1496. Have you considered at all the fact that the worker may perhaps be a member of some society which enables him to have the advantage of medical attendance ?—That is very important, and I do think that the inspector should have power to intervene and see that no sort of compulsion, direct or indirect, was brought to bear in any particular case. If I had any evidence of serious abuses I would be quite ready to go to the extent of prohibiting.

1497. I gather that you would be in favour of abolishing any possibility of the employer retaining wages in the circumstances which you have described; you would like it included in any amendment of the Truck Acts—that wages should not be retained for the purposes you have stated ?—Yes, I feel that very strongly. The money should be handed over intact to the worker, and the worker should be free to pay out anything agreed upon.

1498. If the permission to deduct from wages, or the permission to make charges (it is not necessary to call them deductions) were continued, you think the inspectors should be given power to demand books or other materials which would be necessary for calculation ?—Certainly.

1499. Have you considered the fact that for damage, that has really arisen out of the supply of bad material by the employer, the worker may already have paid for that damage in the loss of time which she has incurred owing to the difficulty of doing work with the bad material—that is in the case of a piece worker ?—That has been in my mind in the past; it certainly was not quite on the surface in my mind just now: but I think it is most important, and I think it would be one of the elements of fairness and reasonableness.

1500. Do you think any specific reference should be made to it as a sort of set-off which the worker should be entitled to ?—I think it would be a gain to have it referred to.

1501. Would you be inclined to recommend the prohibition of fining below a certain wage. You have suggested that, if fines are continued, they ought to be in a certain proportion to the wage earned by the worker. Would you go further, and say that below a certain wage no fine should be allowed ?—I think it is quite possible. I think it would be a good thing, where the workers' wage is very, very low. There are some instances that I could find amongst our papers of a wage that practically falls, already, below subsistence level, and where skill ought not to be exacted of the worker. In those cases certainly I think there may be a level below which no fining should be allowed. That is the principle, I think, of fixing a maximum.

1502. Would you care to suggest such a level ?—Not without thought. I think it would have to bear some relation to the conditions of local trade and the local cost of living.

1503. Do you think that the fact that an unskilled worker is employed upon valuable material could be so taken into account that it could be specified, and not merely left as among the matters which the judge or the inspector or the court would take into account in assessing the amount of compensation ?—I am not quite sure that I follow you; do you suggest that it should be specified in the contract ?

1504. In any form—either by law or in the contract. If an employer employs on valuable material a worker upon whose skill he cannot really rely, and who in the employer's own interest ought not to be employed on those materials, do you think it would be possible either for the contract or for the statute to refer to that as an element which should be taken into account in assessing the amount of compensation ?—I should be glad to see it in the law, if it could be put in; it is certainly a most important element, where the employer wilfully gives very, costly materials to a totally unskilled worker and takes the risk, and then tries to push off the result in the way of injury on the unfortunate worker.

1505. Have you formed any very strong feeling about the instalment system ?—Yes, there have been very bad cases of the instalments being continued over a very long period of time. There ought to be a time limit, I think, but then of course that time limit would come in if you fixed a maximum proportion of wage. The maximum proportion of wage being fixed would rule out nearly all these very hard cases that we know of, where a worker is £2 or £5 or even up to £10 in debt to the employer for alleged damage to work.

Miss A. M. Anderson.

19 June 1906.

1506. Then you suggest that it should be not only a proportion of the weekly wage, but a proportion of the total wage ?—Yes, and also that in piece work you should distinguish between one piece of work and another; that is, that the worker should not be penalised on another piece of work in which she has done good work for a mistake she has made on less well executed work.

By Mr. Ramsay MacDonald.

1507. Have you gathered any general impression from your experience during recent years as to whether offences under the Truck Act are diminishing, taking them all round ?—Certain offences are diminishing—the failure to make a contract, and formal offences of that kind, are diminishing, and I think many cases have been found and discussed and threshed out with the employers where we know now that they have ceased to exact such heavy penalties from their workers—improvements in those individual instances to our knowledge have taken place.

1508. Let us take one case—disciplinary fines of a general character, like the observance of due order and decorum—do you think that class of fining is decreasing ?—We have objected to a great many contracts, and the employers have accepted our objection and have improved them, but there are a certain number of cases where that vague contract was adopted and we were powerless to take action because of the decision of the High Court.

1509. And you know that that is still in operation ?—Yes.

1510. Then take another class of case—disciplinary fines of a more specific character; we have had some instances given to us, such as fines for sitting on a wheelbarrow, or a case of whistling, or a case of wearing flowers ?—Those particular instances have not come to my knowledge, but equally striking instances have.

1511. I mentioned those as examples of the class of fines. Do you think that class of fine is diminishing ?—We have ruled them out in many cases; we have got the employers to accept our opinion. In those cases they are gone where the employer has accepted our opinion, but there are cases where they still do exist.

1512. Am I right, do you think, in assuming that where those breaches of contract still exist is mainly in unorganised industries ?—No, I think we have found as many infringements in organised industries.

1513. As for instance ?—Well, in the cotton and clothing trades.

1514. But, as you very properly pointed out, an absolute statistic there is altogether misleading. If you take the ratio of cases reported in the clothing industry, and then take the number of working places, and still more the number of workpeople it would diminish very much ?—Yes, I dare say it would.

1515. And it altogether upsets the apparent lesson of your absolute statistic ?—Yes, I would only say that we find those cases; I have not summed up the proportion.

1516. I am trying to visualise in my own mind what the effect of the variety of suggestions that you have made would be, particularly in women's industries. My mind is fixed upon a certain class of workshop that is not very much inspected, where the women are not organised at all, and where the general industrial condition is very little above the minimum. Do you think I am right in assuming that in that class of workshop breaches of the Truck Act, or questionable actions under the Truck Act concentrate ?—Certainly, I think they do concentrate there.

1517. You agree with me ?—Yes.

1518. Then another question that I will put to you is this: There are a very large number of those places that would be very rarely visited ?—Yes, I suppose they are visited not more than once in eighteen months, perhaps, or even once a year.

1519. Would not you say, even not then; I mean in view of the figures that were given by the Home Secretary the other day about factories ?—Yes, I should say it was almost impracticable that they should be visited even as often as that.

Miss A. M. Anderson.

19 June 1906.

1520. Then in addition to that there are a very large number of those cases that you have not discovered ?—I wonder if there are many cases that we have not discovered. The local authority has its agents going round, and they report the cases to the district inspector. In the district which is directly under the control of one of my staff, we get notices every day from the medical officers of health in seven boroughs.

1521. Is that in London ?—West London.

1522. That is where you have a specially organised department ?—Well, it is the same, or approximately the same, proportion of inspection. There is one lady inspector there in charge, and she has another lady to help her ; she may perhaps have a rather smaller number on her registers in proportion to the number of inspectors, but the difference is not very great. The officers of the local authorities are good; they are doing their work ; and they have got inspectors actively at work there in the west of London.

1523. You know that there is a Return about to be published which will throw light upon that point ?—Yes.

1524. I think you said in one part of your evidence that you did not think that the damage to goods should be assessed for the purpose of deduction by the employer. I want to get my mind clear on this point ; I thought you went rather further in one of your statements, and rather urged this idea ; that the damage should not be assessed for the purpose of bearing a deduction equivalent to the value of the damaged goods, but that the fine which should be imposed should be altogether for disciplinary purposes ? —Yes, on the general principle that I do not see my way to absolutely prohibit fines as a method of discipline.

1525. I was not thinking for the moment about fines ; I was thinking of the assessment for damage—the basis on which we should attempt an assessment, if we ever attempted an assessment at all ?—The better employers who have not yet come to the extent of abolishing all fines, quite clearly recognise that they cannot ask of the earners of a small weekly wage anything like the damage that is done, and all they want is to have power to impose a little penalty to draw the worker's attention to carelessness.

1526. Would you suggest it would be quite a practicable proposal for us to make that assessment for damages as such, should be discountenanced altogether, and that if we recognised deductions or fines, it should be for disciplinary purposes only.

1527. So far, at any rate, as damaged goods are concerned ?—Yes.

1528. For instance, in the case of the tile that has been brought before us, you would say: do not try and assess the damage done to the employer with respect to the loss entailed to him by this tile being damaged, but try and assess what fine would be necessary to make the worker—whichever worker is responsible—more careful in the future ?—That is my suggestion.

1529. Then with reference to this limit of fines and deductions in ratio to wages. Has not your experience brought you to this conclusion, that if you are going to set a limit like that—say a proportion, however small it may be—the bad employer seizes upon that admittedly reasonable proportion and makes it the minimum ?—Yes, I am afraid there is that difficulty always remaining.

1530. Then I am trying again just to visualise the sort of process. In the type of workshop that I have in mind that I have described, where there is a sort of constant tendency on the part of the employer to take back from the workman as much as possible, any attempt on our part to establish a sort of ratio between fines and wages would rather regularise the system of fining than tend to diminish fines ?—I doubt whether it would do so more than the existing law does. I think we should be taking one step forward from where we stand now, in the interests of the worker.

1531. I will put it to you rather in this way. If the law states that an employer may legitimately deduct 1s. in 10s., that is much more of an invitation to him to make the deduction than to say that fines are legitimate for certain things which we approve later on ?—But in any case you would have the indication of the limit in that direction in the existing law.

1532. So far as I have been able to grasp your proposal, my suggestion is that you give them a double invitation ; first of all you suggest the limit, and then you allow the way in which that limit may be reached ?—Well, I suggest the limit to rule out the worst cases that we know of as existing at present.

1533. That brings me to the point. Do you not think that really, as a matter of fact, what we want to do is to try and define somewhat more in detail, and more definitely than hitherto, what is "fair and reasonable" ? —Certainly ; one wants to get other elements of fairness and reasonableness brought in as tests. Mrs. Tennant has suggested some, I think. If I might give a parallel, we have a difficulty in the Factory Act in defining what constitutes overcrowding. The moment you state a maximum, you still leave cases of overcrowding, because other elements than cubic space come into overcrowding ; but, still, it is better to rule out the very worst cases of overcrowding by fixing a maximum—or rather in that case it is a minimum. It is the practical difficulty in all these problems to hit upon the essential.

1534. Then I think you suggested that we might legitimately recognise payments in respect of mess-rooms, and so on ?—I find cases where the workers gain, and feel that they gain, by the access to mess-rooms.

1535. And you would put those payments in the contract ?—I think that they ought to be reviewed so that any case of abuse, or profit-making by the employer, should be ruled out.

1536. If you put those payments into the contract, does it not really eliminate the voluntary nature of the payments ?—You might put it shortly in the contract itself that no worker need belong—that it is not to be a condition of hiring.

1537. But that if they do belong, they have to pay for such advantages ?—Yes. I think if you could get it put into the contract, that might meet the difficulty practically.

By Mr. Brotherton.

1538. The first note I have made relates to non-regulated laundries. You have had some little experience of them, because there are some that you have been able to inspect. Might I ask your views as to how you think generally they are being conducted; I mean, of course, in relation to where the Truck Act may come in as to the proper and full payment of the workers in them ?—I do not think we have investigated the question of the application of the Truck Acts to these institution laundries ; I have no information as to those.

1539. Then concerning fines ; you have expressed yourself more than once as rather against the total abolition of fines—I take it because you think that other evils might creep in which might possibly be worse than perhaps small fines ?—Yes, that is really the difficulty.

1540. Now, with regard to fines, you mentioned early on that some of the better employers, I think you termed them, had dispensed with fines ?—Yes, there are instances.

1541. If in these particular cases they find that they have sufficient for discipline without fines, there would appear to be no necessity for a power to fine being retained by the employer ?—The cleverer, the better, and the kindlier employers seem to be able to manage without ; the other employers are not all equally clever and well-intentioned.

1542. But by doing away with fines, would you not be likely at the same time to improve the employers and to make them better, both in intention and in act ?—I wish I could see my way to it.

1543. With regard to the amount obtained from the fines on the workers, I suppose you will suggest that the employers should not in any way benefit ?—That is part of my suggestion that the fund should be used for some public object or for the workers' benefit, and that the accounts should be audited.

1544. That is a little vague perhaps. Could you say to what public object or what particular benefit for the workers the money might be contributed ?—Sometimes they send the money as it is to hospitals. Sometimes they have an annual treat for the workers. Sometimes the money goes into some benefit fund for the workers ; we have great variety of instances. The German Industrial Code definitely decides that it must be for the direct benefit of the workers in the factory, I think.

1545. For the general benefit?—Yes.

1546. Then you cannot see your way to recommend the total abolition of fines, but you do strongly advocate that the fines should not be in any way contributed towards the employer, but for the benefit of the workers?—Yes.

1547. With regard to the difficulties under legal proceedings, you mention that there has not been the desired progress because of difficulties in relation to legal proceedings. I do not know whether you have any suggestion to make as to how legal proceedings might be made easier?—I was referring particularly to the question of the definition of reasonableness and fairness. That is the main difficulty. There was, of course, at the outset all the uncertainty of a new Act, and there were various decisions, as I say, that we got from the magistrates which were helpful in clearing up the meaning of it all. As time goes on that difficulty lessens.

1548. With regard to the retention of wages, you mentioned a case where a workwoman contributed 3d. a week until the amount reached one week's earnings?—Yes, in order to enable the employer to control her movements.

1549. This retention of wages does not appear to you to come within the scope of the Truck Acts?—I believe it does not come in; it certainly does not seem so to me, and the Chief Inspector was of the same opinion.

1550. I must confess my surprise at that. I should take it that the object of the Truck Act is that the worker should receive wages, and the retention of wages is certainly the reverse of that?—Non-payment of wages is held to be outside the scope of the Truck Act. We cannot take action if an employer fails to pay the week's wages to the worker. We have many cases of that sort referred to us, and the worker is told that she must make a civil claim.

1551. I could understand a civil claim in the case of bankruptcy or insufficient funds, but I cannot understand that the civil claim can be the only remedy for an employer retaining wages for disciplinary purposes; surely that would come within the province of the Truck Act?—I am quite willing to test it if the legal advisers think it advisable.

By Mr. Cawley.

1552. Do you ever find cases where an employer really systematically tries to swell his own profits by means of fines?—I think there were a few instances a good many years ago where we suspected something of that sort, but I have seen nothing recently at all that would lead me to suspect it.

1553. May we say that in these times the day when employers would attempt to swell their profits by a system of fines has gone by?—I think they do to a certain extent increase their profits in what might be called the sweated industries by these charges for cotton and so on.

1554. But in any of the larger industries protected by trade unions such a thing you would say cannot happen?—No, I do not think it can happen.

1555. Should you say that generally speaking the cases of infringement of the Truck Act are greatly diminishing?—The description I gave, I think, goes as far as I can say—that certain classes of infringement are disappearing and certain kinds of charges are lessening, and we do not have these long lists of fines to deal with that we used to have in the past; the instances are rarer.

1556. Really the inspection that you and your subordinates give is being met in many cases by employers in a fair manner—I mean, your suggestions are being adopted?—There are many instances where they quite heartily adopt our suggestions.

1557. Then the increase of the number of factory inspectors would be an enormous advantage to the country, and without legislation would possibly lead to a better state of affairs, would you say?—Certainly, if you have the right kind of inspector, sufficiently trained and experienced to get this kind of co-operation on the part of the employer.

Miss A. M. Anderson.

1558. Your subordinates can only go into many places about once in about eighteen months or a couple of years, but if you had sufficient inspectors to take the whole country and visit every six months, would not that lead to a very much better state of affairs?—No doubt there would be an improvement if there were more frequent visits up to a certain point. I do not know that six months is an ideal to be aimed at in some cases.

1559. I rather understood from you that in many cases employers have met you. What I want to put before you is this. Seeing that you often are met reasonably, if there were a greater number of inspectors it would improve the state of affairs very much?—Surely it would; I think there could be no doubt that it would up to a certain point, but frequency of inspection would not meet the case of the employers who resist you.

1560. But is that frequent?—There are those cases that I have mentioned where the employers still adhere to a very vague contract with their workers, and they are upheld by that decision of Squire v. Bayer; and there are all the cases which are just on the border line, which would not be very safe to take into court, as to fairness and reasonableness of a particular notice, and where the employer does not meet you. There are a certain number of those cases.

1561. Therefore, you think the law in those cases might be strengthened?—Yes.

1562. Then, on this question of fines, I quite see the point that putting a maximum might be used by certain employers to put their fines up to the maximum, but do not you think that you could meet such cases by saying that no fine for spoilt or bad work must exceed 5 per cent. of the wages; do you think that that would be a good or a bad thing?—In a few cases where the employers have adopted that standard it certainly has meant an improvement in the individual factories. That particular scale was not suggested by myself, but some of my colleagues in certain parts of the Midlands had persuaded the occupiers to adopt that standard, and there is no doubt that it reduces the amount of deductions from the workers' wages in those cases; they were higher than 5 per cent. before.

1563. The difficulty would be in the case of people earning very small wages; you would have to take a lot of local circumstances into account, and it would be difficult to fix the point at which no deduction should be made. Seeing that 5 per cent. would not come to much on a very small wage, do not you think that it would be perhaps better to fix a maximum of 5 per cent. rather than to try to define at what point fines should cease altogether?—Would it not be easier to work?—I should like to think it out in relation to a certain number of individual cases before I finally expressed an opinion as to the exact standard.

1564. You see, it would not affect the class of work they were doing; I mean, if a poor worker were working on a piece of velvet and made a hole in it, she could not on that be charged on the value of the material that she was working on; it would be 5 per cent. of the wages she was entitled to, independent of the kind of work she was doing. I was wondering whether you would not think that that perhaps would be better?—A 5 per cent. deduction on a wage of 5s. 6d. would be about 3d. If it was the total for the week, I suppose if the worker had been really careless and all the circumstances tended to make her really responsible, it might possibly be fair. Of course there are other elements.

1565. To put it more easily, it could not exceed 6d. on 10s.?—It could not exceed that, and it might be much less.

1566. I was rather pressing the point, because it seems to me that that would be one way out of the difficulty?—I would only add that if the wage was below a certain amount there ought to be no deduction at all.

1567. You would have that as well?—Yes.

1568. Then you said there was a great difficulty in fixing that amount?—Yes; one would have to think about it.

1569. Now I want to ask if you have ever thought of any substitute that you could possibly make for a fine for bad attendance or for coming late in the morning.

Miss A. M. Anderson.

9 June 1906.

You spoke of some substitute for disciplinary fines ?—Will you kindly ask that question of some of the inspectors, who would give you the individual instances in the different factories where fines have been abolished ; they would be able to speak with certainty of the methods that have been adopted in the place of fines.

1570. Where needles and other things are part of the system—part of the system not only in the particular factories, but in the trade generally—you would suggest that by Act of Parliament we should alter the whole system ; there are trades in which materials such as needles are provided by the worker, and that is the system in the whole trade ?—That kind of intervention was attempted by the Hosiery Wages Act of 1874, and it practically did on the whole stamp out charges for frames. It was the system to charge frame rents when that Act was passed, I believe, and now it is not the system.

1571. But in cases where the articles could be easily purloined, would you say that that would be equitable ? —I think the employer could adopt methods of discipline to impose some check on the amount supplied to a worker, and if he or she required an unreasonable amount it could be dealt with partly by disciplinary measures, by fines if necessary, if the employer adopted that method, or warning, and ultimately, of course, the employer need not retain a very unsatisfactory servant ; he would always have that final remedy.

By Mr. Maddison.

1572. I gathered from your evidence that you were against deductions for spoilt work ?—On the basis of payment to the employer for the damage done by the worker.

1573. But that you would be agreeable to what you call a disciplinary fine to prevent that ?—In a limited sense.

1574. How would that be taken, do you think, by employers of women generally—I mean in the tailoring trades—say a worker spoilt a waistcoat or what not, how would that operate on them if they did not get what they called the loss to them ? I take it the fines that would be imposed would also be governed by your condition that they should not go into the funds of the employer in any way ?—Yes, I think there are really practically now only a few instances where the employer gets back what he has lost by the damage, it is generally only a proportion, because the worker is handling goods that are valued at a far higher rate than her labour.

1575. Then part of his loss under the present system is met ?—A proportion is met, but there have been cases, and Miss Squire could give you instances and proportions, where after a prosecution for excessive charges for damage the employers in that district have practically ruled out of their contracts charges for damage. I think in Leeds in many cases the employers have ceased to make those charges.

1576. Does your evidence on this point apply to what we may call the sweated trades ?—No, I think the cases I have referred to are rather better—they are well organised factories where a fair wage can be earned.

1577. But in the sweated trades themselves are there not bad cases of the employer trying to get back something to recoup himself for some loss ?—Yes, there are cases. Practically he cannot do it, because the wages are so low that he could not entirely repay himself.

1578. Therefore, if the employer got nothing but a part, and this occurs often, the mere fact that in this case he fined would not prevent him from discharging the girl or the woman ?—I think in a great many cases it would. He would be quite content to feel that he was able to bring it home to the worker that he objected to this kind of carelessness, if it was carelessness.

1579. Arising out of this matter of fines never going to the profit of the employer, but going into some fund for the general benefit either of the whole community or of the workshop, what has been your experience of the method of fining amongst girls (especially girls) where that system did prevail ; has it in any way operated to prevent arbitrary fines, and irritating and excessive fines ? —The administration certainly has operated to a considerable extent in different parts of the country to prevent that.

1580. What administration ?—I mean the administration of the factory inspectors generally.

1581. I have not made my point plain. We will take a factory where the conditions you have laid down about fines not going to the employer's profit are complied with absolutely, and the employer does not make a penny out of the fines. Have excessive and arbitrary fines ceased to a greater degree in those factories than in those where the other system operates ?—My impression is that the general scale of fines has decreased in those cases.

1582. I will put this further question : You would not in any way minimise your objection to fines of a particular kind because they are paid into a common fund which does not go to the employer ?—No, I certainly think that arbitrary and irritating fines should not be allowed any more. They need regulation just as much under the system of the employer not making profit out of them.

1583. I would like to know what is your experience and opinion of the effect of the exclusion of the weaving industry, especially as it affects women, from the Act of 1896. Do you think the women weavers have gained or lost by that exclusion ?—We have had complaints from the women, and we have found cases where they really had had deductions and fines that seemed to us unreasonable. Of course that exemption does not apply throughout the kingdom ; it only applies to a part of the kingdom.

1584. I am thinking of a part where it does apply. What would be your opinion there, or have you sufficient experience to enable you to form an opinion, as to whether they have lost or gained by being outside the Act of 1896 ? —The indications, so far as they have reached us, have tended to show that the women have lost by being outside the Act.

1585. Now what happens. A woman weaver in Blackburn or any other place spoils a piece of work ; she is outside the Act of 1896, and deductions cannot be made ? —Deductions can be made.

1586. Then it only applies to fines, does it ?—The Act applies generally to fines, damages and tool charges. The Act of 1896 does not apply at all in that district.

1587. I rather wanted to compare the case of a woman working in Blackburn or Burnley who does not come within the Act, and the case of a woman who does come within the Act ?—In Bristol and other places the inspectors have taken action in cases similar to those that arise among workers who were not in any trade union and were not organised.

1588. Your point is that the better organisation which undoubtedly exists in the the textile trades for women has not made up to the women worker the advantage which she would have got if she had been under the Act ? —I think not. The indications of complaints we have had are that way.

1589. Then about laundries in religious institutions, you say you have had no experience to make it possible for you to give us an opinion as to whether truck does prevail ?—They are many of them not paid any wage at all ; they are given food, and living. It would be rather under the living-in system that the question would arise.

1590. But you are aware that many do employ outside labour ?—If they employ outside labour then they are within the law.

1591. Are they ?—Yes.

1592. Even in connection with religious institutions ?— Yes.

By Mr. Delevingne.

1593. I did not quite gather from you what your general view of the value of the Act of 1896 was. In your annual report for 1901 you quote a passage from a report made to you by Miss Squire upon the working of that Act, in which she said : "The Truck Act, 1896, has now been in force five years and in my experience it has by degrees produced in that time in spite of limitations a most marked effect upon fines and deductions in all parts of the country to the advantage of the workpeople." Then she goes on to develop that. Do you think she went too far in saying that ?—Not at all. It has brought out into public view ever so many abuses and evils that were utterly unknown before and that we could not deal with. Certainly the Act of 1896 has been a great step forward.

1594. You say that it has remedied to a certain extent abuses of that kind?—It has remedied a great many abuses that were legal until that Act was passed.

1595. But as regards the three great abuses at which it was aimed, do you think it has remedied them?—It certainly has done a great deal of good towards remedying those.

1596. And you think its main defects of detail might be remedied by amendment. The faults are not so much faults in the structure of the Act as faults of detail?—Certainly. I strongly believe in the principles of the Act being extended and strengthened. Abuses have come to light that never could have come to light otherwise.

1597. Then you went on to say that your suggestion was that all deductions and charges of all kinds from wages by the employer should be prohibited, but you would leave the employer to recover whatever charges or deductions he might be authorised by law to make by his ordinary civil remedy?—You mean as to damages, but, generally speaking, I would say that, under the contract, certain payments could be required in respect of fines.

1598. What you say is, "Deductions and stoppages of every kind from gross wages or the sum contracted to be paid as well as payment otherwise than in current coin," and so on, should all be made illegal?—Yes, and I go on: "So that the worker handles the whole gross wage in cash. Payments and contracts to make payments out of gross wages to be regulated by or under the contract."

1599. You mean you would not allow the employer to make any deduction?—He should not first deduct the amount that he thinks is his. He should hand the worker the wage and the worker should hand back the amount that he agrees to pay under the contract.

1600. Then how would the employer recover from the worker any fine or charge at all?—You mean suppose the worker were to walk off with the whole of her wage in her hand and decline to pay any of these charges.

1601. I want to see what your proposal is and what the advantage of it is?—It simply strengthens the position of the worker in making a contract, I think, that he or she is in a stronger position to agree to these charges on wages.

1602. Do you mean, supposing that under the contract whatever it may be the employer is entitled to impose a fine of 1s. upon the worker, that when pay day comes round the employer should hand over the full amount of the wages to the worker?—Yes.

1603. Then what follows; does the worker immediately pay back the 1s. to the employer?—Yes, if she agrees that it is a fair and reasonable amount. If she does not agree, I suppose she can appeal to the inspector.

1604. If she does not agree and refuses to pay the 1s. the employer's only remedy is to recover it by civil proceedings in the courts under the contract?—Yes. Of course the worker would then and there have to face immediate dismissal.

1605. I fail to see what advantage your suggestion is?—It is simply, I think, that it puts the worker in a better position with the employer; it treats the worker rather more as a willing agent in the matter, and as someone who has a right to make a free contract. That is my impression, from the statements of workers, who say: "We do not mind paying a fine for a thing that we know to be wrong, and that we ought not to have done."

1606. It comes back to the idea of some tribunal to determine between the employer and employed whether the fine is reasonable or not?—That is what it comes to. It is rather a fine point. I am quite aware that the difference between subtracting the amount first and paying the worker and letting her pay the fine back is a fine point, but I think something turns upon it.

1607. You advocate the abolition of all charges for materials and you think that the employer is sufficiently protected by his powers of exercising discipline in the factory?—I advocate the abolition of all charges for materials used in the work.

1608. And you think the employer is able to protect himself against waste by the exercise of supervision and discipline?—I think that is so.

1609. How about outworkers, when the employer gives not only the stuff to be made up but also the materials to make it up with; he has not the same power there of protecting himself, has he?—If he gives out the material to be sewn, for instance, it is only the stuff that is used in the material that the worker is charged for; there are so many yards on every reel, and an approximate estimate can be arrived at of the amount that should be used in any sort of garments.

1610. I suppose he must allow a certain margin in any case for waste?—He must, I suppose.

1611. Can he protect himself against the substitution of other material?—I suppose fraud of that kind might arise sometimes. I should think he would be able to see whether the silk that he gave out had been used; and he might ask for the reel to come back with what is left on it.

1612. That is not the best instance for my point, but I imagine that it might in certain cases happen—and that that is the advantage to the employer of the system,—that by making the worker pay for the materials he ensures his own materials being used?—Yes. Certain employers have renounced that system and find that they work better without it.

1613. Were those employers of outworkers or employers of factory hands?—I know of cases of employers of factory hands, and Miss Squire would no doubt be able to answer your question about the outworkers; I could not say off-hand.

1614. Your idea is that in factories at any rate the employer would still supply the material?—Yes.

1615. He would not leave it to the workers to bring their own materials?—No.

1616. On that question of fines which were legalised in Squire v. Bayer; you realise, do you not, that fines must be for something which causes loss to the employer or hindrance or interruption to his work?—Yes, I was thinking of that in the back of my mind when some of the questions were put to me to-day. Of course fines for such acts as whistling and so on may be ruled out simply through the proviso that they may not be imposed unless it is in respect of something that causes loss to the employer. In Squire v. Bayer, unfortunately, it was a case where the magistrates decided that dancing in the dinner hour might cause damage; it was not proved that it did, but they held that it might.

1617. That is the point on which they discharged the case?—Yes.

1618. Have you tried to follow that up in other cases where similar contracts have been posted up?—Not precisely similar cases—somewhat parallel cases we have discussed with employers; I do not think we have taken any cases into court that were at all parallel with it.

1619. I mean, have you in other cases tried to find whether or not the fines imposed or included in the contract were for matters which actually interfered with or were a source of damage to the employer?—Miss Squire and Miss Deane have followed up a number of cases.

1620. We shall get those from these ladies?—Yes, they are always examining contracts and workers as to the effect of a contract.

1621. In regard to that particular class of case, I mean?—Yes.

1622. One question on the subject of payment by instalment. Do you not think it would be a good thing and for the benefit of the worker that payment by instalment should be abolished altogether; though it may be hard on the worker at the moment, it would be really more for her ultimate good to have to pay the fine at once?—A good deal depends on what is done with regard to fixing the standard amount of fine.

1623. But even if the standard was fixed?—If a standard of 5 per cent. were fixed, I dare say it might be easier in the case of a very poor worker to pay 1d. a week for three weeks rather than 3d. all at once, because with a woman who is going home to buy little quantities of sugar and tea, and so on, that she wants for her family, every penny counts.

1624. But is not that system bad in this sense, that it gives an employer a hold over the worker which is bad for the worker?—Certainly, if the worker is in the debt of the employer to any serious extent it is very bad, but I would not like to impose a hardship upon the worker in that way, providing the abuse of long indebtedness went altogether.

1625. You could not impose a term, could you?—You might say that it should not exceed, say, three weeks or a month—that it should lapse at the end of a month.

By the Chairman.

1626. With regard to the cases of prosecution that you have given us, is there not another element to consider in arriving at the proportion, namely, the number of visits that you have paid in the respective trades. For instance, I give you these figures: your 500 visits to textile factories have produced five cases; 2,000 visits to non-textile places produced nine cases. Would not the frequency of the visits be an element in the case?—Yes, but I am afraid it is almost impracticable to get at that over so many years.

1627. Probably you will also observe that the existence of the abuses must first have been brought to your notice to begin with?—In a great many cases they have been, but the inspectors are not always investigating complaints; they are making routine inspections a large part of the time, and they would visit a factory and find quite as bad an abuse in a factory where there is no complaint as in one where there was a complaint.

1628. I am sorry to appear to be asking you over and over again the same thing, but would you permit me to put it in this way to you. I fancy you are in favour of a maximum quite irrespective of the destination of the fines altogether—whether they are destined for a co-operative object or not, you would have a maximum on the proportion?—Yes, I think so.

1629. A certain percentage as a maximum?—Yes.

1630. Whether the fines went to the worker's benefit or the employer's benefit, you say that you must have a maximum in order to leave, as you call it, a living wage?—That is so, because it is the only practicable test as it seems to me that can be applied; the other leaves a margin of doubt; other considerations may come in as to what is reasonable, but that one thing you can fix.

1631. Within the maximum you would also have the further direction that it would be fair and reasonable?—Certainly in regard to all the circumstances of the case, which vary in every case.

1632. And then outside the maximum you would leave the employer to the more drastic remedies of dismissal and the like; no law would deprive him of that?—No.

1633. Now assume the maximum. Would not the maximum kill the instalment principle?—Practically I think it would kill the abuse of the instalment system. You could not have a £2 or a £3 accumulation of damages.

1634. I put it to you that, whatever the offence in one week, the law has said or the regulations of the Department have said that the fines for these offences taken together should not be more than 5 per cent. of the wages; that would be the wages for that week?—The wages for that week.

1635. Then that kills the instalment principle?—Unless the employer said to some very poor worker: "You may pay that fine next week if you like."

1636. But would not that be an adjustment of something within the 5 per cent.?—That would be an adjustment of the time of payment.

1637. But the maximum would operate?—The maximum would operate, yes.

1638. So that you never could have the cases of abuse that you have experienced in past times?—No, you would never get those big sums. In the case of a woman having to pay 3d. or 4d. on a particular week's wage I see no objection (and it might be easier for the poor woman) to her paying 2d. a week for two weeks rather than 4d. straight away. I do not want to interfere beyond what is necessary.

NINTH DAY.

PRESENT.

The Right Hon. THOMAS SHAW, K.C., M.P., Lord Advocate for Scotland (Chairman).

E. A. BROTHERTON, Esq., M.P.
FREDERICK CAWLEY, Esq., M.P.
MALCOLM DELEVINGNE, Esq.
FREDERICK MADDISON, Esq., M.P.
J. RAMSAY MACDONALD, Esq., M.P.
Mrs. H. J. TENNANT.

T. E. BETTANY, Esq. (Secretary).

Miss ADELAIDE MARY ANDERSON, Principal Lady Inspector of Factories, was recalled; and further Examined.

Miss A. M. Anderson.

21 June 1906.

By the Chairman.

1639. I believe you have some further particulars that you wish to furnish?—Perhaps I may hand in the modified table (see Appendix iv, Table II) as regards the average of factory prosecution, and the average penalty (handed in).

1640. How would you in general terms describe this table?—It is a summary of the prosecutions taken by the women inspectors since 1897, under the Truck Acts and Factory Acts, with more detail as regards the Truck Acts, in order to show the class of cases.

1641. You bring it down to 1906?—Yes, so far as regards the Truck Acts, but only up to the end of 1905 with regard to the Factory Acts.

1642. To the best of your knowledge, that statement is correct?—Yes.

1643. Are there any points you would like to direct attention to in this table?—I think not, beyond those that have already been put before you as regards the ratio of cases taken under the different sections of the Truck Acts.

1644. Does the observation you made with regard to the prosecutions being libelled under the schedule of having an improper contract, but yet, having at the back of them another illegitimate element, namely, an improper fi does that apply to this table as well?—Yes, and details can in some cases be given by Miss Squire and Miss Deane, and Miss Paterson. I am under promise to provide you with draft informations used in these cases.

1645. You were going to bring up to date the schedule attached to page 238 of the report ?—Yes, I am going to do that before the middle of July, and, in addition, with regard to the tables on pages 238 and 239, of the Factory and Workshops Report for 1903, I will furnish that table brought up to date, to the best of my official information. (In regard to this see note to Question 1301.)

1646. Are there any other points you wish to mention ? —With regard to the procedure in preparing a case, I can provide the Committee with sample information forms for Scotland and for England.

1647. Do you happen to have any of these with you now ?—Yes, I have an outline form here, which is used in cases either under the Factory or the Truck Acts, but much depends upon the details that are filled in.

1648. You furnish the skeleton document ?—Yes, together with a file of papers, showing the procedure in preparing a case for prosecution (documents handed in).

1649. What is the special memorandum at the beginning of this file ?—It is used to provide additional information wherever it is necessary to expand details given in the Prosecution Report.

1650. Is it used by the inspector to whose knowledge the facts have come ?—Yes.

1651. And she forwards that to you ?—Yes, with the following form—the prosecution report.

1652. Is this prosecution report sent in order to enable a decision to be come to as to whether there should be a prosecution ?—Yes, and accompanying that is a declaration form used where it is necessary to have a full record of statements made by witnesses at the time they make them; that is under Section 119 of the Factory Act.

1654. I see that the memorandum of the lady inspector is on the left hand, and the district inspector, having considered it and made his note upon it, appends his signature ?—Yes, and it is then forwarded, along with the other papers, to me.

1655. And then you adopt the procedure with regard to prosecution, the same as in any ordinary case coming direct from your sub-inspector ?—Yes, it simply secures that any information which the inspector in charge of the district may have bearing upon the case will be duly considered.

1656. Everything up to this stage is preliminary up to actual prosecution ?—Yes.

Miss A. M. Anderson.

21 June 1906.

1657. In your opinion, is everything done up to this stage absolutely unbiassed, without any ex-parte complexion at all ?—It is the result of as faithful an inquiry into the facts as the inspector is able to make.

1658. And a prosecution is only instituted when, in your view, there is sufficient material for laying before the court proof of an actual contravention which has occurred ?—That is so.

1659. That is done from the point of view of the department for the purpose of protecting the public, and having efficient supervision.

1660. Yes. I may say that up to April, 1903, a further step was taken. Up to that date after I had fully considered the papers and formed my own opinion upon the facts, and signified that opinion, the matter was forwarded to the Chief Inspector, in order that he might also signify his opinion. But since then that step has been left to my judgment, to be taken if it is necessary.

1661. I suppose it would be found in practice that substantially the Chief Inspector usually concurred in your view ?—Yes, that was practically so.

1662. We now come to the actual information; in what way is this document lodged ?—It is taken to the court by the inspector; a summons is applied for, and subpœnas are asked for for the attendance of witnesses. A date is then fixed, convenient to everyone concerned for the hearing of the case, and that is noted in the memorandum.

1663. Then the trial takes place, and the results are set forth in the last of these documents ?—Yes.

1664. All that refers to England, but what about Scotland ?—Most of the documents are the same, but the information forms would be different. Instead of laying a separate information form for each item, one information would be laid containing the whole of the libel. It is a much more complicated document in Scotland, and needs more care in its preparation.

1665. It becomes part of the criminal process, and a copy of it is served on the accused ?—Yes. And if there is any flaw of the most formal kind in the document, the case may be dismissed without being really heard on its merits. That practically never happens in England, where, under all circumstances, a case is heard on its merits.

1666. The flaw may be with reference to the relevancy of the complaint in Soctland ?—Yes, and may I add that Miss Paterson's evidence may be important as showing the differences in Scotland. She can give special information about cotton factories in Scotland. These do not come under the exemption which applies to Lancashire. She has knowledge of Lancashire and Yorkshire and Ireland. I think she would have some interesting information to give about Scotland.

Miss ROSE E. SQUIRE, was called; and Examined.

By the Chairman.

1667. I understand you were appointed an inspector of factories in December, 1895 ?—Yes.

1668. Does the previous witness, the principal lady inspector, receive your reports ?—Yes.

1669. Has your work been that of a peripatetic inspector ?—Yes; it has been chiefly in Yorkshire and the midlands, in Bristol and Ireland, and in Wales.

1670. Have you also from time to time done a considerable amount of work in connection with factories in London ?—Yes.

1671. From 1897 (after the passing of the Act of 1896) has a large proportion of your work been administering the Truck Acts ?—Yes.

1672. And have you investigated a very large number of formal complaints received from various parts of the country ?—Yes.

1673. And made prolonged systematic inquiries in many places respecting practices within the Truck Acts ? —Yes.

1674. Will you please turn to page 227 of Mrs. Tennant's book; and in connection with that, I am a little anxious that we should have from you a quasi legal view of the situation as you go along ?—Quite so.

Miss R. E. Squire.

21 June 1906.

1675. Under the Truck Act of 1831, you have, of course, had to investigate cases of payment otherwise than in coin ?—I have.

1676. That is a complete contravention of the first section, at all events, of the Truck Acts of 1831 ?—It is.

1677. In what places do you find that, notwithstanding that longstanding statutory provision, this practice had to be dealt with and put down ?—In the north of Ireland and in Cornwall and Somerset.

1678. Please give us some details, taking the Irish case first ?—In Ireland I visited chiefly in Donegal and in County Down. In Donegal the workers take wool out from the shops in the towns to their own cabins and knit it up into socks and stockings; they then take back the socks and stockings to the shops from which they got the wool, and in all cases they received as payment, tea and other groceries. No money passed at all, and they could not obtain money. In all cases they were exceedingly poor. The men were away harvesting in Scotland in the summer time, and the women chiefly supported themselves in this way by knitting. When they brought in their work they took away the packet of tea with them.

Miss R. E. Squire.

21 June 1906.

1679. Can you tell me whether there would be any idea of how much in current coin these people were supposed to be earning?—Yes.

1680. Do you remember roughly what that would come to?—The rate would be 1s. 6d. a dozen in some cases, and 9d. or 10d. a dozen pairs in other cases.*

1681. Was that stockings or socks?—Stockings might be a little more—I mean the long golf stockings. Some of them were, I think, about 1s. 6d. to 3s. a dozen. But the shorter socks would be 9d. or 10d. a dozen. In some places they were doing gloves, which would be cheaper still.

1682. Knitted hosiery gloves?—Yes.

1683. Were these female workers?—Yes.

1684. What would be the ordinary output of such a worker? Take the case of socks, how many pairs would be produced in a week?—If a woman was supplied with wool, she might do about two dozen in a week, or if any member of her household helped her, she might do two and a-half dozen. She might do more of the smaller gloves or socks

1685. If she were paid in coin, that would mean bringing in 2s. 6d. or 3s. a week?—Yes.

1686. But instead of money she takes tea?—Yes. And the tea she would take is priced at 3s. 6d. a pound. The peasants do not drink tea at less than 3s. 6d. or 2s. 6d. a pound from the Truck shops.

1687. If there had been a free market, could they not get the same quantity of tea elsewhere at an easier rate?—They would be able to get a less expensive tea.

1688. Supposing they wanted the same tea, and had money in their hands and shops to go to, could they not get it cheaper than 3s. 6d. per pound?—It is almost impossible for me to answer that, because all the tea I saw passing was made up in wrappers belonging to the small truck shops, and I could not compare it with other tea. Nearly all the tea I secured as specimens, was done up in packets, and what was its quality, it would be dificult to say.

1689. From what one knows of the habits of that class of people, does not the idea of them paying 3s. 6d. a pound for tea not seem very extravagant?—It seemed to me so.

1690. Tea at about half that figure would have been good enough?—Yes.

1691. In point of fact, they have no free market, as I understand?—None whatever.

1692. And instead of getting their 2s. or 3s. a week, they get so many quarters of pounds of tea?—Yes, they do.

1693. Is there any other article of diet they get? Do they get sugar?—Yes, they get brown sugar and sometimes flour or maize.

1694. Have you any notion of the price of these articles?—No, I am afraid not.

1695. Have you any means of getting the information?—Yes, it could be ascertained; very likely Miss Paterson could give it. After so long an interval, I am afraid to quote any of the prices.

1696. Does the system you have described go on from week to week?—Yes it did.

1697. Was the employment steady or intermittent?—In some cases the employment was very steady. In certain districts people were kept in full work, but at other places it was intermittent, and the workers, counting the double journey to and fro, had to walk perhaps seventeen or eighteen miles, and then perhaps find there was no work for them. Most of them lived that distance away from where they got the wool. The distance I quote refers, of course, to the double journey, to and fro.

1698. Did they walk that distance?—Yes, they all did.

1699. Did you see any of them in their own homes?—Yes, I visited a very large number of cabins all over Donegal, and many in County Down and other counties.

1700. Please give us a description of that, so that we may have an idea of the ordinary home of the worker who works socks for a penny a piece, or stockings for 1½d. a piece?—Their homes would be isolated cabins; many of them on rocky soil; perched on mountain land, or on bog. They are low, one-storey cabins, with mud floors, very low roofs, often no chimney, sometimes a hole in the roof, but the smoke often finds it way out at the door. The fire would be in the middle of the floor, or at the side with no hearth, or actual fireplace. There would be a bed in one corner, and elsewhere a wooden dresser with a few pots on it; perhaps a chair, and perhaps not. Generally a cow, and perhaps a calf in one part; possibly a horse, and a pig always, with cocks and hens in the room. They would be all there together.

1701. Is there a patch of land along with such cabins?—Yes, on which they would try to grow something; but in these parts very little will grow. They may be able to rear a few potatoes, but the soil is very poor, and in many parts so rocky that it may be said there is scarcely any soil at all.

1702. Are these places storm-swept?—Yes, bleak and stormy.

1703. What does the household consist of?—Very often an old woman, the grandmother, crouching at the fire smoking a pipe; and then there are the daughters, sometimes an unmarried daughter, and a married daughter with two or three children. During a large part of the time the men are away harvesting; otherwise they will be in and out, especially at turf-cutting time.

1704. Do any of the population of that class go to the fishing?—Yes, some of them near Burtonport, and other places on the coast of Donegal, and many of the men take boats on to the lakes for trout-fishing.

1705. In such a household as you have described, would the old woman work?—Yes, she would do a little knitting.

1706. And probably so would one of the younger members of the family?—Yes, the younger women and girls.

1707. May we assume that the work of two women in such a household, if paid in current coin, would represent probably from 4s. to 6s. weekly?—Yes, frequently, but I should like an opportunity afterwards of making any necessary correction in these figures after reference to my notes.

1708. Our anxiety as a Committee is to get a picture of the whole thing, as we must describe this in our report to the Secretary of State?—Quite so.

1709. Having described the household and the dwelling, and the work, I want to ask whether, in your opinion, it is very important to have truck prohibited in the case of such out-workers?—Yes, in my opinion, most important.

1710. As we attach great weight to your evidence on account of your experience, please give us succinctly your reasons for that view?—The expenses which should be met by money extend beyond the cost of the tea and sugar and flour; there is rent, there are implements, there is help that the women need in getting in their crops when the men are away; there are seeds and necessaries for the ground and garden; there are the household goods to be renewed, and there is the clothing. The Truck masters prefer to give tea to any other thing, because I presume their profit upon it is greater, and the women drink a great deal more tea than is good for them. Many of them seem to subsist chiefly upon maize and tea.

1711. Have you any idea of the rate at which maize was debited to them?—I am afraid not.

1712. Now that you have described the condition of the poor workers, what about the other end of the scale? What kind of tradesmen deal with these people?—I should like to describe some of the truck masters. One of the principal truck masters in Donegal is the owner of what is a very fine house for the district, and a large provision shop in the main street. The women come daily to the shop in large numbers; the work they have done is taken from them and looked over, and then in direct exchange for it there is placed on the counter the tea or sugar or maize.

1713. Is the truck master a wholesale dealer in socks or stockings?—He is agent for large firms in Belfast or some other town. He takes the wool from the warehouse and sends back the socks, and in the majority of cases there is no commission given to the agents by these large firms. Therefore the agent has to make his profit entirely from the workers. If more of the firms gave even a slight commission, there would not be the same temptation to the agent to make a profit out of the poor workers. The truck masters are reputed in their district to have made their fortunes entirely out of the truck system, and in many cases the chief house in a small town is the house occupied by the truck master. The truck masters themselves employ other men, who go into the more remote districts; at a cabin in a lonely district one will often see a number of women beginning to congregate. I have watched such a place, and found the man arrive with a cart, and unpack his tea and his wool, and remain there for the day giving out wool, and taking in work and paying for it in tea.

* Miss Squire has informed the Secretary that as no money passed, and the prices were never written down, she was dependent for information as to price upon the workers' statements and they upon an estimate of the value of the goods given as wages.

1714. The truck masters are usually the commissionless agents of more central establishments?—Yes.

1715. When the socks and stockings are taken away, what class of firms deal in them, or is that beyond your beat?—Yes, it is rather beyond my beat. I saw some of them in Belfast; large wholesale warehouses, but a number of them were in Scotland.

1716. In Glasgow, or Edinburgh, or where?—I am afraid I cannot exactly say.

1717. It may be curiosity, but I think we should all like to know what is the selling price of these socks and stockings? What would be their value?—It is a little difficult to say, as there are so many different qualities. I purchased several that appeared to me the same that I had seen made. In Belfast I purchased socks that I had seen knitted in large quantities; common socks, with a good deal of brilliant colour in them, magenta and green and orange and blue. The workers are paid 6d.* per dozen for them, and I bought them for 9d. a pair. The longer stockings sell from 6s. or 7s. to 12s. a pair, which might be made at perhaps 2s. 6d. a dozen. While I was there I had to get a good many knitted gloves, for which the worker was paid 6d. per dozen. I was charged at the place 9d. for a pair, but they would probably have been 1s. 6d. a pair in the shop.

1718. 18s. per dozen?—Yes.

1719. I think that completes the picture of the transaction so far as the woollen out-workers are concerned?—It does.

1720. Are the conditions substantially the same amongst the linen out-workers, so far as concerns the homes and the poverty of the workers?—Yes. In the sprigging and linen work I found the conditions very similar in County Down. The houses were perhaps not so poor, and the animals in them not quite so numerous.

1721. What about the method of payment?—It was about the same, and so were the truck shops, from the large buildings occupied by a comparatively wealthy truck master to the smaller shops of those who are just commencing this profitable business. The work was chiefly from Belfast. It had been sent elsewhere for the sprigging and embroidery, and then came back for thread-drawing work. In the cabins the floors are of mud, and the places are exceedingly dirty, and one of the great difficulties of the workers was to keep the linen, especially the handkerchiefs, perfectly clean. Accidents in this respect frequently happen, and then heavy deductions are made, so that, not only have the workers no money in payment for their work, but they have to suffer deductions for work damaged or spoiled. I am afraid to quote prices in general terms with regard to that class of work, because it is often exceedingly fine work upon articles of luxury, although paid at such absurdly low prices that I should almost be afraid to quote them. I would prefer to send afterwards a memorandum on the subject.

1722. Is the work done on the piece system?—Yes, entirely.

1723. Handkerchiefs at so much a dozen?—Sometimes at so much a dozen, but very good ones at so much each. The amount the workers should receive was never clearly made known to them. Often I found they could not tell me the money value of their work.

1724. What was the reason?—Neither the principal firm nor the agent gave the workers any particulars as to prices.

1725. What is said to the workers?—When the work is given out they are told to bring it back when it is ready, and the worker has to estimate the price from her knowledge of what she has previously received for similar work.

1726. But the estimate in the minds of both parties was not in current coin?—Not on the part of the trucking agent and the workers very often, but a system prevailed very largely of tickets, and there, when the worker took her work in, a piece of paper was given her on which a certain amount of money was written, and she would be able at any time to send to the shop this ticket and receive its value in goods; no money passed at all. In county Donegal tickets were hardly used; in county Down I found them very largely used. The excuse given by many of the truck masters was that there was no Bank in the place and that they very often ran short of silver, and that they very often used these pieces of paper, but, as a matter of fact, I found that no money did pass, and many instances were given me both in County Donegal and County Down of women who had petitioned very keenly for money for some immediate want, and had been refused.

1727. Instances were given to you from both counties of that?—Yes.

1728. Could you give us a date for that transaction—it was since 1897, I suppose?—Yes, those were in 1899, 1900, and 1901.

1729. Can you give us the names of the firms whose transactions were affected by those conditions?—I have not the names of the firms here with me.

1730. You will be able to furnish them?—I can furnish the names of all the trucking agents I have visited, both large and small—those who gave tickets and those who gave goods direct.

1731. I think you will appreciate for yourself the value of that; if you can furnish the list we shall be obliged to you?—Certainly.

1732. Then there is one point I omitted to ask you when you were describing the linen workers. Will you tell me how are the patterns for that fine work supplied; is that from headquarters?—From headquarters to the agent, and then by the agent to the worker. Sometimes the pattern was drawn, and the drawing was handed to the worker. That was the reason of a very large amount of heavy deductions for damage. I examined some of these patterns and they were so soiled and smudged (they were in pencil) through being taken from one place to another that it was almost impossible to trace them. In other cases just a sample had been shown to the worker when the work was given to her, and then she would have to walk back to her cabin and begin her work without any chance again of looking at the samples, and naturally it differed in some small way from the samples.

1733. Was she penalised?—Yes, in that case the agent would refuse to take the work, and would not pay for it at all; there would be nothing then. In some cases not only nothing would be paid for the work, but the worker would have to purchase the whole amount of the goods.

1734. Did you find that notwithstanding those squalid conditions that you have described those workers had intelligence enough to do this artistic work?—They did beautiful work.

1735. Such work as it would be a pleasure to wear, for instance?—Oh, quite. In many of the cabins I saw work done that I had only seen before done by women of culture who had been trained to do this exceedingly delicate work, and who asked a very high price for it—beautiful work.

1736. Then that work so performed goes to the trucking masters' agents or the shopkeepers, or whatever you call them; then it reaches the wholesale warehouses in the United Kingdom somewhere, and it is sold to the public no doubt through retail shops?—Yes, that is so.

1737. Now you gave us a comparison of the wage received, and the price received by the socks and stocking makers. Could you give us a handy comparison in any of those linen work cases?—I am afraid not.

* The Secretary is informed by Miss Squire that this is an error which escaped her in correcting the proof, and should be 1s. 6d.

Miss R. E. Squire.

21 June 1906.

1738. Take handkerchiefs ?—I might quote a case of a handkerchief that remains in my memory, of exceedingly fine work; that was a handkerchief with every corner elaborately worked. For that the worker was to receive 3d., that handkerchief would certainly be at least 5s. or 6s.

1739. Was the work overlaid upon the linen or did it consist in extracting threads from the linen ?—Extracting threads from the linen and working with a thread connecting some and missing others.

1740. So as to form an artistic corner ?—Yes, an open-work corner.

1741. Is the household of that worker very much like the household of the worsted worker that you have described ?—Yes, very much the same. I might perhaps also mention that in that district the men are employed and some of the women for certain parts of the year in flax mills, which are also owned by some of the trucking masters, who have a shop, and there I found that in that time of the year the workers were paid in grocery.

1742. Now with regard to the linen work that you have described; these three things seem to prevail. In the first place they are not paid in coin, in the second place they are subject to deductions which are no part of any contract that they understand beforehand; and a third point that you mentioned was that they have no particulars of wage ?—They have no particulars of wage, but at that time that was no contravention of the Act; the orders had not been made that would include wearing apparel.

1743. Now we will go to Somerset, and take your evidence about the glove trade ?—I can give you evidence about the kid glove trade. In the district where I was they were given out by the large well known glove manufacturers of Yeovil, where kid gloves of all kinds are made. They are fetched out from the factories and also from the places where work is given out by what are called bag women—women who take large quantities of work; they are really contractors, and they take it out either by mail or cart to the villages at a distance from Yeovil, and there they give the stuff out to the women who reside in the villages. The gloves are cut out into the various parts of the glove, the thumbs and fingers and the little gussets and pieces; then the women take out the packets of kid and stitch them together by sewing machine in their own homes. The sewing machine is lately introduced there; some of it is still done by hand, but the majority is done by machine. Then it goes back again through the bag women to the factory in Yeovil. Then it often goes out again to other workers who do the sewing at the back of the glove, or the finishing, putting the buttons on. The bag women who take it out sometimes get a small commission and sometimes not from the firm; more often there is no commission given to them; their profit is made out of the workers. These bag women have shops, and the groceries and drapery are given to the women for the work. There this system is more highly developed, because there is a ledger kept which shows clearly that the two accounts are balanced. The groceries are entered under the name on the one side and the amount of work on the other.

1744. Does the money pass ?—No money passes; occasionally money can be obtained, but I found that was very rare. It is denied there, generally, that the two accounts have any relation to one another. It is said that the fact that the mother of the family takes out work has nothing to do with the fact that the householder, the father, gets his groceries there. That was a difficulty in the prosecution, but I was able to produce ledgers which showed that the two accounts had been balanced and settled.

1745. Have you yourself seen those ledgers ?—Yes.

1746. Do you know cases of balances on week's accounts or fortnight's accounts being paid in money, or are there no such cases ?—There were very few. There were cases now and again in Somerset where money had been obtained, but in the larger number of cases the two accounts had been balanced. Very often the worker was largely in debt to the truck shop—very largely in debt, and in a very large number of cases the work that I saw then being done was being done to settle an account of long standing.

1747. Was that piece work ?—That was all piece work.

1748. What was the rate of pay there ?—I am afraid I should have to look that up; I was not prepared for these questions.

1749. Have you any general idea how much in coin would have been supposed to have been paid ?—Some of the women make 5s. or 6s. a week; some even more and some less.

1750. Were there deductions in such cases ?—Yes.

1751. For what ?—For any fault in the work—cutting the kid and not putting the pieces together well, not sewing them properly; but not such heavy deductions as in many other instances.

1752. But as in the Irish case of the woollen and linen trades, the sole judges of the deduction were the masters, or the bag women ?—Yes.

1753. Then in Cornwall ?—In Cornwall it was the knitting of the fishermen's guernsey frocks. There also the drapers' shops in Liskeard were engaged, I found, in this work. Some of them were quite large drapers' shops, where they would have quite a good class of customer. They gave out the wool to these fishermen's wives, who came from Polperro and Looe, and other fishing places for the wool and then worked it up and knitted it into guernsey frocks. Some of the cases were particularly sad ones, because they were widows of miners who had been killed in the tin mines up in the country there. They were receiving 2s. 6d. a week from the Poor Law, and they were ekeing this out with knitting frocks, and they had to sell again the drapery that they obtained in order to get the money that was necessary to them.

1754. I do not quite follow that last.—They could only obtain in payment for their work, drapery, and as these were very old women who had no use for blue silk sashes, and lace and mantles, that were given to them by the truck masters, they had to negotiate a sale with their friends in the village, and sometimes they were very hard put to it to find a purchaser.

1755. I should like something more specific about that What they were working, I suppose, would be the blue worsted that fisherman have ?—Yes, blue and brown guernseys.

1756. They work say a dozen fishermen's guernseys and take them to the merchant; this I suppose is some old woman who is living in a humble dwelling ?—Yes.

1757. What does she get for that ?—Sometimes 6s. or 8s. they are very large and heavy things.

1758. But what does the old woman get for her work ?—She would get something from the drapery counter; they prefer there to pay in drapery; sometimes it was a petticoat or a jacket, or some stockings or some ribbon or lace. She would generally, I found, inquire among her friends what was more likely to have a sale, and then she would ask for that from the drapery counter; sometimes she was not allowed to have her choice, and she would bring back with her whatever had been given to her.

1759. So that this was a case in which the worker was actually needing the ready money ?—She was.

1760. But under the system prevailing she had to start with truck, and then become her own merchant and make any profit or loss as the case might be ?—Yes. Complaints were made to me by the relieving officer of the number of widows who were suffering from the truck system.

1761. I heard you say something about a blue sash ?—That was one of the cases I brought into court. There was a very old typical Cornish woman, a miner's widow, who had been in receipt of poor relief for some time; she was very busy knitting this frock when I visited her. When I asked what payment she had received I found she had received three yards of wide blue ribbon; it was of absolutely no use to her; she took it to two or three people in the village, and managed at last to find two children who were going to a school feast, and she sold it to their mother.

1762. Has any case come to your knowledge of their selling back to the merchant ?—No.

1763. Or of the goods finding their way back to the merchant ?—No, never. I have heard of one or two cases where the worker herself managed to see the head of the firm and made an appeal to him for money, for rent, or for fuel (there was a great scarcity of fuel when I was there); and then money was given, but the next time drapery was asked for, for fear of incurring the displeasure of the shopman.

1764. Now alongside of truck were there cases of deduction in that industry also?—No, I have not met instances of deductions there.

1765. Of course you had to do your best to challenge that kind of case that you have been describing in the former parts of your evidence by bringing a sample case before the court?—Yes.

1766. Perhaps we will get a description of these prosecutions afterwards?—May I mention one other instance of outworkers being paid in truck which is not mentioned in my précis, or in the list that I have submitted, because those were lists of prolonged investigations. This came to me in investigating other matters and was an almost single instance in the city of Bristol. It was the case of a corset-maker—an agent who gives out corsets for a very large firm indeed—one of the greatest makers—to workers living in villages near Bristol. She keeps a shop. That was one of the most hidden kinds of truck, but following it out very carefully I am quite convinced that the payment was actually simply in goods from her shop. Those were chiefly young girls, and they were more or less willing to take hats and things of that kind. Complaints were made to me very much by the fathers, and by the husbands of two or three of the women that no money could be got. In one case where a woman died, the husband was sued a few months afterwards for a sum of over £3 that was said to be due to the truck shop from his wife for clothes. The man resisted the claim because his wife had been unable the whole of that time to get money; she had been obliged to take the payment in goods; but he was brought before the county court, and a judgment order was made for the money to be paid. He consulted a solicitor as to whether he could plead Section 6, Truck Act, 1831, that it was not a debt recoverable, but he was advised that he could not do so because the husband being liable for the goods and the wife being the worker he could not set up that defence.

1767. That same difficulty has occurred in other districts of the country, I suppose?—Yes, it has, notably in Somerset. The bag women were quite alive to that; they entered the goods under the names of the husbands generally, and the work under the name of the wife, and then when investigation was made they declared that the two accounts were quite separate.

1768. Now, all that you have been giving evidence about arises under the first section substantially of the Act of 1831?—It does.

1769. So that it is a mistake, I take it, to say that truck has disappeared?—Quite, in my opinion.

1770. Still it is in the department of outworkers that it has been able to survive?—Yes, it is.

1771. Now I must ask you your view about it. I take it that you totally disapprove of the system?—Totally.

1772. It tends to the impoverishment of the worker?—It does.

1773. And to uncertainty as to the reward?—Yes.

1774. In your judgment does it partake substantially of the nature of corruption. This is a serious question that I am putting to you. I want you to keep in view this, that you have a person ignorant of the terms of remuneration on the one hand, and on the other hand you have a highly skilled party to the contract?—Exactly.

1775. Does it give facilities for corrupt dealing?—Yes, to an enormous extent.

1776. Do you think that the general policy of the law, which is signified by the Act of 1831, by the prohibition of the system ought to be extended to outworkers?—Yes, quite clearly.

1777. Your impression, I gather, until you had the unfortunate experience in the law courts that you are going to refer to, was that the law would have covered such transactions?—Quite.

1778. Has it been a disappointment to the Department that it was found not to do so?—A very great disappointment.

1779. Have you any view as to whether the law should now be extended so as to include those cases?—My view is very strongly that it should include outworkers.

1780. Do you think that social misery would be avoided by that?—Yes.

1781. Now we will come to the Act of 1896?—Before we go to the Act of 1896 may I ask if you wish to hear anything on the subject of rent. That comes under the Act of 1831; I have had several cases, and I feel rather strongly on that point.

1782. We should be glad to hear you?—It is included in the list of prosecutions that was put in, but it is not mentioned in my memorandum here. As I have stated, under the Truck Act of 1831 I have taken thirteen cases; several of those were for rent.

1783. What section was that under?—Section 23 of the Act of 1831 provides for exceptions from the law that wage is not to be paid otherwise than in current coin. The exception is that rent, if there is a written agreement, may be deducted. It says that nothing shall prevent the occupier from demising to any artificer and so on "the whole or any part of any tenement at any rent, nor for making or contracting to make any stoppage or deduction from the wages of any such artificer for and in respect of any such rent," provided that "the agreement or contract for such stoppage or deduction shall be in writing and signed by such artificer"?—Yes.

1784. Now will you give us your explanation about that?—In the textile districts of Yorkshire it is a very common practice to deduct the rent of cottages leased to the operatives from their wages, and in several cases I found that the rent was deducted weekly from the wages of women who were not the householders, because they were employed by the owner of the property. There was not only no agreement to deduct such rent from their wage, but there was no wage book, and no statement given to the worker, and the rent having fallen into arrears at some time it was the practice on the part of the employers to deduct from the women's wages what he chose towards the debt owing to him. The woman had no statement as to the total amount that she owed for rent. There was one case where the rent of the house was 2s. a week, and from the wage book I saw that the woman had had deducted, week after week, such sums as 3s. 3d., 4s. 9d., 2s. 1d., 1s. 5½d. (her whole wage that week being 1s. 6d.), 3s. 4d., 4s. 2d. I could myself on investigating it find no connection between these sums and the amount of 2s. which she said she paid for rent. Then the occupier explained to me that during some slackness of work the rent had fallen in arrear, and he was deducting these sums from the woman in order to make up the rent, but she had no statement given to her at all as to what the rent owing would be, or how soon the debt would be completely wiped off. If the woman was not herself at work in a particular week owing to work in her particular branch being slack, the rent would be deducted from the wage of a child of her's—perhaps a half-timer—anyone in the household who was earning money would have their wages stopped for rent.

1785. Was that case brought to the notice of the court?—Yes, I summoned the owner, and he was fined.

1786. Then you found that the law could hit that point?—Yes, only from the technical point which alone I could seize upon that there was no agreement in writing. There was another case of a lucifer match manufacturer in Gloucester. He also owns several houses in one street, and in that case I found that a girl employed in the factory had the whole of her wage every week stopped by the employer. She was a pieceworker, so she earned a varying wage, and she never received any because it was always going to make up arrears in the father's rent. He had suffered from the epidemic of smallpox there, that you will no doubt remember, and had got into arrears with his rent, and everything this girl earned went to make up arrears of rent. There was no account here, but the wage book was shown to me, and I traced it back for two months, and I found that whatever she earned whether small or large, was kept back for the rent.

1787. Did you find the law sufficient to hit that case?—Yes, in that case I successfully prosecuted, but in that case also only because there was the technical absence of any agreement in writing. As a matter of fact, afterwards, the practice was entirely stopped, as it was in the case of the other firm in Yorkshire. Rent books were given and an agreement was made, and the back debt was cancelled by the employer. There was another case in Dublin, with the workers of a large spinning factory there; some of them were men, and their wage was stopped for rent, but in one case there was an old woman who had 2s. 6d. a week deducted from her wage for the rent of a single room that she rented from the firm. She was only a sweeper, because she was very old and almost past work; but whenever she was able to earn anything over the 2s. a week it was stopped for rent; she was fined 1s. every week because she was late; the work commenced at six and she came in at seven every morning, so that every week there was 1s. fine for being late. Then there was 2s. or 2s. 6d. deducted from 5s. 6d. or 6s. for rent. The room was unfit for habitation; it was dilapidated and dirty; she had no furniture, no fire and no food when I visited her. Her wage had gone in rent, and the tenement was not fit for habitation. In that case there was a conviction. There was a young girl employed in the factory whose father was a general labourer and occupied one of the houses; he was out of work, and the wages of this girl were stopped, sometimes the full amount and sometimes a proportion of it towards the rent, 3s. 6d. a week, of another miserable tenement, which I referred to the sanitary authority as being totally unfit for habitation.

Miss R. E. Squire.

1788. Do you find in the Statutes any authority for the proposition that there may be a deduction not only for one's own rent but for some other body's rent?—I considered that point in taking the case, and it seemed that if there was no agreement whatever there was nothing to fix the particular occupier.

1789. You had them under the fact of there being no agreement in writing?—Yes.

1790 And you obtained a conviction under that head?—I did. In the Dublin court I was asked by the magistrate whether it would have been possible for the occupier to have made such an agreement with a minor; I said I should have supposed not. That point seemed to impress him very much, but the firm pleaded guilty, and the counsel who was appearing for them seemed to admit that it was not possible that there should have been any agreement.

1791. There was no judicial decision to that effect?—No.

1792. Has the question ever been raised, do you happen to remember, whether you can take as a deduction from A. B.'s wages the rent of X. Y., being a father or a mother or a grandfather?—I have not been able to find that it has been raised. I tried to find that when I was taking these cases, but I could find nothing that would help me at all.

1793. Your evidence appears to suggest that a system prevails where they have, so to speak, a household working for a firm, and if there is rent due to the firm they will deduct from the wages of any handy members of the household?—Yes, and that is very much the case in Yorkshire.

1794. Have you anything further under the Act of 1831?—I think those are all the points under the Act of 1831.

1795. Now, under the 1896 Act you have some evidence to give us with regard to deductions for fines for bad work or damage?—Yes.

1796. Your experience has extended to Bristol and the case of wholesale tailors, corset makers, factory workers and out-workers there?—Yes.

1797. Is there anything specific affecting Bristol, or may we take the whole list of your other places. You have been in the villages of Somerset where there are tailor out-workers, and in Leeds where there are factory workers and out-workers, in Yorkshire woollen and worsted spinning and weaving, in Birmingham hardware trades, pens, umbrellas, etc., in Nottingham lace finishing, factory workers, and out-workers?—Yes.

1798. You have prosecuted thirty-three employers altogether. The number of cases have been, under the Truck Act of 1831, thirteen, and under the Truck Act of 1896, thirty-six cases; total forty-nine?—Yes.

1799. Do those prosecutions represent only a very small proportion of the cases in which serious breaches of the Truck Act were found?—Yes.

1800. A large number coming within the 1896 Act were not taken into court?—No.

1801. Why was that?—Because the experience of other cases showed that most of these cases turned upon whether the deduction was fair and reasonable, and the magistrates in other cases had either dismissed the cases or shown a great reluctance to give a decision upon the point as to whether the deduction was in fact fair and reasonable. In cases where we had been defeated it was impossible to appeal, because the decision had been one of fact.

1802. There being no appeal except upon a question of law stated?—Except upon a question of law.

1803. Had you yourself, with your experience, an opinion, and had the department formed along with you the opinion, that in those cases the prosecution should take place because in your judgment it was not fair and reasonable?—It was not fair and reasonable in my judgment and in that of my department.

1804. And you adhere to that notwithstanding the decisions?—Yes, and that view was in practice in most cases adopted by the employer. In cases where the conviction was not obtained the employer subsequently altered the deductions in accordance with the view expressed to him.

1805. Did you find that the force of public opinion aided you by the publicity given to such cases?—Yes, it did.

1806. And the exposure of the practice, although the prosecution was unsuccessful, was beneficial?—It was. It led in every case to my being consulted by other employers so that they might bring their practice into conformity with the view I had expressed in conducting the case.

1807. Is your experience that the opinion of persons holding your position under the Home Office is followed by both employers and workmen alike?—Quite so.

1808. Do you see any objection in principle to making the inspectorate have a prima facie judgment upon fairness and reasonableness, which must be accepted by courts unless it is rebutted?—I think it imposes a very great burden upon the inspectors and involves investigations of a very wide character.

1809. You mean if they have affirmatively to establish the proposition?—Quite so, and not only has the inspector, of course, to consider every point of the deduction and so on, but he also has to make a very large acquaintance with the industry in question, and that involves great technical acquaintance with various trades.

1810. In the majority of those cases coming within the scope of these Statutes the occupiers have been dealt with by persuasion or caution?—Yes, in the very large number of cases.

1811. And in such instances I think they have refunded large sums?—Yes.

1812. What was the nature of these refunds?—The whole of the money deducted in many cases.

1813. Deducted for what?—Stoppages for bad work where a sum had been deducted because the work was said to have been damaged or not particularly good. On it being represented to the employers that this was not, in the opinion of the inspector, fair and reasonable, the employer has in a large number of cases refunded the whole of that money deducted from the worker.

1814. Have you any recollection of the kind of sums that would be refunded in such cases?—There was one case I remember where girls had had 6s. or 7s. deducted from their wages—some more—week by week for some months in respect of sealing tins of condensed milk. They had been expected to reach a certain maximum in their work, and, if they had not done so, so much had been stopped from their wage. It was found that the minimum of work was fixed by the best week of the best worker, and that the others always fell below it—in fact, could not reach it. These sums had been deducted week by week and became a tax upon the worker's wage habitually week by week. It was pointed out to the employer that that was not a fair and reasonable deduction, because it was based upon a tale of work that could not be reached by the ordinary worker. The wage books were produced by the firm and it was found that a very large sum had been deducted from some twenty girls. The week following that I received from the firm a letter that they had gone carefully through the sums that had been shown to me and they had refunded to all those girls the amount that had been stopped in the six months previously.

1815. That would amount to a considerable sum ?—A very considerable sum; and I found that that had actually been done. I visited the girls at their homes, and found that the girls had received the whole amount, which came to many pounds.

1816. Have you any notion of the figure ?—I am afraid I could not quote it now.

1817. I meant, would an individual worker receive as much as £1 or £2 ?—No, they would not receive as much as that; it would be 5s. to 15s.

1818. We will now take from you the enumeration of the chief practices which affect women and girls unjustly—I mean the chief practices coming within the scope of the Truck Act. You have begun with payment otherwise than in current coin, and you have given us all the Irish instances of that ?—Yes.

1819. That payment otherwise than in current coin is divided into two heads; giving goods instead of money, and deduction of rent (or rather of other people's rent) from wages ?—Yes.

1820. Then the second great branch is the case of fines. Now, upon that I want some detail. First, fines for unpunctuality. Would you refer me to the section of the Act of 1896 upon this subject ?—Section 1 deals with fines.

1821. What is your evidence with regard to fines for unpunctuality. What was the penalty for the rate of fine and what trades are you referring to ?—It seems pretty universal. In the textile trades there is almost universally the system of "pennying," as it is called, the imposition of a fine of 1d. for being late; sometimes five minutes is the limit, sometimes ten minutes or even a quarter of an hour, but generally five minutes is the limit, and then the pennying system applies.

1822. Have you experience of cases where if they are five or ten minutes late it is counted to them as an hour's deduction from wages ?—Yes, I have. That is the system in vogue in a great many factories, especially where they are paid not so much as piece-workers as a fixed wage reckoned as wage for so many hours a week, and that total of hours—perhaps fifty-seven hours (that is a very common number)—was paid so much for fifty-seven hours a week; as a matter of fact, the factories generally close earlier, and they work fifty-six or fifty-five hours, and they are paid for fifty-seven all the same, but if they are late five minutes on any morning they lose the penny fine on that and also the wage for the hour or two hours that the work is not actually required of them.

1823. Now, this fine for unpunctuality is imposed upon piece-workers ?—Yes, and that is the great grievance I found among the workers of all classes.

1824. That applies to married women ?—It especially works hardly upon and is objected to by married women. All classes of piece-workers, in my experience, have a fixed idea that a fine on a piece-worker is illegal, because she is only earning during the time she is in the factory; and the married women who come late, as a rule, and work well while they are there and reach a wage that compares favourably with the wages of others in the factory, owing to their experience or good work, they being fined the same as the others for losing time, have a very great objection to the practice and consider it unjust.

1825. In the case of married women particularly, they may be precluded by household cares from coming early ?—Yes, those with young children generally.

1826. May I ask, is there any loss in the case of piece-workers—I mean loss to the employer ?—If she is on a machine there is certainly the loss of power, and perhaps others are dependent upon her for their branch of the work; she feeds them.

Miss R. E. Squire.

1827. So much with regard to fines for coming late. Then the other item, fines for breaches of disciplne ?—Yes.

1828. You think that power is exercised in an arbitrary and tyrannous fashion in some cases by the foremen ?—Yes. In a great many instances the rule is published which is very often a very vague rule, "Any act of misconduct, 6d." That is the kind of rule I have found.

1829. You have had instances of that ?—Yes, several.

1830. We are very anxious as a Committee to get your evidence at first hand about those rules, and I will be very glad if you can send us copies of the things which have actually occurred in your experience—copies of those lists of rules. You can cross any items that you would desire to call our particular attenton to. Will you favour us with that ?—Yes, I shall be very pleased.

1831. Now, what is the first great head of fines ?—Under those breaches of discipline I have had constant experience of fines for such things as sneezing, laughing, singing, "cheeking the foreman"—put down simply as that—wearing hair-curlers in the hair; that is a very frequent source of fines.

1832. Do you mean keeping pins in their hair ?—Yes, curlers for putting a curl upon the hair; a girl may have a hair-curler fixed in front; it is a breach of discipline to go into the factory with a hair-curler in the hair.

1833. It is not that it troubles the æsthetic taste ?—No. The girl in most instances who would do that in a well-conducted factory would be just asked to remove it; but I found many cases of 6d. and 1s. fine for that.

1834. Have you any other instances of that kind of triviality ?—There are a great many fines in one or two factories for sneezing, and I was unable to find that there was anything very special about it—I mean no uproar caused or anything of that kind; but the foremen seemed to think it was the only way of enforcing their authority to inflict a fine of 6d.

1835. What would be the charge for a sneeze ?—6d. Just as an instance of the trivial kind of thing that is solemnly told to one even by the occupier as a reason for fining, I will mention this. One was put down as a breach of Rule 4 which was that the worker should "observe due order for decorum in the factory." A girl had been fined 6d., and there seemed great differences as to why this had been imposed, and I was told that it was because she picked a spider off the wall of the factory and put it down by another girl. I thought this perhaps had caused some uproar, but I was quite unable to find that it had disturbed the work at all.

1836. With regard to all these, may I ask you this. Have the department considered carefully the application of Sub-section 1, of Section 1, of the Act of 1896, in particular head (c) that the fine imposed under the contract must be "in respect of some act or omission which causes or is likely to cause damage or loss to the employer or interruption or hindrance to his business" ?—Yes, very closely, but every point of the most trivial kind has been said by the employer to cause interruption or hindrance to his business. Since the case of Bayer, the appeal case, where the decision was given that the contract was sufficient that "due order and decorum" must be maintained, and that to fine for dancing to a harp in dinner time was no breach of the Act, we have been quite unable to impress this upon the occupiers; and the contract that was the subject of that case has been reprinted and placed in a number of factories and pointed out to me as being the only rule that had now absolute sanction.

1837. Now have you any view to present to us as to these disciplinary fines ?—Yes. I should say from my experience that they are quite unnecessary; that if a foreman or forewoman knows his or her business there is no need whatever for a disciplinary fine. I think that is exemplified in certain factories where there are a very large number of departments and the departments all resemble one another very closely—perhaps 300 girls in each department, with some one in charge; the work is very similar. Each foreman or forewoman is provided with a book to register the fines for breaches of discipline. I found on examining those books that some forewoman will have their book almost filled up in six months, and others will never enter a fine of any kind; they are quite able to maintain discipline by their own influence.

Miss R. E. Squire.

1838. Have you experience of cases where there is no such thing as a system of fines at all?—Quite so. In the larger number of factories there is no system of fining for breaches of discipline.

1839. And are those factories well conducted?—Very well conducted.

1840. So that upon the whole your experience would incline you to say that that system of fines for merely disciplinary purposes should be abolished?—Quite.

1841. The first head of your observations was upon payment otherwise that in current coin; the second was with regard to notice; and now the third is with regard to deductions or charges for spoilt work or damage. You have had experience with regard to garments damaged which are sold to the worker under compulsion?—Yes.

1842. Will you just illustrate that?—That is very largely the case in the wholesale clothing districts, especially in Leeds and Bristol and London. The worker who damages any garment, either through her own fault or through something that she could hardly avoid, is told that she must become the purchaser of the garment. She very generally raffles that in the factory. This occurs generally in men's wholesale tailoring works, and the garments are of no use to the women at all, so that the practice is to raffle them. In some factories the number of cases is so great that it is a weekly tax upon the workers to contribute 1d. towards these raffles. In other cases the workers are sometimes able to dispose of them. The charge is generally made at the cost price of the garment. The case of greatest hardship perhaps would be where a vest hand for instance spoils the vest and is made to take the whole suit. I have instances where a worker has been of that kind—a vest hand—and the wage that she would receive would be 7d., the charge to her would be 11s. 10d.

1843. Sevenpence you mean for the stitching of the vest?—Yes, and she would become indebted to the firm for 11s. 10d.

1844. That being the wholesale value of the vest and the coat and the trousers?—Yes. I had a list supplied to me by one firm and I obtained particulars from others showing the garment damaged, the price charged, and the price of making.

1845. Would you give us some details of that?—There was a pair of trousers damaged by a worker; the price charged was 1s. 4d.; the price of making entirely was 4d. Then there was another pair of trousers, price charged 6s. 6d., price of making 6d. In another case 1s. for making a coat throughout and the worker was charged 13s. 11d. Another worker received 2s. for making a coat throughout—that was an overcoat—she was charged 22s. 6d. She has eight children, one an infant, and is already in debt to the firm for loans that had been made to her while she was laid up. Another case, 6d. for a vest and the worker was charged 18s.; the vest only was damaged, but the worker had to purchase the whole suit. Another case a worker was charged 18s. 10d. for two suits on which she was paid—she could not tell me the price, because it was three years ago, and she had been paying off the debt as she could bit by bit.

1846. You have told us the prices upon which they were, as it were, handed over to the worker; what prices could she realise by raffling?—Very often when they were raffled they would get the whole sum for the garment; but when they were sold to friends they would generally be sold at a loss, and very often they were not sold at all and were cut up by degrees for the children; or they would be produced to me years after from where they had been put aside. In the case of khaki suits made at the time of the war they could not get rid of those at all, because the men would not wear them even in the fields, so that they had no sale for those; that was a dead loss. In one case that I took (that was a Bristol case), the girl had been given a dozen pairs of trousers to make; she had to put curved hip pockets in: she had not any pattern and had not done that work before; when she took them back to the shop they said that the pockets were put in at the wrong angle and therefore she had to buy the whole of them; they were £3, and she had been paying for a whole year before I found her; she had already paid £1 or 30s. for them. For those she had no use at all, she had got them still there.

1847. Now, have you challenged any cases of deductions—I mean, have you brought any into Court?—Yes, I have, a number altogether.

1848. How did you endeavour to hit them under the Statute; was it because of the lack of a written contract?—Yes, or the deduction not being in accordance with such a contract as the Act requires—generally by reason of there being no limit placed to the contract that it must be fair and reasonable. The usual clause in these contracts is, "All garments spoilt must be paid for."

1849. How could you hit that under the Statute?—Under Section 2, sub-section 1 (c.): "The amount of the deduction or payment is fair and reasonable having regard to all the circumstances of the case." I could not use that section in regard to the deduction, but only in regard to the contract under which the deduction is made.

1850. Could you not hit it under sub-section 1 (b): "The deduction or payment to be made under the contract does not exceed the actual or estimated damage or loss occasioned to the employer?"—Generally it was not possible to do it under that, because it was difficult to get proof of his actual or estimated loss. I always went into that question, and I found that he was always prepared to give so much evidence as to the price of the work and the price spent in wages, and that he had not charged the worker more than the cost to himself putting everything together, that it was not possible to take action under that, because these garments would no doubt have cost the occupier wholesale price, what he charged the worker.

1851. But the policy of the Act was against the payment of wages in truck?—Yes.

1852. Do you not think that the same policy might hold to apply against making deductions in truck?—I should have said—I think that is an answer to your question—that in several cases I did prosecute under the Act of 1831 and not under the Act of 1896, where the garment had been given and where part of the wage was not paid—I took it as "payment otherwise than in current coin," namely, in a damaged garment.

1853. Did you succeed in that?—Yes, I succeeded in two or three cases, and I lost two cases.

1854. Why did you lose?—There was the case of Broderick, in Bristol; that I took under that section and lost. There was no sufficiently clear evidence the magistrate said that these garments had been given as wage.

1855. That is just my point. My point is that the Statute says you are not to pay wage in truck; that was how I started; but is not the policy of the thing that when you come to make deductions you shall not make them in truck either—I mean apart from the Factory Act?—Quite.

1856. Would not that be a sound policy to try to get the law altered to?—I think so.

1857. Now, apart from the legal view that I have presented to you, would you think that harm would ensue by making the whole of this system illegal?—Harm to whom?

1858. Harm either to the employer or to the workman. The system I am referring to is the system of making a workman take over damaged articles and take the chance of loss or having to retain them—taking the chance of total loss or partial loss. Do you think any harm would ensue if that were forbidden by law?—The employer would have his loss.

1859. He would have his loss, but he would have his remedies, which would be the dismissal of an incompetent workman, and then he would realise the damaged goods in what market he could find for them, and then he could ascertain his loss definitely and know whether he would retain that workman in his employ or not?—Quite so, and perhaps I might add that in a large number of cases where a conviction was obtained for the kind of thing that I have just been quoting the employer gave up entirely letting the worker take the work or charging her in any way ; he put the work into a job department and he has told me that he has found no need whatever to charge the worker ; there has been no appreciable loss. There is a sale for those things, and if the worker was incorrigible he got rid of her ; if it had been an accident by a good worker, as many of these cases were, he suffered not in the least by passing it over.

1860. The goods would be sold to that large company of people who are looking out for cheap bargains ?—Quite so.

1861. So that so far as practice goes you see nothing against forbidding this altogether ?—No, and to the worker I see an immense gain. The cases are so numerous and so sad of deductions in various trades, not only in those we have just been dealing with, but even still more in other cases.

1862. In cases where the goods have been left permanently with the worker—take the khaki cloth case that you referred to—in all those cases it simply means that the worker has incurred a total loss of the wages earned ?—Yes.

1863. And these are cases of humble householders ?—Very.

1864. Cases in which the wages are almost a prime necessity of an urgent kind ?—Yes. Many of these girls would be for some time the wage earners of the family, and others would be living in lodgings and supporting themselves entirely.

1865. You have now told us about the garments sold to them. The next thing is, there are deductions for spoilt or imperfect work ?—Yes.

1866. Does that sometimes amount to more than the wage ?—It does very frequently, and in that case nothing is given in exchange at all ; there is no chance even as there might be in other cases of the worker making anything. It is a dead loss to her.

1867. Would you give us an illustration of that ?—I think perhaps the pen trade is the best. There the work is skilled work and it is entirely hand work. With each article made—each pen—its perfection depends entirely upon the judgment and skill of the worker ; there is nothing automatic about it ; each pen must be perfect or it is no use to the penmaker, and it depends actually upon the woman's right judgment and manipulation of the tool and of the pen as to whether the pen is successful. In the pen trade there are a very large number of processes, a pen passes through sixteen or seventeen processes, and in each it may receive some injury that will prevent it being any use whatever as a pen ; as it goes higher up the scale in manufacture it becomes of course of more value, and some defects may not appear until it is examined pen by pen under a magnifying glass or upon a white board in a finished state. In each branch of the manufacture the worker receives the pens in a large quantity ; a pan containing eighty or ninety or a 100 gross ; they are paid so much for 100 gross. The wages vary very much, but they would be from 1s. 9d. per 100 gross to 3s. 6d. per 100 gross. Then if there is any short weight in that, or if the worker has to put aside any of the work that she has found herself perhaps to be imperfect, she would be allowed in some cases to make one gross or two gross ; then after that the rate varies ; in some factories 6d. a gross would be charged ; she would therefore be paid 2s. 3d. for perhaps ninety gross in a lot, and out of that she would make three or four gross of waste, and she might be charged 6d. a gross for those ; so that it is not uncommon to find a woman who would be earning 2s. 3d. for doing ninety gross, and would be fined 6s. or 7s. for the waste.

1868. What does the woman do in that case ?—The employer—and that was considered an element that made it "fair and reasonable" by the magistrate in Birmingham—would not deduct the whole at once ; it would be impossible, because the wage would not allow it ; but he would take off 1s a week until the whole amount had been deducted. Meanwhile, if the worker made any other waste it would be added to her general debt ; so that the result is that in some factories the workers are many shillings, often pounds, in debt to the employer.

1869. Would you mind telling me the nature of the operation that that worker would have to do—take a pen for instance ?—It is a hand process, with a die press, and a heavy handle weighted ; the worker takes up each pen and places it upon the bed, and brings round the handle —shifts it round by hand—and the die comes down and impresses the pen. There is the cutting out first of all, of the steel, into the blank, and then it goes afterwards on to the different processes ; there is the slitting of the pen down the centre, and other processes.

Miss R. E. Squire.

21 June 1906.

1870. What would be the nature of the error in those cases ?—The tool might have been faulty and not struck exactly in the centre, or it might not have been sharp enough, or the pen might not have been held exactly in the centre. If it is the tool that made the fault the employer says she should have called the attention of the toolmaker to it.

1871. Have you brought any cases of that kind before the Court ?—I have.

1872. And have you ever succeeded ?—No, not in that industry.

1873. Has the result of the prosecution been to abolish the practice ?—Not to abolish it, but to modify it so that the rate per gross for bad work was reduced, but there are still cases now and again of very very heavy deductions.

1874. Do you see yourself any objection to abolishing that ?—No, I think it should be abolished.

1875. Leaving the worker to earn a good or a bad reputation according to results ?—Quite so.

1876. And to be employed or not employed accordingly ?—Quite so, and leading to greater care being exercised in supervising the tools. More "toolmakers," as they are called, to adjust the tools would be provided if the loss fell entirely upon the employer and not on the worker.

1877. Then the worker is involved under that system in debt for years often ?—She is, and the wages are extremely low. I think when I quoted the rate you would appreciate that, because it takes a very long time to put through that amount of work—2s. 3d. for 100 gross ; that would take her a day and a half or two days. Many of the workers do not earn more than about from 6s. to 10s. a week ; and then there is the delay in fetching their work and bringing it up and waiting for it to be weighed, and waiting for the tool to be adjusted, which is often a considerable time. It is one of the low paid trades that requires training and skill and care and judgment.

1878. With regard to these deductions for spoilt or damaged work, that of course covers cases where the plant is insufficient ?—Yes. I have here a certain number of instances that have come under my notice of some typical charges.

1879. I would like you to give us a few instances that you think might be useful to us ?—There is a case of a patent buttonhole maker ; two dozen and four hunting ties were charged to the worker at 14s. 7d. ; the wage earned was 2½d. per dozen, that is 5d. These were raffled by degrees. The only fault was that the buttonholes were too far apart. The contract was, "All goods damaged by the hands must be paid for."

1880. But it was "paid for" by handing over the goods ?—Yes ; the hunting ties were delivered to the girl, and she paid by degrees. She paid in that case ; it was not deducted ; it was a debt ; she received her wages, and she paid 14s. 7d. Those ties were absolutely useless to her ; it was a dead loss. Then there was a case of a collar manufacturer, the wage was 3s. 6d. a gross, and the worker was charged 3s. 5d. a dozen for the collars. In another case, on six dozen, the worker earned 1s. 9d., and bought the cotton out of that ; she had to pay for a whole six dozen, £1 0s. 6d. There was no fault in the workmanship ; the work was very well done, but the collars were stitched nearer the edge than the sample ; she had not sufficient instructions given to her when they were given out.

1881. Was that case tried ?—Yes ; there was a conviction. In another case the wage was five farthings a dozen, and the charge made to the worker was 1s. 6d. a dozen. In a case of a handkerchief manufacturer, the worker was paid 9d. for one gross of handkerchiefs, and she had to buy four dozen out of the gross, and was charged 1s. 5¾d. ; the rest of the work was perfectly done. There was a case of an apprentice in Wakefield, at a confectioner's; all "spoils," that is, cakes burned or not made well, were sent to the girls parent's charged at full price; if they were refused, the occupier entered the amount in a book, and threatened to deduct from the girl's wages as soon as she was out of her time. In that case no proceedings could be taken, as there was no deduction from wages—in fact no payment of wages, as there are no "wages" to an apprentice. Then, in the case of two breweries, it is the custom to pay for the washing of bottles 2d. a gross, and to deduct 2d. for one bottle not perfectly washed. There was one case of a girl who earned 2d. a gross for washing these bottles, and there was a fine of 2s. 6d. for a trolley full, or about three gross.

Miss R. E. Squire.

1882. Did you get a conviction in that case?—No. The owner afterwards refunded the fines and stopped the practice. There was a difficulty in fixing dates, so it was considered impolitic to take a prosecution.

1883. That was a case of a refund?—Yes. Then in the case of relief stamping of private notepaper. The price paid was 9d. for one ream; that occupied a girl from eleven in the morning till four in the afternoon. She was charged 3s. 10d. for bad work. The paper was produced to me and looked all right; no one could say exactly why it was bad; 6d. a week was deducted. In another case there were 1,000 sheets of notepaper stamped for 9d.; the weekly wage was 7s. to 14s.; the worker was charged for the 1,000 sheets of notepaper and 1,000 envelopes, £1 0s. 6d. The work was perfect, but some of the sheets had been stamped plain and some coloured, and she reversed the order.

1884. Had you a prosecution in that case?—No. In that case there were one or two technical difficulties, and the occupier at last refunded the amount, so proceedings were not taken; but the practice is still continuing in relief stamping; it is a practice that is known by the trade.

1885. Now let me put the matter to you in this way. In case of deductions for spoilt or imperfect work the penalty is sometimes in handing over the goods?—It is.

1886. You object to that?—Yes.

1887. But then the penalty, whether in handing over the goods or in deductions, is suffered sometimes for a fault of the worker and sometimes for a fault of the machinery, and sometimes for the fault of the other workers, in the case of a process?—Yes.

1888. Looking to all that, what is your view with regard to deductions for spoilt work; is it your opinion or is it not that that system should be continued by law?—It is my opinion that it should not be continued. If the loss is serious, the employer would have his remedy in another way to recover from the worker.

1889. No doubt he would have his civil remedy, but above all he would have the remedy of better supervision?—Yes, I think that is a very strong point.

1890. And always he would have the sanction of dismissal as the last resort?—Yes.

1891. But a very important remedy in your view would be not only that he would supervise their work, but that he would supervise his plant?—He would. He would also, if I may add this, take more interest and more pains in the training of the workpeople. Unskilled workers are put upon work for which they are not fit, because the employer does not take the whole risk of putting a woman upon work that she is not able to do, and the foreman will very largely put a girl or a woman on to work because the machine is idle or because they are in want of someone to do the work, and they will not satisfy themselves of her capability to do it properly, while if she does it badly they will fine her.

1892. They can be recouped by this system of fining?—Yes, and there is not the same interest shown in these trades in getting a perfect worker or training her satisfactorily.

1893. Then we come to "Charge for materials, tools, machines, etc." There is cotton and stitching material, whatever it may be, that is charged sometimes above cost price, is it?—It is very frequently.

1894. Of course you can check that by prosecution if you find it out?—Yes; the difficulty is really to find it out. The employer may or may not produce his invoices or any particulars. I have been refused those particulars, and the retail price at which one can buy these materials is not always a guide.

1895. Will you give us a list of those charges?—Charge for cotton above cost price; charge for motive power; that is often ½d. in every shilling earned; charge for gas for lighting the factory; charge for cleaning floors, windows and sanitary conveniences; charge for parts of sewing machine and other machines and tools; charge for books for entering wages, etc.; then vague charges such as "room," "hot water," "factory charge" frequently covering many conveniences or services, as cleaning, water boiled for tea, errand girl, etc. Then charges for overalls, aprons, sleeves, caps, clogs, uniforms.

1896. Now we cannot go into this in full detail, but with regard to all these things like motive power, lighting, cleaning, books, room, factory charge, overalls, and so on—these are all fixed charges, are they not?—Fixed by the employer for the worker.

1897. But I mean they are definite. The employer will know exactly what is the cost of his factory, the lighting of it, the cleaning of it, the overalls necessary for the workers, and so on?—Yes.

1898. Do you see any objection wherever there are fixed charges of that kind to abolishing the system of deductions altogether and enabling the workman to know that he enters a factory with all these fixed charges paid by the factory and his wages are so much?—I think that ought to be distinctly the case—that he enters the factory with that knowledge.

1899. Saving the investigation on possible prosecution of the technical point where the deductions are fair and reasonable, do you think it would be better to abolish the whole system?—Yes.

1900. Now do you find that good factories have abolished the whole system?—Yes.

1901. So that there only remains the kind of thing like cotton and materials that are handled by the workman where wastage may occur?—Yes.

1902. What do you say with regard to that?—That is so much a question of wage. The fair employer would estimate exactly the proportion that is spent in material and cotton, and so on, and he would pay the worker a wage which would include that, merely to prevent the waste, but he himself would bear that expense, because the wage would be inclusive of the amount for cotton.

1903. He would know from the experience of his working life what for particular operations would be the amount of raw material required on the article?—Yes, and I find that the employer does know exactly the percentage of wage that goes in material.

1904. So that even in that case, where wastage might occur by the misconduct or the carelessness of the worker, that would simply result in being a demonstration that the particular worker was not sufficiently trained or sufficiently careful?—Yes.

1905. And he could be dealt with by the ordinary discipline of suspension or dismissal?—Quite so.

1906. Would you favour that instead of the existing system?—Yes, I would.

1907. Do you think it would operate harshly on the workwoman?—No, I feel convinced that it would not. It has not done so in cases where it has been already adopted. The uncertainty at the present of the woman as to what is really the wage is very great. They are not able to calculate the wage without the material. I might quote a striking instance. In the corset trade, especially the common corsets, a large amount of cane is used, which is an expensive item, and a large amount of thread; the workers receive a very, very small wage; it is quoted to them as a wage; it may be for instance 1s. 6d. a dozen. The amount of cane and cotton used for which they have to pay really reduces that wage to 10d. a dozen and even less than that. The women are not able to calculate and realise that part of the wage that is quoted will be repaid to the employer in the shape of material. Therefore they are not able to bargain for an increase of wage; they merely submit week after week to the deduction of a large proportion of their wage for the material, and they do not realise what is the exact rate at which they are being paid. If the employer were obliged to supply that material the inadequacy of the wage would at once be apparent.

1908. We now come to a more difficult part of the inquiry, namely, deductions for sick clubs and hospitals They are made in most factories, are then not ?—Yes.

1909. Have you had complaints about that ?—Yes, I have from time to time—very largely from those who have left or are leaving, and sometimes from the women with a very small wage and from young girls with a small wage.

1910. In principle of course you would object to all kinds of fines and deductions becoming a source of profit to the employer ?—Yes.

1911. But in regard to this deduction you will observe that it is distinctly in the interests of the workers ?—Yes.

1912. In fact it is a kind of co-operative enterprise among the workers under which they can get sick attendance and the like of that ?—Yes.

1913. You do not object to that in principle ?—No, I do not in principle.

1914. Is there substance in any of those complaints that you have had; I mean, are there any of them that you think might be rectified ?—I think where a wage is very low and the proportion deducted is high in respect of that wage, they might reasonably make a complaint. The men have a good wage, and they are able to pay their 2d. a week, but the women and young girls very often seriously suffer from any loss on their wage which is necessary to them; and, though they might be quite willing to pay a certain amount towards the sick club and the hospital, they are not willing to have this 2d. taken off in the office week after week, without their being consulted at all.

1915. A suggestion has been made to us that in the case of any deductions still to be permitted by law there might be a provision for a committee of workers and employers in the locality fixing the reasonableness and the ratio to wages. Have you any views with regard to that ?—Yes, I think that would be very good if it were really representative, but I find so often where there is something of that kind that all classes of workers have not been included; it has been framed too much from the men's point of view; the women have not been sufficiently consulted, so that they accept what has been done for them very reluctantly and feel that their view—taking into account their small wage and their having to be absent sometimes and lose work—has not been sufficiently represented and the scale of pay has not been fixed within the limits that they feel they could legitimately spare.

1916. I suppose I might take it from you that, running all through your evidence there is the great hardship that occurs, or may be rendered deplorable by the fact that there is little or no organisation of female workers ?—That is so.

1917. If they had organisations that could articulate their complaints and emphasise them, some of those things of which you have given us samples might disappear ?—Yes.

1918. Then there are deductions for cook or mess room. These are becoming increasingly common, you say ?—Yes.

1919. But they are not ordinarily objected to ?—No, they are not. Miss R. E. Squire.

1920. Except by those who never use the facilities provided ?—Yes, 21 June 1906.

1921. But upon the whole you think that is rather a good thing ?—I do; where the workers actually use it I think it is very good, and they appreciate it, as long as they get value for their money.

1922. And in your experience you have found value got ?—In certain cases good value; in others, very poor indeed; they would pay for a gas stove week after week that was in bad order and that was not sufficient for the requirements of the number, and matters of that kind that want carefully looking into.

1923. Then you say that a widespread idea exists among factory operatives that all deductions from wages were rendered illegal by the Truck Act, and that agreements respecting them have no legal force ?—Yes, I found that almost universally.

1924. How has that arisen—I suppose just because the Statute began by saying "deductions are illegal" and then all the rest was exceptions ?—I think that is it. The fathers and husbands of these women always meet me on that ground, and I fail to convince them, generally, that deductions can only be regulated.

1925. Then you say, "In not a few instances fines and deductions have been altogether abolished, or greatly modified, in factories, where formerly they were largely used, and the occupiers have expressed themselves as entirely satisfied with the result as regards punctuality, discipline, and quality of work. I have specially watched such cases and can quote instances." Will you give me those instances ?—There are one or two large factories where there were very heavy fines and deductions when I first visited.

1926. In what district of the country ?—In Bristol and in Birmingham; the practice of fining is very prevalent in both those districts. When these things were represented to them, and especially after conviction had been obtained in the neighbourhood and a press notice had appeared, the occupiers either asked advice, or pressure was put upon them to give up these practices—both fines and charges for bad work—and they did so, in tailoring, corsetmaking, pen factories, chocolate making, and many others. When I visited some time afterwards to check it, I found no grievance at all; I had to introduce the subject in order to find out whether the employer had suffered, and he treated it then with indifference—that he had no case at all.

1927 Then you say that "charges for damaged work have ceased in all the factories where convictions were obtained for illegal deductions or charges under this head, or where a severe caution was given" ?—Yes, and even where the case was dismissed.

1928. Has any complaint been made by the occupiers that the amount of work damaged has increased in consequence ?—No.

1929. What has increased, you have no doubt, has been discipline in the correct sense—watchfulness and supervision ?—Yes. And a large number of these cases have not been due to any real faultiness of the worker; in many cases they had been the accidental fault or misfortune of a good worker.

Miss ROSE E. SQUIRE, one of H. M. Inspectors of Factories, was recalled; and further Examined.

[Miss R. E. Squire.]

26 June 1906.

By the Chairman.

1930. I am desirous of asking you to-day with regard to the litigations to which you have been a party, so as, if possible, to obtain the advantage of your experience as to the contraventions that you have either checked or attempted to check, and your observations upon them. Would you mind taking in the first place the cases which have gone to appeal?—The case of Squire v. Sweeney was the first that went to appeal.

1931. That appears in the Irish weekly law report of the 30th January, 1900, upon a preliminary point, but the real decision appears to have been on the 27th of June, 1900. I understand the question in Squire v. Sweeney was whether Section 3 of the Act of 1831 could be effectively appealed to in a case which you allege as one of paying a worker otherwise than in current coin of the realm?—Yes.

1932. Please tell us in your own words the facts of this Sweeney case?—Messrs. John Sweeney & Sons are a firm of grocers in Dunlow, county Donegal, and they are also agents for Belfast firms in giving out wool for knitting into hosiery. The defendants paid the persons who knitted hosiery by handing to them either grocery or a ticket with a value in money marked upon it. In the particular case that went to appeal Mary McGeogeghan, a woman living alone in a cabin at some distance, took out wool which she knitted into hosiery, socks, and received in exchange a ticket with, I think, the sum 2s. 3d. marked upon it. She returned to the shop with that ticket and received groceries for it. The summons was for paying otherwise than in current coin, that is to say, by a ticket with the money value upon it.

1933. You refer to Section 3 of the Act of 1831, which stipulates that the "entire amount of the wage earned and payable by any artificers in respect of any labour by them done shall be paid to such artificers in the current coin of the realm and not otherwise." ?—That is so. The case came before the court seven times; for the first two or three times the witnesses could not be obtained, they had absconded. In the first instance a warrant was issued, but they were not to be found the second time, and in the third some technical objection was made to the summons. Finally it was heard on the 6th of March, and the bench then was divided, nearly half of the magistrates being in favour of a conviction.

1934. Was it a large bench?—There were eight magistrates present. An objection was taken to four of them, first by myself when I conducted the case, and then by, Mr. Murphy, who appeared for the Attorney-General of Ireland.

1935. What was the ground of your objection?—That four of the magistrates were engaged in the same trade and occupation as the defendants, and that a fifth was a nephew of the defendant. The magistrates refused to withdraw and the case was heard. The five who were interested in the business were the five who were against a conviction. Four similar cases had previously come before the courts and convictions had followed in each of those cases; but this case was very hotly contested, and finally the summons was dismissed, the majority of the magistrates being for a dismissal on the facts. Application was then made that they should state a case and they refused. Finally they agreed to state a case, but the two resident magistrates and two other magistrates refused to sign that case as being grossly incorrect and misleading. Finally a mandamus was issued and a case was stated for the High Court. When the case came before the High Court, two points were raised which had not been raised at the hearing. They were that the work was not manual labour, because knitting did not exercise the sinews and muscles, therefore that it could not be manual work, and the second point was that the woman did not come within the definition in the Employers' and Workmen's Act of an artificer, in respect that there was not a contract of service or a contract personally to execute the work. The Lord Chief Baron in giving his decision stated that he was of opinion that the work was not manual labour, and that the workwoman was outside the definition of an artificer.

1936. Would you please explain the second point more clearly?—It was argued that the woman who took the work did not agree with the person who gave out the work that she would do it herself personally. It was said that the only verbal understanding with them was "here is certain material, bring it back in the form of knitted socks," and it was not asked or required that the work should be done only by the person to whom the wool was given; that it was in many cases, as a matter of fact, done by relatives of the person who took the wool, and that it was essential to the meaning of an "artificer" within the Act that there should be a contract of service, that is, a contract for a definite period of time, or that there should be a contract personally by the workers to execute the work with their own hands. I was not able to prove that either of these conditions existed in the case of the out-workers in Donegal.

1937. There was no writing of any kind?—No. Persons came to the shop and asked for wool, which was given to them, and they brought it back knitted. Some of these persons did the work themselves and some employed relatives at their homes. In the case to which I have referred the woman had done the work herself.

1938. It appears from your narrative that upon both points the prosecution failed?—Yes, that is so.

1939. Take the first point, that the work was not manual labour. I suppose that followed other decisions?—It did.

1940. And was largely governed by precedents in England?—Yes.

1941. Have you any view about that?—My view was strongly represented at length by counsel at the hearing, namely, that the movement and the use of the hands in knitting was distinctly manual labour.

1942. Do you think there would be harm to anybody in getting the definition of manual labourer or manual worker or artificer extended to cover such cases?—I think it would be a very necessary step.

1943. You do not think any harm would ensue?—No.

1944. But good?—Good decidedly.

1945. Then with regard to the second point. Will you explain what is your view about that?—I hold a very strong view that the number of out-workers throughout the country being so great, and the oppression exercised by the persons who give out the work to them being of such a very serious character, it is essential that they should be protected by the Truck Act as much as any worker within a factory or workshop.

1946. I gather that the question in Squire v. Sweeney did not so much turn on the definition of outworker as on the absence of a personal contract.?—That was so. The same point as was raised in the Midland Lace Company's case.

1947. The point of the decision seems rather to be not that it was an out-worker who was concerned, but that it was a person who had entered into no contract for personal service ?—That was so.

1948. What is your view as to a remedy ?—That the Act should be amended by a clause providing that nothing in the definition of a worker should exclude persons by reason of the fact that they do not make a verbal or written contract to do the work personally.

1949. Was there any evidence given in that case as to how the actual knitter was paid ?—Yes, the evidence was quite clear, as in the other cases where there had been a conviction, that the worker was paid in goods, and that no coin at all passed in the transaction.

1950. But there was a middle hand in the case between the person who did the work and the person who got the work and supplied the material ?—In the case in point the person who actually did the work came from her cottage to the place where the wool was given out, then she knitted the wool, and brought her work back, and was paid in groceries.

1951. I understood that members of her family have assisted ?—There was nothing in the arrangement to prevent it, but as a matter of fact, that was not so in the case.

1952. Was it true that it was the direct knitter who furnished the goods ?—Yes, that fact was proved—the direct knitter.

1953. So the difficulty arose out of a simple abstraction or possibility that that knitter might have farmed out the work ?—Yes.

1954. But as a matter of fact nothing of the kind was established ?—Quite so. We selected the case of a woman who herself did the work so that there might be no flaw.

1955. I suppose you have a strong view on the subject ? —Very strong indeed.

1956. Do you think it would be a valuable improvement in the law if it were held to apply where it is proved in fact that the work is done by the recipient of the goods ?—I think that would be an improvement, but I do not think from my experience of the out-workers that that would go far enough.

1957. As a second step, do you not think the law might, with advantage, be made strong enough to meet the case of an outworker, whether under direct contract for the supply of goods or not, who is paid in goods ?—I think so.

1958. Have you any further view on that subject that you would like to state ?—I should like, if possible, to see the law extended in such a way that it would not only include the person who actually did the work, but say the mother of a family who employs her children to help her with the work, or who has been helped by her sisters, she herself going backwards and forwards. I think it might also be well if the law could include what we know as small contractors—that is, persons who do work themselves but also make a practice of giving quantities of it to others. In such a case the woman herself deals entirely with the giver-out, and if there is any flaw in the work, she is made to pay for the loss or damage, although she herself may not have caused the loss or damage.

1959. Under the decision in Squire v. Sweeney, it would be impossible to catch that case ?—Quite impossible.

1960. I assume you think the law should be made so as to get at such a case ?—Distinctly.

1961. Do you think there is often hardship caused in such cases ?—Yes, a great deal of hardship. I have had a large number of cases where I considered there should be prosecution, before the decision in England was given, when we were still prosecuting in respect of outworkers. I refer to cases where I found the woman suffering severely and in debt to the employer for perhaps over £1, herself a widow in very straitened circumstances, not able to do much work, but doing a little herself, and giving the rest out to neighbours. She might have large sums deducted from the amount due for the work in respect of damage which she herself had not caused, and being a sub-contractor she might be unable to trace the damage to the person who had actually done it. In fact, the damage might only be found out at the warehouse, and the poor woman, although herself in great need, might have to pay for that damage. I could not prosecute, however, in such a case, because she was a contractor, and what she was receiving was not wage but profit.

1962. Has your experience ever covered a case of this kind ? That the person so hit by deductions has passed off the blow to the actual knitter ?—Yes, that does occur sometimes.

1963. But the law is practically powerless, is it, where there is an intermediary ?—I think that in such a case we might have proceeded, but for the decision that an outworker is altogether outside the provisions of the Act, unless she personally contracts to do the work.

1964. I think the next step in your litigation was the case of Squire v. Bayer, decided in May, 1901, and reported in 2 King's Bench, 299. I understand that in that case you founded upon the Act of 1896 ?—Yes, that was so.

1965. And your anxiety was to enforce Subsection 1 of Section 1 of that Act which prohibits contracting for any deduction from wages unless the contract specifies the acts or omissions in respect of which the fine or deduction may be imposed ?—Yes.

1966. We have heard the details of that case, and I think the rule of the works was that all workers shall observe good order and decorum while in the factory ? —Yes.

1967. And your view, not unnaturally, was that that was not a sufficient specification of the acts or omissions ? —Yes, that it was too vague.

1968. But the court held that although the rule did not specify the particular acts or omission, still there was a sufficient compliance with the requirements of the section ?—Yes.

1969. What happened in that case was that somebody was playing upon a Jew's harp ?—Yes. The girls were left in the workroom during the dinner-time, and they had been amusing themselves. One girl playing on a little mouth harp and others dancing to it.

1970. The difficulty arose in that case largely because of the finding of the magistrates upon the facts ?—Yes.

1971. What was the composition of the magistrates' court in Squire v. Bayer ?—It was a justices' court, there were two justices, they found, as a fact, that the act was unruly, one which caused dust and that dust might cause injury to the work or materials of the employer.

1972. What was the nature of the work ?—Stitching corsets. The corsets were left lying on the benches during the dinner-time, and the magistrates found that the dust might be raised by dancing, which dust might reach the corsets and injure them.

1973. Do you think you could frame a form of words more clearly than those already legalised by Parliament to meet such cases ?—It seemed to me before the decision was given that the words as to specifying and describing the acts or omissions were sufficiently clear.

1974. Of course Parliament would proceed negatively, and say that no general rules would satisfy these words ?—Yes.

1975. Does this case suggest to your mind anything about the whole system of fines ?—It appears to me that fines of that nature should not be permitted in a factory, because they are open to such abuse. There are fines of a kind that no regulations in the Act would prevent the creeping in of injustice to the worker.

1976. Of course the rule in question was purely disciplinary ?—It was.

1977. Suppose all fines of that character were abolished, what do you think would be the result upon discipline ? Do you think there would be confusion or loss ?—No; I think the same good discipline would be maintained as is now maintained in large works where there is never any fine, but where it is understood clearly by the worker that no act of insubordination will be tolerated. The manager and foreman control the girls by influence and by other means, but there is no fine of this nature, to my knowledge, in most large well-conducted factories.

Miss R. E. Squire.

26 June 1906.

1978. Do you think that the ordinary reluctance of the workmen to do an act which may produce dismissal might have a disciplinary effect ?—Yes, I think that is sufficient in most cases.

1979. Coupled, on the other hand, with the requisite supervision ?—Quite so.

1980. Now we come to the important point of Squire v. The Midland Lace Company. That was decided in 1905, and is reported in 2 King's Bench, page 360. That was taken under the Statute of 1896, Section 2, Sub-section 1 (b) ?—Yes. Sub-section 1 (b) is : " The deduction or payment to be made under the contract does not exceed the actual or estimated damage or loss occasioned to the employer by the act or omission of the workman, or of some person over whom he has control, or for whom he has by the contract agreed to be responsible." I should have read Subsection (c). " The amount of the deduction or payment is fair and reasonable, having regard to all the circumstances of the case."

1981. That being what you founded upon, will you just narrate the circumstances briefly ?—The firm are manufacturers of lace, and they give out the pieces of lace to have the threads clipped and the necessary threads drawn to separate the lace into lengths. This lace is given out to a large army of workers, who take the work to their own homes and bring it back clipped.

1982. What was the locality ?—This was in Nottingham. They also employ a certain number of these women from time to time inside the factory. Of these women one was employed outside and one inside the factory during a large part of her time. The lace work is paid at a very low price, and if it is not done perfectly, if there are any holes cut in it, or if it is not good work, the amount is stopped from the worker's wage. In those cases the deductions varied from 4d. to 6d.—chiefly 6d.—a week, and the wages varied from 10½d. to 2s. 6d. in the week. The worker during her work in some weeks would get very small wages ; this one sometimes 10½d. and sometimes 2s. 6d.

1983. How many hours would she be engaged earning her half-crown ?—It works out, as a rule, about 1d. an hour, sometimes ¾d. or less. In this case, on the date in question—Thursday, June 30th—a deduction was made from this worker's wage to the amount of 6d., the total wage being 1s. 11d. That 6d. was part of a larger sum deducted week by week. She was a policeman's widow, and she lived by herself, and she took this work out to aid her pension ; she was not a very skilled worker ; when she took the work in she had 6d. deducted from the sum due to her, and she found by degrees that week after week 1s. and 6d was deducted ; then she asked the reason, and found that she was paying for work that she was said to have damaged. That is, work that she did herself.

1984. Will you tell me what she got and what she brought home ?—She took out a piece of lace as it came from the loom, just at it was woven ; then her work was to separate this lace by drawing the back thread ; then it would be separated into lace such as is sold in the shops by the yard. Then from the back of that lace she would clip the superfluous threads that connect the pattern. The machine makes the pattern and then the threads on the back connect the sprigs and leaves, and they have to be cleared away. That requires very good sight and care, or else the worker's scissors will clip into the fabric and make holes.

1985. This widow discovered that she was having deductions made ?—Yes. The point in the Act that there should be particulars in writing showing the acts or omissions on each occasion had not been complied with, and this worker was in ignorance as to the total amount, and the time that she might be paying for this work. That I ascertained at the factory. Then I took proceedings because of the general unfairness and unreasonableness, as it seemed, of the deductions. There was, as a matter of fact, no contract with the outworker, and therefore the proceedings were taken for the deduction being not in accordance with the contract—not in pursuance of any contract—as required by the Act.

1986. Although in point of fact you had the two points behind, namely, that the deduction had been made exceeding the actual or estimated damage, and also that it was not fair and reasonable ?—Quite so. Those two points were argued and pressed upon the Bench, the technical offence being to make a deduction in the absence of any contract whatever, such as the Act requires.

1987. Still, your complaint was that there was a violation of the Statute in respect of there being no written contract ?—Yes, that was the complaint.

1988. I mean there was no part of the indictment or complaint that referred to the other things as substantial offences ?—No, the whole indictment was that they had illegally made a deduction in that the deduction was made in the absence of such a contract as required by Section 2.

1989. Now will you give us the decision in that case ? —The decision in the High Court was that these workers were not within the Statute because they did not contract to do the work personally. The magistrates found as a fact that the work was done by the women themselves in their own homes, but that there was no undertaking on their part to do the work personally, and that the firm did not require such an undertaking—that the whole transaction was the lace being handed over to the worker to be brought back clipped ; no questions were asked as to who did it and no undertaking was given.

1990. Now there, as in Squire v. Sweeney, the same thing was found in fact, namely, that the worker whose case was in question, had actually performed the work ?—That is so.

1991. But as in Squire v. Sweeney, so in Squire v. The Midland Lace Co., there was a possible abstraction behind, namely, that she might have performed her contract by getting somebody else to do it ?—That is exactly the position.

1992. And it was upon that abstraction that the Courts thought that they could not decide, or that they did not require to decide the case upon the proved facts ? —No. It was dismissed entirely by the magistrates at the petty sessions on the point of law, and it was decided in the High Court on exactly that point without any reference to the facts.

1993. Now just take that case. You think that that is typical of an outworker's case ?—Quite typical.

1994. And that it would be open in all outworkers' cases to make the same defence that was made successfully then, namely, that there was no contract for personal service ?—Quite so. In the numerous cases of hardship and complaints made to me by the outworkers since that case, I have endeavoured to establish that there was some contract, some verbal understanding or some agreement that would come within the definition of a contract under the Truck Act of 1831, with the outworker to do the work personally, but I failed to find it ; it is so indefinite.

1995. Now, that depends upon this, that in the case of persons engaged inside a factory or inside a workshop there is a personal contract which can be enforced by their presence there under supervision ?—Yes, that is so.

1996. What is your view as to the principle of outworkers' work being protected by Statute ?—I think it is most essential that the outworkers should be protected by a Statute that would definitely include them, without any possibility of their escaping the definition.

1997. Are you able from personal experience to testify to the hardship, and possible misery, that is caused by their non-inclusion ?—I am, most emphatically.

1998. How does it operate ?—In the first place, the outworker never knows how much he or she is going to pay ?—No ; there is a general vagueness of the contract altogether ; then, the payment may be made, as it is in the instance I have already given and elsewhere, otherwise than in current coin.

1999. Once the outworkers are outside the Statute, then of course all the things that the Statute aims at lose their effect, that is to say, fairness and reasonableness, not exceeding the actual or estimated damage, not being paid in current coin, or anything at all, all the protection of the law fails ?—Quite so, and all the fines that may be imposed for trivial acts are largely imposed on outworkers.

2000. In all these respects is it your opinion that the hardship continues to be inflicted ?—Yes, I know it does up to the present.

2001. And you are somewhat urgent, I understand, as to the law, if possible, being amended in that respect ?—Very indeed.

2002. Again, if it were amended, do you think harm would come to anybody ?—I cannot see how harm would arise at all from that. They are a class that deserve every protection that they could have. Under Section 3 they require protection, because they buy very largely their materials to be used in the work, cotton and so on, from the employer, and I find very, very heavy charges are made for the materials, far in excess of what the occupier himself pays, so that he is making a profit out of the outworker in many cases by the cotton he sells to them; that we can now do nothing to prevent.

2003. All that is completely blanketed or kept out of view by the fact that you cannot put into operation in the case of outworkers the Statute ?—It is, quite.

2004. Now, you have given us very clearly the important litigated cases. Would you now indicate those cases where the prosecutions have not gone to the Appeal Court, because of the findings of fact being so clearly against you ?—Yes. There have been numerous cases which were taken under very much the same circumstances as the others, but, as they were dismissed on the question of fact, I was unable to take them to the High Court. I will mention the case of C. Brandauer and Co. of Birmingham, the steel pen manufacturers. There were heavy deductions made from the outworkers in respect of pens that were alleged to have been damaged by them, and the magistrate dismissed the case, because he found as a fact that the deductions were fair and reasonable. He based his decision entirely upon the fact that the deductions did not exceed the damage or loss occasioned to the employer. That subsection in my experience has made more impression upon the Courts than Subsection (c) that the amount must be fair and reasonable having regard to all the circumstances. The previous subsection is that it does not exceed the actual or estimated loss or damage. That is a matter that can be very well pressed home by the occupier, who is able to bring a good deal of evidence to show the amount that he has lost by the worker's carelessness, and the magistrates in nearly every instance where these cases have been dismissed have placed very great stress upon the loss of the occupier.

2005. Now, can you give me the proportion to the wages of the sum deducted from the worker ?—I will take the first case I mentioned, the case of Brandauers of Birmingham, the penmakers; a girl of fourteen earned in a week 8s. for every 200 gross and was fined 6d. a gross for eight gross; that was 4s. That meant that she did 100 gross, admittedly perfectly, for nothing. Another girl did ninety gross and earned 2s. 3d.; that took her a day and a half; she was said to have made bad work to the extent of six gross at 6d. a gross; 3s. was deducted from her wages. That meant that she did a day and a half's work for nothing and made eighty-four gross of pens perfectly without wage. A married woman, a grinder, a good worker, who had never made waste before and had been employed for eighteen years, earned 2s. 3d. on ninety gross and was fined 15s. 3d.; the deduction was made by 1d. in every shilling earned week after week until the whole had been deducted. The magistrate in his decision stated that he considered that that was a great element of fairness and reasonableness in the deduction—that the whole was not taken at once—but it resulted in the workers getting permanently in debt, many of them, to the employer; the penny in the shilling deduction went on every week because before one set of waste was paid another commenced, and several workers in the factory were £5 and more in debt.

2006. So that in these cases the proportion of fines relative to the total wage was enormous ?—It was.

2007. In the first case you cited it amounted to 50 per cent. ?—Yes.

2008. Have you any views as to fines in such cases for damaged work ?—I think in the large majority of cases that have come before me there was no case made out by the employer for a fine at all. In many of these cases the worker was known to be a good worker, and there was some fault which would require very careful inquiry to elicit whether it was the tool that was to blame or whether it was the actual carelessness of the worker. In many similar factories a case of that kind would be met by caution to the worker.

2009. Do you favour the total abolition of deductions for waste for spoilt work and damages ?—I do.

Miss R. E. Squire.

26 June 1906.

2010. Failing the total abolition, would you favour at any rate, that in no week should more than a certain percentage of the wages be deducted ?—Yes, and with piecework I should like to go further than that—that the deduction on a certain piecework should not exceed a certain proportion of the piecework rate on that particular work. The wage that is earned in the week is due entirely to the effort of the worker, and she is employed continuously on small jobs at a low wage, and in every one of those she takes a very great risk if she is to be made to pay for any damage. My opinion is very strong that any liabilities of hers should be limited to some fair proportion of the wage on that particular job.

2011. Now to come back to the critical question. If the deduction for wastage were made illegal do you think there would be worse work than before or less work than before ?—I do not think so, because in every one of the cases that I have taken, the deductions that were complained of have been immediately stopped, whether there was a conviction or whether the case was dismissed. I have taken pains to ascertain from the employers whether their work has suffered afterwards from their greater leniency to the workers, and I have not had a single case of complaint from the employer that there has been any increase in bad work.

2012. Then have you any other case on facts which you have not appealed ?—Yes. There was the case of McBride v. Williams; that was an Irish case, in which the question of appeal was considered, but that was dismissed on the facts. In that case the conditions were much the same. A girl was fined 1s. 5½d. for soiling four dozen handkerchiefs; her wages were 9d. for twelve dozen; they were a common type of handkerchiefs that had to be very rapidly passed through the machine, and the wage would not allow of very great care being taken; they were rough coarse work.

2013. Just see that I am right. She was paid ¾d. a dozen ?—Yes.

2014. And if one of any dozen was spoilt, it reckoned as a dozen spoilt ?—Yes.

2015. And for that dozen she was fined 4¼d. ?—Yes.

2016. Her total wage for the dozen was ¾d., and she was fined 4¼d. if any one of the dozen was spoilt ?—Yes. There was no evidence there at all that the soil was occasioned by the worker. The handkerchiefs were found soiled and she was fined. There was admittedly in that factory no effort made among such a very large number (between 400 and 500 workers) to trace the damage to the worker. Work that had passed through a particular set of hands was reckoned to that worker if not found satisfactory.

2017. What did the girl do with the handkerchiefs ?—Sewing machine hemming. Another girl was fined 5¾d. for damage to three dozen handkerchiefs; her wage (she was only a learner) was from 2s. to 10d. a week. Another girl earned 7d. on handkerchiefs for which she was fined 5s.

2018. Now let me ask you this. Many of those fines are imposed irrespective of whether the workers are skilled or only learning their business ?—That is so.

2019. Does not that seem to you to be a case in which the learners for instance should be paid so much less and not subjected to fines at all ?—Yes. They are as a matter of fact paid less than the others, they get a lower rate more often, and if they do not get a lower rate they are put on to the very low class of work that is otherwise distributed together with better work.

2020. You mean that they actually get a lower rate as learners and have the reduction made from the lower rate ?—Yes. The magistrate in giving his decision there said that on the facts he could not say that the deduction was unfair, because it had been made by instalments and did not exceed the damage or loss to the employer; he considered that the deduction from a learner was reprehensible but he did not consider it a sufficient evidence of unfairness for him to convict.

2021. Have you any view having regard to those cases as to whether it is possible to have an independent authority like the inspector pronounce an opinion as to unfairness or unreasonableness, or, if not the inspector, a joint committee of workers and employers ?—I think the joint committee is preferable to the inspector.

Miss R. E. Squire.

26 June 1906.

2022. Then have you any other case to put before us ?—In the case of the Green Mount Spinning Co., also in Dublin, proceedings were taken under the same section that the fines were not in accordance with such a contract as is required by the Act, not being fair and reasonable. In that case the magistrate also on the facts dismissed the case. He held that the fine was reasonable. In one of those cases there was an old woman, a sweeper ; every week she was fined 1s. from a wage of 6s. for being late. The magistrate agreed with the counsel for the defence that the wages were to be regarded as a charitable dole to which the firm attached the condition of punctuality, and as this had not been fulfilled, as she had been late, they were entitled to make this fine, and it was, in the circumstances, not unfair or unreasonable.

2023. There was no writing there ?—There was a contract in that case—a contract to make a deduction. The offence was not that there was no contract, but that the deduction was not in accordance with the contract, not in accordance with such a contract as the Act requires ; in that it was not fair and reasonable.

2024. At all events you did not appeal there ?—No, because it was entirely a question of fact. And there was also in that case a question of deduction for spoiling work. A quantity of waste was found in the spinner's bag ; she objected that she did not make the waste ; that it was put there by another spinner, but she was fined a considerable sum for that. The element of unfair and unreasonable was considered in that case to be that the amount of the waste was very small in proportion to the fine, that the woman was a careful worker who would not be likely to make waste ; that she had worked for many years without doing so and that the wage in that factory is exceedingly low. We have had great difficulty in laying the informations under that section for what was not fair and reasonable, because of sub-section (c) merely being attached to the contract and not to the deduction, so that the deduction had to be attacked in every case through the contract. In the first case that was taken for an unfair and unreasonable deduction, the information was laid solely under sub-section (c) and stated that it was an illegal deduction in that the amount was not fair and reasonable having regard to all the circumstances of the case. That case was dismissed by the magistrate as he said he could not hear evidence as to the unfairness and unreasonableness of the deductions because there was no contract of any kind, and therefore, the firm were not at liberty to make any deduction.

2025. I am not quite sure that I follow that ; it is my fault I have no doubt ?—It was rather a curious case, and we have always since that case laid the information through the contract, attacking either the absence of the contract or the fact that the deduction was not in accordance with the terms of a good contract, or that the contract itself was bad because it did not include the limitation that the deduction must be fair and reasonable.

2026. I fancy the judge would rely upon the operative portion of Section 2, the beginning being "The employer shall not make any contract with any workman unless" so and so ?—Yes, that is so.

2027. He thought that all the rest of the section was ancillary to the operative part ?—Yes, and that the information should merely be laid under Sub-section 2, "An employer shall not make any deduction or receive any payment unless the payment is in pursuance of, or in accordance with, such a contract." Three cases were taken in Leeds for the sale of damaged garments to workers. There was a conviction there, but they illustrate the point that I am upon: for this cause they were specially taken. In the first case there was no contract whatever and a deduction was made. In the second case there was a bad form of contract ; it merely said any work damaged will be charged for, and there was a deduction. In the third case there was a good form of contract which followed the terms of the Act exactly, but the deduction was not in accordance with it as it was not in itself fair and reasonable.

2028. Now does the whole of that suggest to you that this bit of legislation about deduuctions in accordance with contract needs to be overhaled ?—Yes, very much.

2029. Would it be an improvement even as things stand that, instead of the provision being a contract with a deduction, the law should directly hit at a deduction from wages ?—I think myself it would be a very great improvement, once allowing that deductions for these matters are to be permitted.

2030. Of course you do not grant that deductions should be permitted at all ?—No, I do not grant that, but if I had to proceed under any Act that allowed them, it would be a very great help in proceedings before the Courts to be able to attack the deduction itself. I have known great difficulty in many cases in getting in any evidence at all. The defence has treated it entirely as a technical matter ; the magistrate has been inclined to agree, and sometimes no evidence has been allowed at all as to the unfairness and unreasonableness, and I have been left merely with a conviction and a small penalty upon the technical matter.

2031. The major grievance is the existence of the possibility of making deductions at all ?—It is.

2032. You are against that ?—Yes.

2033. Is there any other case you would like to call our attention to on the facts—I mean of any different character to those you have dealt with ?—I think not. There is one point—I do not know whether I should mention it now—in laying the informations. The Act makes no provision that the ostensible occupier may be proceeded against, as in the Factory Act and that has occasioned great difficulty under the Truck Act. In all cases under the Factory Act it is quite sufficient to proceed against the ostensible occupier.

2034. Would you mind calling my attention to the section ?—This is the Act of 1901, Section 146, Sub-section 3 : "It shall be sufficient to state the name of the ostensible occupier of the factory or workshop, or the title of the firm by which the occupier is usually known."

2035. That is a convenience in factory prosecutions. In the Truck Act you say there is no similar provision ?—There is no similar provision, and we have no power to obtain the names of the firms. That has occasioned great difficulty, because in some cases we have proceeded against the firm, and the proceedings have gone on with no question being raised ; in others, immediately the defending solicitor has made objection to the summons because it was in the name of the firm and not in the name of individuals. In Ireland that led to the adjournment and to the obstruction case, because we could not find out who were the persons against whom we should proceed, and when we went to inquire we were not allowed to make the inquiry. In another case where a firm was being proceeded against I found as well as I could from inquiries in the town (it was in Leeds) the name of the occupier, and laid the summons against him ; when the case was heard the solicitor said that the man had been dead for some years ; we could not find out then the name and an adjournment was asked for, but I happened on that to see the two gentlemen in Court that I had seen in the factory, and I was able to point them out to the stipendiary magistrate, and he had their names put in ; but I did not know them, and I had no way of finding out who was the person against whom I should proceed.

2036. Have you any other suggestion to make ?—I think that is all that arises out of those cases.

2037. Now, your operations of course are covered by the Factories and Workshops Act and the Truck Act ?—Yes.

2038. Neither of those Statutes applies to shops ?—No, not at all, only to places where work is given out.

2039. You would describe those things that you have had to challenge by way of prosecution as abuses ?—Yes, I should.

2040. Have you any reason to doubt that there are similar abuses in connection particularly with large shops ?—No, I know that there are very similar abuses.

2041. Have you any view as to law affecting such cases ?—The Truck Act does apply, does it not, to shops ?—It is only that the factory inspectors have no power to administer it. The law does apply to shop assistants.

2042. The difficulty we are confronted with is this : that we can get nobody apparently who can give us anything like official information as to malfeasance, if you like to call it so, in shops ?—Yes, but the employees themselves will be able through their organisations to give you that.

2043. Do you not think it would be expedient to have some systematic inspection of shops ?—I think very much so, and I have been asked by shop assistants as I passed through on my way to the workrooms very often whether I could not do something for them.

2044. Your own personal experience, as it were, has not covered shops ?—No. Miss Deane, I think, has some information on that point.

2045. I wonder if you could tell me your view upon this, or if you have any view upon it. Suppose, on the one hand, central Government inspectors like yourself; suppose upon the other hand municipal inspectors who examine about sanitation and things like that. Between these two sets of officers, which would be the more efficient for inspection of shops, do you think ?—The municipal inspectors already have certain duties in shops with regard to seats and hours, and I should imagine that they would be able to enforce the Truck Act as regards shop assistants in matters of discipline. The question must already arise sometimes with regard to the seats, I should imagine.

2046. You have no experience as to whether, as it were, the municipal screw could not be applied to a local officer on similar matters to this ? We recognise very gratefully the entire independence of the inspectorate of whom you are one. Do you think there would be the same independence on the part of municipal inspectors ? —I think it would be a very much more difficult matter for the local inspector, where the feeling was very strong in a particular town; it would be far more difficult, because in the case of shops where I know these fines exist they are shops that belong to persons of very high standin the town, members of the council, and so on; it would be a difficult matter no doubt for the inspector who served under the Council.

By Mr. Ramsay Macdonald.

2047. I should like to ask you first of all if you have any experience in the exempted cotton districts ?—A slight experience.

2048. Have you formed any conclusions as to the effect, particularly upon women, of those exempting provisions ? —Yes, because I have been approached by the women very largely in the cotton districts to extend the same help to them that I have extended in the neighbouring woollen and worsted districts, and I had to refuse, pointing out to them that they were exempt. But the details of the cases were placed before me, and there was nothing to distinguish them from similar cases where I had acted in the woollen and worsted districts.

2049. Would it be possible, either now, or by way of supplementary information, to give us a list of typical cases that have been brought before you explaining the nature of the fines about which complaints have been lodged with you ?—I could get one or two instances, but they would be more representative than exhaustive, because as the matter was outside my powers, and I was engaged then under great stress upon another inquiry that was within the Act, I did not make the same notes of those as I should of any matter with which I could deal. There would be only one or two that would be representative of others.

2050. I think it would be interesting if we had details so far as you can supply them relating to those cases, in the same way that you have given us details relating to Ireland, Somerset, Cornwall and other places ?—I will endeavour to get one or two instances; they would be only representative, and not exhaustive at all.*

2051. Speaking generally, how far would you say those conditions which you say have existed in Ireland, Somerset and Cornwall exist now in those counties ?—I believe they are very much the same.

2052. Just as bad as ever ?—When I made inquiries more recently I found that the workers told me they could get money sometimes when they asked for it, but it was an understanding that they should get goods.

2053. The actual cases that you brought before us were cases that you experienced three to six years ago ?—Yes.

2054. Have you any idea of what the effect of those legal decisions that you have been referring to has been upon these practices ?—In Ireland I made an enquiry to find out, and I found that most of the persons engaged were impressed with the fact that there had been convictions, and they considered that it was illegal, and therefore it was most difficult to get any information. The fact that the High Court decision had really put those workers outside did not seem to have impressed them so much as the convictions actually in their own neighbourhood. The practice was still going on, but it had been driven deeper in, so that it was difficult to get information.

2055. So that it is more important than ever that we should have legislation on the subject ?—Quite so.

2056. I rather gathered from your evidence, taking the general impression that it has made upon me, that Ireland is particularly bad ?—I think it is. There are some parts of England that are as bad, but only here and there.

2057. Is that owing, in your opinion, to a lack of sufficient inspecting staff ?—That I could hardly say; it is some years since I was in Ireland, and the Truck Act, 1896 was comparatively new then.

2058. What I should like to have your opinion upon, if you would care to express it, is this. How far should we recommend a very substantial increase in the inspecting staff as a means of securing the carrying out of any improved law that we should also recommend ?—There is no doubt in my mind that with matters of truck the inspector must be constantly there, so as to watch the way that matters are conducted, and to detect anything that arises in this way. Deductions, of course, are made from time to time that require careful watching.

2059. Have you any information as to what the Irish staff is ?—No, I am afraid I could not tell you.

2060. I think it is very small ?—Yes; I know approximately.

2061. Now, if fines were abolished, would it not lead to forms of more severe punishment; for instance, suspension ?—I think that is a danger.

2062. There is a double danger, is there not; because the reasonableness of that punishment could not in any state of things be the subject of inspection ?—It could not under the present Act, unless it was specially made a subject which the inspectors absolutely had power to investigate as being a method of fining.

2063. Suppose if all forms of disciplinary punishment had to be entered in a book that was open to the inspectors of a district, then the inspectors would be able to keep an eye upon what was going on ?—Yes, they would.

2064. And to examine that book with a view to discovering whether the punishment was fair and reasonable or came up to any other standard that the law should prescribe ?—Quite so.

2066. Do you think the register should be co-extensive with the powers of fining and punishment ?—Certainly, and that it should be in a prescribed form that would give all the details—the date, the name, and so on. The date is very often lacking, and I have had to abandon several prosecutions myself merely because the date could not be fixed.

* Miss Squire has forwarded to the Secretary the following particulars :—

E. J., a weaver aged 16. Minding three looms, frequently fined 6d. and 1s. for "taking wrong ends up." The overlooker at last mended the looms for her, as he said she would always be fined so long as they continued in the state they were in.

The same girl was required by the occupier to buy a piece of cloth which she was said to have damaged. The price she was asked to pay was 26s., the wage due to her for weaving was 8s. 11d.

E. F., a weaver age 15. Minding three looms. She was fined 9d. for bad work. The girl complained that new work which she did not understand was given her to do and that she could not get the overseer to show her how to go on with it.

Miss R. E. Squire.

2067. The form of the register should be a prescribed form, giving all the details necessary for proper examination ?—Yes.

2068. In view of the statement that you made of the fines and deductions in the case of Brandauer's, the pen makers, would it be possible for us to get the gross annual or weekly total of those fines ?—Yes, they are all shown to me. I go through the books whenever I visit there; there are eight or ten very thick books, and I go through those when I visit there, so that the gross amount is available for the register that the firm is obliged to keep.

2070. Would there be any means of giving us that information ?—I should not have it to give to the Committee, because, of course, with the large number of books to go through and all one's work to get through, I look them through and note any that seem to me in any way to contravene the Act, and then make a special investigation of those, but only by sample. I have no record of numbers or amounts.

2071. We should be glad if you would give us a list of the firms who do make these deductions ?—I will get that out for you. I may mention that their procedure has been very much modified since this case was dismissed. Most of the firms have given it up altogether; and on my last visit I only had occasion to take exception to three or four, and in each of those the amounts have been immediately returned. So that the control that has been exercised has lessened this evil considerably.

2072. Then another piece of information which I think might be very useful would be a list of the fines that used to be in force in places like Messrs. Cadbury's and others ?—I have such a list with me to-day. I brought examples of them; but I hesitate to put them in, because they have the names of the firms upon them, and they were given to me, of course, in official confidence. Extracts could be made from those if it was desired, and if there was the clerical assistance given to do it, but they were given officially in confidence to me, and they have the names of the firms upon them.

2073. My point is this: I am not at the present moment so much interested in the list of fines in force now, but I want to get a list of the fines that used to be in force by firms who, a few years ago, did not believe that they could conduct their work without fining. —Just so. The lists that I have, have all of them been objected to, and have been the subject of correspondence, and are now modified.

2075. You can get us such a list ?—Yes.

2076. Then with reference to sub-contractors. Do you see any objection to including all sub-contractors under the Truck Act—anybody who takes out work from a principal giver-out of work ?—No, I see no difficulty myself. It has been said to me that it would include very large firms, but I cannot see that that would do any harm, because if the practice went on I think they might be glad of the protection afforded them, and if it did not there would be no harm in their being included accidentally.

2077. It is not a question of how large the firm is; it is the question of a certain practice of payment; the payment may be technically profit or it may be technically wages, but nevertheless it is the subject of a contract. If it is good to compel the employer to pay the actual workman in current coin of the realm, it is also good to compel the giver-out of work to pay the person who takes out the work also in current coin of the realm ?—I see your point; but it seems to me that that person is the employer within the meaning of the Act. However far you drive it from the principal agent, every person who gives out work to someone else, on however small a scale, becomes an employer within the meaning of the Act.

2079. I am thinking of an undertaker, as you might call him—a person who goes to a chief giver-out of work and takes a certain amount of raw material and gives out that raw material again to the worker. Why should not that middleman himself, whether he is a big middleman or a little middleman, economically speaking, have the benefit of it as against a chief giver-out of the work ?—Certainly, and that is my point. It affects the Jew tailors very largely, the lace clippers, the glovers—nearly every kind of out-worker I can think of is affected by that.

2080. You see no practical objection to that ?—None whatever.

2081. You recognise that those people are very hardly done by by the fact that at present they are not subject to this law ?—Not subject to it by reason of the decisions in Squire v. Sweeney, and Squire v. The Midland Lace Company; yes.

2082. Now, in your experience, has any attempt been made to apply the "fair and reasonable" provisions of the law to fines for unpunctuality. I mean this. A worker will arrive say five minutes late, but owing to the rules of the firm for which he works, he is not admitted at the end of the five minutes, but has to wait half an hour; then the fine imposed is not one on a five minutes basis, but on a half-hour basis. Has any attempt been made to protect the worker against that ?—Yes, very frequently. It is a cause of constant complaint, and it has been represented continually to occupiers that that is not "fair and reasonable"; but I do not think they are ready at all to admit it. There has never been a prosecution, at least, not of my own, and I do not remember one of any of my colleagues. There was a pieceworker's case of Miss Deane's, I think, that turned on that point.

2083. I don't remember that you expressed an opinion about the desirability of retaining these fines for unpunctuality. Do you think that those ought to go too ?—Yes, I do, especially for pieceworkers.

2084. In the case of time workers it is a little different ? —Yes; in the case of timeworkers I think there are other ways of meeting the difficulty.

2085. You think that discipline, so far as punctuality is concerned, may very well be enforced without those fines ?—Yes, and it is in many cases.

By Mrs. Tennant.

2086. There are two important facts, I think, brought out in your evidence, that I want to deal with for a moment. One is, that in your experience most well-conducted firms do not rely upon disciplinary fines to secure the good conduct of their business ?—Yes; that is so, very strikingly.

2087. And the other is that in the cases in which you have taken proceedings, whether those proceedings have been successful or not, the system of fines has been abandoned ?—Yes, abandoned or modified.

2088. Now, do you think that if the system of fines were made illegal there would be many employers who would have recourse to other methods ?—Yes, I am afraid there would be a good number.

2089. And do you think that among the other methods that they would have recourse to would be suspension ?—Yes.

2090. And I suppose what one might describe as a sliding scale reduction of wages ?—Yes.

2091. Have you thought out any way by which those alternatives to fining might be anticipated by the legislature ?—Yes. It is a difficult question, but I think it might be done by an agreement. I feel strongly myself that the whole matter of wages between women and girls and their employer is exceedingly vague, and that there should be a definite agreement in writing to employ them at a certain wage, for a certain time, or whatever the agreement might be, but that it should include some protection against this lowering of wage either temporarily or on a sliding scale, or suspension; that the contract of hiring should be produced to the inspectors in order that they might judge whether the contract was being carried out, and that that would disclose the irregularity. If the worker at the time of the inspection was on a lower wage, the employer would have to explain the reason: and it seems to me that it might be possible to safeguard that in some way; that the suspension should not exceed something that was reasonable, and should not be made except under certain conditions, and that if it is a matter of lowering the wage, that also should be safeguarded by conditions as to how much it might extend to and during what period and for what offences.

2092. But if you were to allow suspension under limitations, and a sliding scale of reduced wages under limitations, you would be getting back, would you not, to a system of regulating fines?—I think you would.

2093. You are anxious to avoid the principle of fining altogether?—Yes.

2095. Much less friction?—Much less friction and more loyal working on the part of the employed.

2096. Would you think it possible for the legislature, should it prohibit fines, also to prohibit the alternative systems, and not to prohibit one system and then turn to the regulation of what might really be a substitute?—I think it might be possible, because otherwise, if you leave out altogether any question of suspension and lowering of wage, you leave this to be carried on as it will be and as it has been, but the inspectors will have no power to enquire into it, and we shall not know to what extent it is growing.

2097. But if you prohibited what you thought would be the alternatives, and at the same time made provision for such a wage contract as you have just described, that wage contract would supply the inspectors with a basis for inquiry?—It would; that would be the great benefit of it.

2099. May we take it that that is what you would recommend?—Yes it is.

2100. I want to get, if I can, a sort of balance of the difficulties; first, the difficulties which would arise if fines were prohibited, and secondly the difficulties which would arise if an attempt were made to expand the present system of control. On the one side you suggest such difficulties as suspension and sliding scale reductions, which would have to be anticipated, and on the other I suppose you would say that it is exceedingly difficult to define a really adequate system of control?—Yes, very difficult.

2101. There are difficulties which have been brought out in this evidence, and which would, of course, be within your experience, of dealing with cases in which the worker is one of a gang?—Yes.

2102. And other difficulties of the same kind; so that, however excellent the intention of the legislature it is very difficult for it to achieve its purpose?—Very.

2103. Then I gather that you would go so far as to say that, in great measure, if not in total measure, fines fail to secure their object?—Yes, I think that is so, very largely.

2104. You therefore would be of opinion that their abolition would be not only a service to the workpeople but a service to the employers?—Yes, 2105. And further would secure the wider object of greater industrial efficiency?—Yes, I think so.

2106. Now I want to have clearly your opinion with regard to the record which the employer ought to make. Mr. Ramsay Macdonald asked whether you do not think it desirable that the register should contain more particulars than it does at present; but, if fines were abolished, and the inspector were relying for the collection of his information upon such a wage contract as you have outlined, it would not be necessary to keep a register of punishments, because the only punishment, so far as we see, left to the employer would be dismissal or proceedings against the worker for the recovery of damage done?—Yes; there would be no suspension.

2107. There would be no suspension, and there would be no sliding scale of reduced wages?—Nothing that entailed a loss of wage.

2108. So that really there would be no fine record?—No; there would be no need of a register in that case, only if suspension or sliding scale or any form of lowering wages were allowed instead of fines.

2109. That in your opinion would be better than the present position, but not so good as the other position to which I think you have given your adherence of prohibiting fines, and anticipating the alternatives and prohibiting those too?—Yes.

2110. Then I want to ask you one or two questions about the Shop Clubs Act. Have you any opinion to express to the Committee as to the desirability of the Act or a portion of it being put under the jurisdiction of the factory department?—I think it is very desirable, because one generally finds, in every factory, deductions being made for a sick club, and at present as the Act is not administered by us we can make no inquiry on the subject. I have only incidentally been able to discover that there have been hardships, and I have been able to point out to an employer who has been quite willing to have the matter brought to his notice, that his notices with regard to such deductions were not in accordance with the Shop Clubs Act, and that the club was not registered under the Friendly Societies' Act.

2111. Have you experience in relation to any particular district, or do you find that generally?—It is very general, and I think it is increasing, but it is a very serious matter in Wales in the tin-plate and ironworks there; the deductions for sick club are almost universal, and among the girls there is some grievance.

2112. Without taking charge of the administration of the whole Act, or going into for instance the details with which the registrar should be satisfied, the requirement that subscription to the club should not be made a condition of employment would give you a basis of inquiry?—Yes. I think we should be able to make some inquiries, and to follow to a certain extent the conditions under which these deductions are made, and whether they are to the general good of the workers or not.

2113. Have you any experience of the fact that workers subscribe to medical attendance which they do not use?—Yes, I have constantly met with it, that the girls and women will be subscribing sometimes (the women) for years, and that they will never use the medical attendance, sometimes because they do not like the doctor who is appointed, and in other cases because they have never been ill, and in others because they have got their own medical man or their own dispensaries that they have always subscribed to and prefer to go to. I have found widows who have been in receipt of poor relief when, as they pointed out to me, they were entitled to medical relief without any subscription at all, and where attendance was given to them free, obliged to subscribe at the factory.

2114. Has there been clear evidence of compulsion in those cases, or do you think it was only the general sense that they would be in better favour if they paid their subscriptions?—I think it would be almost impossible, in those cases, for an individual worker to resist this custom of deduction, they would not be strong enough to do it.

By Mr. Cawley.

2115. I understood you to say that in one of the cases you mentioned five of the magistrates were actually engaged in supplying material and goods to workers or sub-contractors?—Yes, they were givers out.

2116. And I suppose, being magistrates, they were men of some position in the neighbourhood?—Yes, supposed to be.

2117. Yet apparently engaged in squeezing money out of the poorest people in the district?—Yes.

2118. With regard to fines, your idea is that they can be abolished altogether?—Yes, I think so.

2119. What alternative would you suggest. How do you propose the maintaining of discipline, and that there should be order and punctuality?—By cautioning the worker that unless she is punctual and orderly, her services will not be required. A black list is kept in many factories. Very often in my experience the fine is imposed upon a person for being late, a person who is a piece-worker and who works while she is there and is only paid for what she does. Where the fines have been abandoned there has been no punishment for such workers, but very frequently she is recognised as worth more in the time she works than others who do not come late. Sometimes the late arrival occurs in the case of a married woman who has children, or owing to ill-health, or living at a distance.

2121. Still, the end is dismissal?—Yes, I suppose it would be if she did not conform to the rules of the factory.

2122. I take it your contention is that a really good worker can afford to disregard the rules a little because she is such a good worker that her employer will not dismiss her, whereas if an ordinary worker behaved in the same way she would get dismissed?—I think that is the way the factories are regulated very much.

2123. Do not you think that that points to the poorer workers being thrown out of work entirely?—I do not think so, unless there is very little demand for workers. Generally in these trades there is a great demand for them.

2124. But would it not work in that way—that the poorer workers would have more chance of being thrown out of work?—I think not, because punctuality would be a thing quite within their own control under the circumstances; they would be able to be sufficiently punctual to merit continuous employment.

2125. If it is under their own control, does it strike you as any hardship that they should suffer a small fine if the employer thinks that discipline is thereby maintained in his works?—Yes, there is in many cases a hardship, and in other cases if there is no hardship it does not achieve its object; the worker pays, and still it does not achieve its object.

2126. Then the end of it is that you think dismissal is preferable to fines?—Dismissal of an incorrigible worker I think is preferable.

2127. Do you not think that employers would differ as to incorrigibility; one employer might be strict, and say that three times late meant dismissal; another might be easy-going and say he would allow them any time. Do not you think at the end it is better for the worker to be fined, and to have a system of fines for unpunctuality, rather than the only alternative being dismissal?—No, I do not think it is either better for the financial position of the worker or for the character of the worker.

2128. You have quite made up your mind that there should be no fines even for being late, or in fact any punishment for being late, because there is no other punishment, is there?—Except dismissal. I have considered the matter very carefully for a good many years, and that is the conclusion I have come to after much thought and after much discussion with employers all over the kingdom.

2129. Even if the fine is put to a general fund for the benefit of the workpeople, so that the employer does not benefit at all?—Quite so.

2130. I have only one other question to ask upon this point with regard to deductions for bad work. Do you think, if the law was made so that not more than 5 per cent. of the total wages earned in a week could be deducted, that that would meet the case?—No, I think that the total amount earned through the week is not quite a sufficient basis. That has been the standard that has been sometimes set up as an element of fairness and reasonableness, but, as I said before, in all cases of piecework it should have a relation to the amount of wage which the employer thinks is a fair wage for good work. Sometimes elaborate and difficult work is put into the hands of a worker at a very low wage. There should be some relation between her liability for damage or loss and the wage that she is paid for that particular work.

2131. Do you think it would be possible to elaborate a scheme which would embody your ideas in that respect?—I think so. In these cases of pens, for instance, where you give 100 gross out for 1s. 5d. and then you fix your damage at 6d. for one gross, it is out of all proportion to the wage. I think that in each case you could regulate the amount that the employer would be allowed to consider the worker liable for.

2133. That would be 6d. on 10s.; so that if the girl was only entitled to 5s. she could not be fined more than 3d. on the 5s. Would not that be something like what you think would be right?—Yes, I think it would, but it does not seem to me to give the same security to a worker as it does speaking of piecework. I think that would do for a weekly wage, but with piecework it does seem to me that there ought to be some relation between the value of the material, or the value of the labour put into the work, and the wage that is paid for it, that would enable the worker to have less loss—to have no loss upon that particular work. I am afraid I do not make it very clear, but I gave in some of those cases instances where the worker had done a large amount of work perfectly and had received no wage.

2134. That would be covered, I think, by my suggestion that no deduction could be made from the total amount of wages exceeding 5 per cent. of the wage—there would be a maximum of 5 per cent?—Yes.

2135. That would, I think, cover all you mean?—Perhaps it would.

2136. You said something about working on expensive materials, and the worker being charged on the amount of the damage that was done to the expensive material. That would not come in in this case at all?—No.

2137. Then you think that 5 per cent. putting it broadly, might answer?—Yes. I think anything of that kind that would prevent this discrepancy between the wage and liability for damage would be advisable.

By Mr. Delevingne.

2138. I take it that your evidence chiefly relates to factories where women only are employed?—Yes, it does.

2140. That is interesting; it is rather contrary to some other evidence that we have had—that the abuses are greatest among unorganised women and girls?—My experience is so much greater among woman and girls that it is overwhelming in amount, but there have been a number of cases that I have had to abandon; they first attracted me on account of their unfairness and unreasonableness, and I had to abandon them because I found that they were men's cases. I then picked out cases belonging to women, and all my action followed upon that, so that it was not necessary for me to hand them over to one of my colleagues.

2141. But you found that men were subject even to heavier fines?—Very much heavier fines, and larger in number.

2142. Could you specify any particular trade or industry?—In almost every trade where men and women are working together. I mentioned some relief stamping works the other day, where there were very heavy fines on girls. There I remember that when I was looking through the books that contained the record of those fines, I found a great many more that belonged to men, and the amounts were very much heavier, amounting to many pounds. In some perambulator works the men who were making the body of the perambulators were subject to very, very heavy fines. In the metal trades, in the potteries, in the lace factories—wherever men and women are working together and the employer is fining heavily and making heavy deductions for damages—I think in almost every case men would appear quite as much on the lists as women, if not more so.

2144. Would the men in those cases usually belong to some trade union ?—That I am not able to say. In a great many cases they would, but in others not. I may say the same thing with regard to disciplinary fines. I find that the fines for lack of discipline have been heavier on the men. Those have been more in the unorganised trades.

2145. Now I would like to ask one or two questions on the working of the existing Acts. Take the question of the compulsory purchase of damaged goods. It is the case, is it not, that that is now practically a settled question—that all the recent cases that have been taken by the Home Office have been successful ?—Yes.

2146. The case you mentioned in Bristol, Squire v. Broderick, I think, is the only unsucessful case, at any rate in recent years, that you have had ?—Yes, but I was wondering what other cases since then I have taken under the Act of 1831 for that offence ; since that case, if I remember rightly, the cases have been under the 1896 Act. There was one taken alternatively, for the purpose of pleading, by Mr. Graham Campbell, in Leeds, under the Act of 1831 ; there was a conviction on the 1896 Act and the complaint under the other Act, was withdrawn.

2147. I had in mind especially two cases ; one was the case of Coopers in London, which I think you took ?—I did not take that ; it was Miss Deane. I beg your pardon. The first case against Coopers I did not take ; I did take the case on the 21st November, 1904, but that was the case of deductions in the absence of such a contract as the Act requires. It was under the Act of 1896.

2148. But as a matter of fact you got convictions for making workers purchase or take damaged goods ?—Yes.

2149. Practically that is settled ; it has never been appealed against by the occupiers ?—No, it has not.

2150. On the question of knitting. That question after the case of Squire v. Sweeney was referred to the law officers, and they advised that in their opinion the judgment was wrong ?—Yes.

2151. And it was decided by the Secretary of State that it was not to govern your action in England, or anywhere in fact except in Ireland ?—That is so.

2152. You have never had the difficulty raised again, have you ?—No ; it was not raised in Squire v. The Midland Lace Company, so far as my recollection goes.

2153. As a matter of fact the point about manual labour is very similar to the point under the Factory Act, where the expression " manual labour " is also used, and it has been taken there without question to cover all kinds of clothing work ?—Yes.

2154. As to those cases that you have mentioned of fines for offences like whistling and sneezing, and so forth, do I understand that since Squire v. Bayer you rather held yourself precluded from prosecuting in that kind of case ?—Not exactly precluded from prosecuting, because I think the Court made it very clear that they did not wish their decision to be considered as going beyond those special facts. But it has made one very cautious in taking a case of that kind. I have taken two or three somewhat similar cases.

2156. In that case of Squire v. Bayer the Court made it quite clear that they had before them the fact that it was alleged whether rightly or wrongly that damage might be caused to the materials and machinery and work of the employer ?—Yes.

2157. One does not quite see how a girl sneezing or whistling is to cause any loss or damage to the employer, unless it gives rise to some kind of disorder in the factory ?—Yes, I think that would be very much the point, and a good deal of evidence was brought in the case of Squire v. Bayer to the effect that there was a great deal of disorder caused as well as dust by this singing and dancing.

2159. Could you suggest any alteration of those words which would really confine the deduction to acts occasioned by the actual default or negligence of the workman ?—Yes, there might be something of that kind—not " an omission," because " an omission " is very vague. You can bring an omission charge against a person when it is not really a culpable omission. It wants something like " wilful and negligent."

2160. Would any hardship be caused to the employer by confining it to wilful or negligent act or omission on the part of the worker ?—I think not. Of course he would not be able to recoup himself. Generally the whole of that provision is used with a view to the employer recouping himself to a great extent for the waste of his material.

2161. I should like to call your attention to the opening words of Section 2 : " An employer shall not make any contract with any workman for any deduction from the sum contracted to be paid by the employer to the workman, or for any payment to the employer by the workman for or in respect of bad or negligent work, or injury to the materials or other property of the employer." Do you think it was ever intended that an employer should recoup himself for a defect in the tools which he himself supplies ?—No, I think not.

2162. It was only intended to cover cases where the worker was actually negligent in performing the work entrusted to him ?—Quite so, but in the case of a machine which will go on doing faulty work unless it is rectified, the employer does naturally attach importance to the employee sending for the toolmaker or mechanic or whatever he is called to come and put that machine in order, and there is a great tendency to consider the omission of the workman, and to put the whole of the blame upon that, even when on going into the facts one finds that there was quite an insufficiency of mechanics or engineers to see to the work, or that the worker really had to meet with some abuse and some tiresome conduct on the part of the workman who would be called to rectify it.

2163. You think it reasonable, then, that the worker should call the employer's attention to the defect as soon as it came to the worker's notice ?—Yes.

2164. I rather gathered from the Brandauer case that the tools were very fine tools, defects in which it was unreasonable to expect the workman always to be able to notice ?—That is so. It wants a very skilled person indeed sometimes to detect what is wrong.

2165. Generally in those cases under Sections 1 and 2 and also under Section 3, would it meet any difficulties if the burden of proof was placed on the employer ?—In those cases you have to prove that the fine is unfair or unreasonable or that it exceeds the actual loss ?—Yes. the difficulty is to get sufficient weight of proof to carry through the prosecution successfully.

Miss R. E. Squire.

2166. Would it help you, do you think, in prosecutions, if the fact of the fairness and reasonableness of the fine or the exact amount of the loss to the employer was a matter to be proved not by you, but by the employer?—Yes.

2167. That would be a useful weapon to have?—I think it would, especially with regard to unfairness and unreasonableness.

2168. And also as to proof of the extent of loss or the cost of the materials under Section 3?—Yes, exactly.

2169. Generally as regards the working of the Act of 1896, what would you say the general result has been; has it, apart from these defects which you have brought to our notice, fulfilled to any great extent the object with which it was framed?—I should say it has done something, and it has brought to light a great deal, which has been of very great use, but it has proved a clumsy instrument for doing the work.

2170. I suppose one difficulty is that these fines and deductions are so varied and spread over such a wide area it is difficult to cope with them, and to follow them up. If you had had the time, a great deal more might have been done under the Act of 1896 than has been done, as a matter of fact. It is not altogether so much the clumsiness of the instrument as the huge amount of work to be tackled?—I think it is both. Of course it does take a great deal of time to discover and follow up each one of these cases, but when one has discovered and followed up a case, one is baffled by not having sufficient power to deal with it—by being prevented from one point to another until one takes refuge in a technical matter.

2171. I gather that in your view all fines and deductions should be done away with altogether?—Yes, and I think that experience shows that that could be done quite well.

2172. You remember that laundry list of fines which was settled at a conference between the laundry proprietors, and, I think, yourself and Miss Deane and Mr. Cunynghame?—I was not there, so I have not a very intimate knowledge of it, but I do know about it.

2173. How has that worked in practice. Are the deductions and fines that were then settled considered to be fair?—I am afraid I cannot answer that question; Miss Deane will be able to answer it. I have not worked much in London laundries. I have not been in any where that contract was affixed.

2174. Do you ever come across in factories where special rules are in force, a system of fining for breaches of the special rules?—Yes.

2176. An obligation is placed on the worker by the special rules to do something—to wear respirators for example—and the employer to enforce that imposes a fine where he discovers a breach on the part of the worker. Do you consider that a good or a bad system?—Bad.

2177. Would you advocate the prosecution of the worker?—If the worker has persistently refused to use what was adequately provided.

2178. Will you look at it from this point of view, that the employer himself is responsible for seeing that the rules are enforced in his factory; if they are not observed, I suppose you could proceed against him?—Yes.

2180. In the mines and quarries it is very common indeed for the owner of the mine to prosecute the workman for breaches of special rules, in the Courts?—Yes.

2181. Sometimes, however, they impose fines instead of prosecutions?—Yes, the better plan I should say by far would be to prosecute. If it is so serious as the object of a special rule is always, it should be brought in my opinion publicly to the knowledge of the Courts, and should not be dealt with merely between the employer and the workman.

2182. You would not allow an employer to impose a fine for a breach of a special rule?—No.

2183. As to the question of fines by gangmen and sub-contractors which has come up once or twice; the employment of gangmen is very common in certain industries?—Yes.

2184. And the gangmen and sub-contractors, in the Potteries, for example, impose fines on the people they employ?—Yes.

2185. Are you able to meet that under the Truck Act as it stands at present?—I do not think I have personally come across many instances. In that case the fine has generally been really brought home to the employer.

2186. I remember Miss Deane calling attention to the fact that in the Potteries, I think it was, there was a great deal of fining by gangmen?—I have not personally come across that. I have come across fines imposed on the whole gang and deducted from the wages of the whole gang, but not the cases you are speaking of.

2187. If they are not covered by the Act, you would think that the Act should be extended to include fines imposed by these sub-contractors and gang masters?—I should have thought not. I should have thought the employer was responsible, just as he is for the employment. In the case you are speaking of, if the girls were employed after or before the legal period, it would not be the gangmen who employ them, it would be the occupier. He is responsible for everything done in the factory, and the fact that the gangmen pay for the work and direct it, makes no difference, because the occupier is still responsible. I have not given it much consideration, but I should have thought that the employer alone should be entitled to make any fines or deductions, just the same through the gangmen as he does through the foremen.

2188. But these were fines imposed by the gang master for his own purposes?—I have not come across such cases.

2189. I do not see how the employer could control the gang master in a case like that; if the gang master pays the wages and makes his own deductions it would not necessarily be known to the employer unless the worker complained?—Perhaps not. It seems to me it would be no more difficult to make the employer responsible for that than it is to make him responsible for the hours—the period of employment, meal times, and so on.

2190. In that case the employer is the occupier of the factory, and he knows what time the work starts, and what time it stops, but he would not necessarily know what deduction had been made by the gang masters?—No.

2192. How would that work in the case of these outwork sub-contractors which you have mentioned? Your remedy for damaged work I think you said last time was, better supervision on the part of the employer—better control?—Yes.

2193. How would he be able to exercise supervision over these persons employed by the sub-contractor?—He would not be able to do that. It seems to me in those cases his remedy would be by prosecuting to recover the amount; I mean, if he hands out to a sub-contractor a large amount of work and some of that is returned damaged, his remedy would be to prosecute and recover the amount.

2194. That is a very cumbersome method, is it not?—It seems to me a reasonable way of doing it. The employer incurs certain risks in giving work out instead of keeping it under his own supervision, and, if it is more to his interest to do so, he considers the risk in doing it. I mean, if he were to keep all the work in his own factory under his own eye he could exercise the necessary supervision. If he considers that it is more worth his while to hand it out to a man who can give it to anybody that man chooses, it seems to me it is reasonable that he should take the risk—except in gross cases where he would have his remedy in the ordinary way for loss or damage.

2195. Suppose the employer were to make it part of his contract that if the work was bad he simply would not receive it; I mean, the work might be so hopelessly spoilt that it might be worth his while to refuse to take it back at all?—Then would he pay, in that case, for the work done upon it?

2196. I am supposing a case where he would not pay?—Then, where would the material be? You are speaking of a case where the employer has given out cloth to be made into garments, and when the stuff made up into garments is brought in he refuses to take it

2197. I am thinking of cases where the material is of very low value, or where it is so spoilt that it is not worth the while of the employer to take it back again at all. How would you deal with that?—If he charges the worker, he is giving him damaged goods in stead of wage. If he does not pay at all I suppose that would settle itself; the man would be able to sue for wages not paid, and then whether he could recover or not would be a matter for the civil courts.

2198. In the majority of these cases, is the damaged article worth anything to the employer at all?—Very generally it is. The cases where it is worth nothing would be very very few, because there is a considerable sale for damaged work; certainly for garments, and for a large number of other things one could think of.

2199. So that practically the case I am suggesting does not really arise?—I think not.

2200. Now, still on the question of sub-contractors, would not it be rather difficult to draw the line between the small sub-contractor and the big sub-contractor or the big contractor of any kind?—Is it very essential that a line should be drawn? Even if they were all within a Truck Act which prevented any deduction for damage, would it be harmful to a large contractor?

2201. Is it not the case that any big contract for work includes penalty clauses, say for delay in completing the work, for work not carried out acccording to specification, and so forth; you would not prohibit that kind of clause, would you?—I suppose that would be difficult.

2202. And yet, if you do not prohibit that, I do not quite see, as the cases gradually shade down to the small sub-contractor of whom you are speaking, where you are to draw the line?—Perhaps the difference does come in where a man is not engaged at all in business for himself. Is that a safe line to draw—that where the contractor does part of the work himself, where he is a workman as well as the contractor, the Truck Act should apply, and where he is merely the owner of a big business it should not. All this, I think, was argued in the case of Ingram v. Barnes, and those cases.

2203. It has always been a difficulty, of course?—No doubt. That was the kind of standard as to whether the contractor could be considered to need the protection of the Act or not—as to whether he worked himself.

2204. You would suggest that as a possible line to be drawn?—Yes, it seems to me that that might be the line.

2205. Now, as to these modes of evasion to which Mrs. Tennant has called attention. Is there any real distinction between suspension and dismissal? If you were enforcing a prohibition of suspension, could you distinguish that, in practice, from dismissal? Would it not be very easy for the employer to say "I dismiss you," with a sort of tacit understanding that the worker might come back a week hence and see if work was to be obtained?—They are very near one another; yet it takes different forms where they do not seem quite on the same plane.

2207. Have you had much experience of the bonus system?—Not very much. Now and again the matter has come up.

2208. The fraudulent bonus, we are all agreed, is an evasion which should be prohibited; but have you ever come across a system of bonuses, not intended as an evasion of the Truck Act, but intended to stimulate and encourage the worker?—Yes.

2209. Do you consider those good?—Where they are given really to stimulate and encourage the worker they are a good thing, I should say.

2210. Can you suggest any mode of preventing fraudulent bonuses which would not at the same time hit that class of bonuses?—It is very difficult to say. I suppose the terms on which the bonus is given would have to be very strictly defined.

Miss R. E. Squire.

2211. Anyway, you would not wish to prohibit them?—I should not wish to prohibit them as long as they were bona fide and not used as a means of punishment.

2212. Just one question on the cases in the courts. You said that a large number of cases coming within the 1896 Act were not taken into court because experience had shown that magistrates were reluctant to decide that deductions were unfair and unreasonable?—Yes.

2214. Can you give any reason for this reluctance on the part of the magistrates?—The reason seems to me to be that the kind of evidence that one is able to bring before them is not sufficient to enable them to reconstruct for themselves the whole of the conditions of work in the factory, and therefore they took refuge generally in the loss to the employer.

2215. You think that that difficulty would be met to any extent by imposing a restriction, as Mr. Cawley suggested—a limit to the amount of the deduction or fine?—Yes, because then one would have something definite to go upon.

2216. Do you think that the difficulty with the magistrates could be got over by that?—Very likely. There would be something definite that one could produce evidence about and plead with some chance of success.

2217. You do not suggest any hostility on the part of the magistrates to the Truck Acts?—Not in general. In some localities it has been manifested that there is some feeling against them, but as a rule it would be more the difficulty really of the magistrate satisfying himself from the evidence without any reasonable doubt that the thing was unfair and unreasonable.

By Mr. Yarrow.

2218. Am I right in assuming that your opinion is that if fines could be dispensed with altogether it would simplify the arrangements between employer and worker and lead to less friction?—I believe it would.

2219. If fines could by Act of Parliament be made illegal, from your experience with employers do you think that they would fall in with it readily, or would there be a great deal of opposition on their part, from the feeling that it was an undue interference with their business?—I think there would be a very large amount of opposition. The difficulty presents itself to their minds as to how to deal with these questions apart from fines.

2220. With regard to fines, do the workpeople know before they get employment what fines they will be subjected to, or do they find it out afterwards?—They find it out afterwards—more or less soon.

2221. Do you think it would be a good thing if they knew it before?—Before they accept work, yes. Under the Act they should know it immediately after they are engaged, but they do not.

2222. If they knew it before they were engaged instead of after they were engaged, they would accept the employment on certain conditions?—Yes.

2223. Do you think that that would be better?—I think it would be better for the stronger among them.

2224. You told us that there are many firms who used to have a system of fines and have since abandoned it, and with success?—Yes.

2225. Are there many?—Yes, a great many altogether.

2226. Now, are there many firms who did not formerly have fines and have now found it advantageous to adopt them?—I do not recollect any.

2227. You think at any rate the feeling on the part of successful employers is that the fines might perhaps be dispensed with?—Yes, very largely.

2228. You say something about deductions from sick clubs; I suppose these have been established at the different factories for the benefit of the workers?—Yes, I presume so.

2229. Then there may be a hardship upon some, I suppose, in being obliged to join, but the point is, on the whole, is that a gain to the majority?—Yes.

Miss R. E. Squire.
26 June 1906.

2230. It is very difficult to devise any scheme that is not hard upon some; the great thing is to get the majority benefited.—Yes.

2231. Therefore, on the whole, if a sick club donation is compulsory, the majority really would be benefited?—I should say they would, where the conditions are good.

2232. The employers can have no other object except the benefit of the workers in making that rule?—Quite so.

2233. I do not know whether you could suggest any alterations of the present Acts which might remedy some of the evils which you have been pointing out. If you could put your evidence into a condensed and practical form by suggesting paragraphs or clauses by way of addition or alteration of the present Acts it would be of very great help to the Committee. Now, I wonder how these questions are dealt with abroad; is there any means of finding out how the Germans or the French deal with these questions, and, if they have been dealt with by them, what success they have met?—I should imagine so, through the Departments. There is a Truck Act in several of the countries—Germany and Belgium and so forth.

2234. I think you told us at the beginning of your evidence something about a woman getting a 2s. 6d. ticket and buying groceries with it. Was there any hardship in that?—Yes, because the ticket only represented the goods she would get ultimately at the shop, and she could not use the ticket anywhere but in that particular shop.

2236. I can understand it might be abused; no doubt it is, but in your experience is it often abused?—Yes, it is, and resented very much by the workers.

By the Chairman.

2237. You have mentioned the case of workers complaining to the factory inspectors in order that they might take such action as was necessary. Is it open to the employer to complain to the factory inspector on the assumption that his orders for supervision and discipline and so on have been disobeyed?—Yes. He could do so—you mean to appeal to the inspector to help him enforce his rules. That is very often done. If an employer feels that there is some detail that he has—without success—tried to impress upon the women especially with regard to maintaining cleanliness, he might appeal to the inspector and say: "I wish you would just impress upon them if you would," certain points, and that is frequently done with good results.

2238. On the assumption that fines were abolished and discipline remained unregulated, do you think that the system might also be helpful?—Yes, I have no doubt that the employer would ask for assistance in that way as he does now on various matters.

2239. Then there is another matter. I observe in Squire v. Sweeney that there is a Miss Deane mentioned as being associated with you. That is the witness who is coming?—Yes, Miss Deane came to help me.

2240. I do not wish to abbreviate the evidence of Miss Deane, but you have discussed these matters with her?—Yes.

2241. The range of your difficulties, and the obstructions which are created by statute, and the decision, and so on?—Yes, we are associated.

2242. Substantially, are your views at one with hers?—I think substantially they are. Miss Deane may differ from me in one or two points, but I think substantially we are agreed.

ELEVENTH DAY.

Thursday, 28th June, 1906.

PRESENT.

The Right Hon. THOMAS SHAW, K.C., M.P., Lord-Advocate for Scotland (Chairman).

MALCOLM DELEVINGNE, Esq.
FREDERICK MADDISON, Esq., M.P.
J. RAMSAY MACDONALD, Esq., M.P.
Mrs. H. J. TENNANT.
A. F. YARROW, Esq.

T. E. BETTANY, Esq. (Secretary).

Miss LUCY A. E. DEANE was called; and Examined.

Miss L. A. E. Deane.
28 June 1906.

By the Chairman.

2243. You are one of the Inspectors of Factories under the Home Office?—Yes.

2244. And I assume your immediate superior is Miss Anderson?—Yes.

2245. What is the length of your experience?—I have had twelve years' experience under the Home Office.

2246. In your present capacity?—Yes, as Factory Inspector.

2247. There was, I think, a certain break in your administration of the Truck Acts?—Yes, when I went to South Africa.

2248. You were on the Committee on the concentration camps?—Yes.

2249. And went out to South Africa with Mrs. Fawcett and others?—I think I was away about eight months.

2250. Returning to your experience here, what is your present jurisdiction? I mean the range over which you travel?—I go over the whole country now as occasion requires. During a part of the time I had the charge of an area in West London, where there are workshops and laundries in which women are employed.

2251. Is there any particular department of industry that is allotted to you?—No, I go practically wherever I am wanted on the business of my department. Wherever special inquiries are needed, or where complaints have been received from workers.

2253. Was it that that culminated in the case of Squire v. Sweeney?—No, it culminated in my prosecution of Theresa Boyle, a giver out of sprigging. The Donegal girls were at that time largely employed in embroidering handkerchiefs and fine linen cambric work, they call it sprigging. They used to do that to a great extent, and they still do such work, and payment was made to them partly in goods.

2255. Have you ever made inquiries in South Donegal ?—Yes, at Killebeggs and Glencolmkill.

2256. Is the same kind of thing going on there ?—Yes.

2257. You have probably heard of the description given by Miss Squire of the mode of life of these out-workers ?—I have not read her evidence.

2258. We are told that they live in extremely humble squalid dwellings ?—Yes, in very poor little cabins. They are nice women and very industrious.

2260. Often three generations, I suppose ?—Yes, sometimes babies and the old grandfather. The men are often away in Scotland at the haymaking season.

2261. And the women do the outwork ?—Yes.

2263. Have you a note of the towns or centres where those people who are denominated Truck masters have their establishments ?—I found them in Ardara, Dunlo, Glenties, Gweedore, and a little hamlet which I think was called Carrick, near Killebeggs, also at Glencolmkill. It was very difficult to get evidence at all. Women were terrified ; they told me of things but I could not easily get them to give evidence against any particular contractor. I found one woman who was accustomed to walking about with bare feet who had just been paid for her work with a pair of elastic sided boots.

2265. She had no use for them ?—No, she had no use for them, and she would much rather have had the money to have paid the cess or road rate, or to get a bag of meal. In some cases the workers were paid with things which were of use to them, such as tea or yards of some material, linen or cotton, or sometimes with meal, but always the goods which had to be got in the particular shop belonging to the person who employed them.

2266. What do you mean by saying that although you were conscious of a good deal of this going on, you were unable to prove it ?—Because the women told me of it, and showed me the things they got. Their priests also told me of it ; but I could not get the women to swear it before a magistrate. Once or twice, when I tried to do so, they disappeared. They were terrified lest they should not get more work. Their idea was that this lady had suddenly appeared amongst them and would disappear again, but that they would be left with no chance of getting work except from the people whom they had offended by swearing to certain facts against them before a magistrate.

2267. Notwithstanding that, you did bring some cases to prosecution ?—Yes, I brought four informations at Ardara where the women had been paid chiefly by tickets—little pieces of paper on which certain values were written.

2269. What happened in the case of your informations ?—I got convictions in all of them, and a fine was paid, but subsequently—I think two or three years afterwards—it was given back again.

2271. That would have been one of the reasons that would bring them within the ruling in Sweeney's case ?—Yes.

2272. That there was no contract for personal service, and that in the abstract it was always open to them to employ a member of their family or even a stranger ?—Yes.

2273. The fines were refunded ?—Yes, I heard so afterwards.

2274. There was an interregnum, I suppose, between the time when you got these fines, and as you thought, made the law effective, and the time when Sweeney's case upset all that ?—Yes.

2275. Can you give us any information as to the effect of your successful prosecution ? Do you think they stopped the practice to any extent ?—Yes I think so, indeed I am sure of it.

2276. The more aggravated cases ?—Yes. The head firms in Belfast and Londonderry, whose contractors are in Donegal, took steps to see that the women workers were not treated in this way. They gave strict injunctions to their agents.

2277-2278. To do what ? To pay the women in money ?—Yes, and in some cases they put tickets on their work, which were not to be removed, with a price marked, so that the worker should know what the head firm was paying for the work. One firm refused to employ agents who kept truck shops, but when that was done they had to pay commission, or a higher commission than they otherwise would have paid, because the contractors had to get their profits somehow, and if they did not have sufficient commission they got it out of the truck shop.

2279. With regard to the new system which your successful prosecutions had thus begun, was it acceptable to the workpeople ?—Yes, they constantly told me they were very pleased. They liked to get paid in money.

2280. We may now come to the Sweeney decision which upset that state of the law. What was the consequence of that decision ?—I cannot say exactly, as I have not been back there since.

2281. I suppose you know the condition of matters in county Donegal ?—Yes, I did when I was there, but I have not been there since the Sweeney case.

2282. When was that ?—In 1900. My case was in 1897. The Sweeney case related to knitting, and mine to embroidery.

2283. Still, the principle of the Sweeney case appears to have been not unnaturally accepted as applicable to all out-workers ?—Yes.

2284. Are you able to testify from your experience that there were numerous cases of payment to out-workers not in the current coin of the realm, but in goods ?—Yes.

2285. Do you mean that you have actually visited their homes and seen the goods ?—Yes.

2286. Have you met with a dozen cases, or much more than that ?—Certainly more than a dozen women employed under those conditions.

2287. Have you met with a score or half a hundred of them ?—I spent some months in Ardara, and every afternoon or evening I visited different out-workers.

2288. Were the cases numerous ?—Yes, I should think at least fifty.

2289. Did they seem to you to form part of a general system ?—Yes, certainly.

2290. And was it spoken about in the neighbourhood as such ?—Yes.

Miss L. A. E. Deane.

28 June 1906.

2291. And did these truck-masters or shopkeepers appear to conduct their business steadily upon those principles ?—Yes, they are called gombeen men.

2292. Do you know the prices charged against the workers for the goods supplied to them—take the case of the price of tea ?—I have not notes as to the price of tea, but I have an idea that prices were higher than I have been accustomed to.

2293. What would you say to an assertion that all the firms in South Donegal who give out embroidery work have paid their out-workers in cash for twenty-five years past ?—Oh no, that is not so—it is disproved by our prosecutions.

2294. Are you able to controvert such a statement from your own personal experience ?—Yes.

2295. Can you give us any idea of the number of contractors you met who were participants in the system you have described ?—I can only remember seven at present.

2296. That is within your own experience ?—Yes.

2297. Have you any other point that you would like to bring before us with regard to out-workers in Ireland ?—No, I think not, except that at present one can do very little for them because of the Sweeney decision.

2299. Do you think the women or other workers are paid in full under that system—do they get full value for their work ?—Not the full cash value that they are supposed to get.

2300. Are you aware of a system under which these truck-masters are paid no commission by their principals ?—I cannot at the moment remember a case where they are paid no commission at all.

2301. Suppose this system was stopped—in short, suppose the law were to revert to the state in which it was under your administration prior to the Sweeney decision—do you think that that would introduce an improvement in the condition of the people ?—Certainly.

2302. In what respect ?—If they were paid in cash instead of in goods they would get the full value of their work. They would be able to handle their own money and use it as they desired. They would be in a more independent position towards their shopkeepers, and they would not get into debt to the extent they do now. The shopkeeper who gives out work and pays for it in goods almost always has his employees in debt to him, which is bad for these poor women and for their families. It makes them unthrifty.

2303. Do you know of cases of part payment of wages in food ?—Yes, I know of one.

2304. You will observe that we are now away from the case of the out-workers ? Turning to your general experience as an inspector of factories, does this part payment of wages in food occur in factories and workshops connected with dressmaking and millinery ?—I personally have only found it in one factory, but I have found it in dressmaking and millinery workshops.

2305. Is that part of what is known as the living-in system ?—Not in the case of the factory, unless you call it living in where workers are obliged to have their food on the premises.

2306. The living-in system is a different matter where the employers actually provide board and lodging ?—I know of no factory providing board and lodging.

2307. Do you know of cases of women who do not live on the premises being paid at dressmaking or millinery workshops partly in food ?—Yes.

2308. Are charges made against them for use of mess-room and other matters ?—Yes.

2309. Is not that touched upon by section 23 of the Act of 1831 ?—Yes.

2310. I should like your evidence upon that. I want to see what it is you put your finger upon as a defect in that section ?—There is nothing in the section with regard to deductions for food which requires that the real and true value of the deduction shall be given. The section runs : " Provided always that such stoppage or deduction shall not exceed the real and true value of such fuel, materials, tools, implements, hay, corn, and provender " ; there is nothing here about victuals prepared under the roof.

2311. That is excluded from that portion of the Statute ?—Yes. Then if wages are paid partly in coal the worker can insist that she actually gets the value of the deduction where it is a case of food. On this question of the part payment of food, for instance, I have a particular case that I am thinking of. It is a case of a food factory. Some years ago a complaint was received that the workers were given food in part payment of wages. Their wages were supposed to be 12s. and they only got 6s. in cash ; the rest of the 12s. was made up in their having dinner and tea on the premises. The workers came to us because the dinner was not good.

2312. Will you give us the name of that case and the date ?—The firm was N., and are manufacturers of tinned and potted meats. This was in November, 1898. I visited them quite recently again, but the first dealings on the subject were in November, 1898. The workers complained that they could not eat the food ; it was nasty and bad.

2313. Now, how had you jurisdiction there ?—Because it was a factory.

2314. What was manufactured there ?—Potted food ; I went there and found that the facts were upheld, that they did pay the workers partly in food and partly in cash, and I called the attention of the firm to the matter. There was a considerable correspondence with them. The question of prosecution was gone into for this infringement of the Truck Act. An attempt was made to get the matter amended without taking it into court ; it was thought that that section of the Truck Act would not clearly touch it, because the inspector had no power to inquire into the value of the food given under this section ; I mean there was no power of requiring a statement of the value. But they had made no agreement, which is required by the section, with their workers ; it was done with no signed agreement at all. Eventually they undertook to sign an agreement with their workers and not to make it a condition of employment ; if their workers wished it they could have it, if not they need not. They have reduced the nominal value of the food from 6s. to 4s. They give them, that is to say, I believe the same as they gave them before, but they call it only 4s. now whereas they called it 6s. worth then. The men I think have still 6s. worth ; the girls have 4s., but they have made it a condition of employment still. That is, a girl living round the corner, who would like to go home to her dinner, still has 4s. deducted from her wages in respect of food.

2315. Although she does not take it ?—Sometimes she takes it home with her, sometimes she does not take it.

2316. Does that system continue till now ?—That system is now going on.

2317. Why have not you prosecuted in that case ?—The question of prosecuting is now being considered. I spoke to one of the Directors on the subject ; I have not yet got any decision in writing from them upon it, but I think they will stop making it a condition of employment. This gentleman said he would consult his fellow directors.

2318. Now you have given us the name in that case. Going back for a moment to the Irish cases ; a list is going to be given in by Miss Squire of the prosecutions which she instituted, the cases in which she was going to prosecute and did prosecute, but the magistrates found against her on the facts, and so on. Now can you help us in this way ; can you identify by recollection any of those cases—I mean cases where you are aware of the circumstances leading up to the prosecution ?—I do not think I clearly understand you.

2319. The point we want to get at is this : that we should have the individual cases brought before us. Your testimony is that those are examples of a system ; but with regard to the individual cases we wish to have the names and places and dates, in order, if possible, to give an opportunity for rebutting evidence ?—Individual cases of what ?

2320. Of payment otherwise than in coin ?—Cases in which I have not prosecuted or cases in which I have prosecuted ?

2321. Cases in which you either have prosecuted or have not prosecuted, but in which you have been conscious that the facts were that there was payment otherwise than in current coin ?—I prosecuted very seldom. I can give you a list of my cases. I have never had a case dismissed on the question of unreasonableness owing to the magistrates not taking my view of the facts; I have not had the experience that Miss Squire has had in that respect. I will mention my cases; I have here four cases only:—In the case of Teresa Boyle there was a conviction; in the case of Andrew Jamieson there was a conviction: in the case of Durrant (that was a case of an unreasonable fine) there was a conviction. In the last case, Abraham Wilson & Company, Limited, it was a prosecution in respect of a bonus, and there was a dismissal, and the High Court has upheld it. I had a telegram yesterday to say that the High Court unanimously agreed in the magistrates' decision, and the case was dismissed. Therefore on that subject the whole of the north of Ireland is outside the Truck Act altogether. We cannot touch those matters at all.

2322. That list you will send us giving dates and particulars ?—Yes. This last one I think is a very serious case.

2323. Now will you follow out your last remark as to the comprehensive effect of that last decision. What is the decision you refer to ?—This was a case taken in Newry.

2324. How will it appear in the Law Reports ?—Deane v. Abraham Wilson & Co., Ltd., of Newry, County Down; it is a flax spinning firm.

2325. What was the practice there ?—The practice there was to give their spinners an additional 2s. a week if they never were absent for a minute. That was the rule; they lost that if they were late. It practically was a fine for being late.

2326. What was the illustration that you chose for that prosecution ?—A worker named Teresa Dixon was late. She could not get her bonus of 2s.

2327. How long was she late ?—She was late on three separate mornings in three separate weeks. If she was late a moment she could not get in till the dinner-time. Consequently she was "late" the whole morning if she arrived a few minutes late at all; so that she was a quarter of a day locked out, and lost her wage first, and lost her 2s. bonus, it amounted to 2s. 4d. The value at which the firm reckoned her time was 4d. for the quarter day. The fine for being an instant of that time late was 2s. This bonus system is very general throughout all the flax mills in the north of Ireland. I did not find any other case where it was so severe and so hard, but under the present system there is no register kept of these fines —no record of them, there are no particulars given, in fact they are held to be outside the Truck Act, and consequently the conditions laid down by the Act respecting fines are not fulfilled.

2328. All that has reference to bonuses; it arose out of my asking you to furnish us a list, but that is a separate head of your evidence, so that we will now resume as to the payment of wages in food. Now there are other things that are charged, deductions I suppose in respect of things to be done or provided by the employer in relation to the work, such as cleaning of work places, overalls, power, materials, wage-books, and so on. The Act, as I understand, gives no power to verify any statement that these do not exceed the actual cost, or that they are reasonable ?—No.

2329. I see that you put it in this way: they form at best merely an elaborate method of computing wages, but the result is to make it difficult for the work girl to reckon the actual amount of her weekly wage, and to create a genuine hardship; and in some cases, your evidence is, it appears doubtful if they can be justified at all ?—Yes. For instance where a firm requires that its workers should wear overalls, not because the special rules required it, but for their own purposes, for very good reasons, or because it makes the workers look nice, I think it is hardly justifiable that the workers should be charged for that.

2330. I am going to ask you about the whole of these by and bye, but there is a third category of deductions, not this time food or establishment charges, but in respect of mistakes or accidents which are liable to occur in the ordinary course of the work. Do you think that these can be avoided by supervision ?—I am sure they can. For instance, in a clothing factory, where cheap skirts and blouses are being made, where the girls are paid by the piece, many of them little girls fourteen, fifteen and sixteen years old, paid very low wages, working as fast as they possibly can so as to make something——

Miss L. A. E. Deane.

2331. What is the wage earned by such girls ?—A case that comes to my mind at this instant occurred the other day where the money earned by the girl during the day was 3d.; she had been standing idle because there was not sufficient work to go round, but she had earned 3d.—she did two lots of work at 1½d.

2332. What was the work ?—Making frills for silk petticoats and putting them on. She spoilt one of these frills; 1½d. worth of damage was done to a piece of cheap silk, and 1½d. was taken off from her 3d. wage, so that it was only 1½d. that she earned that day. It is such a tiny little sum that it does not sound serious, but it is a grievance to the girl—she was only fifteen or sixteen—that half her wage for the day should be taken off for a slight mistake in work that she was doing at a piece-work rate.

2333. Will you give us that place and the name of the firm ?—That was O. in Manchester. The slightest stain, the slightest injury to work, which could sometimes be put right in a little time, which is a very natural accident, the kind of thing that would happen anyhow when one is working very fast, which is one of the risks of the trade, is often charged for, and I do not think it should be so. I feel very strongly about it, and I think there should be no charges for "damage" at all. If there is any wilful damage it seems to me that the worker should be sued for it.

2334. The Committee are anxious to get this from you; perhaps you will start with the total wage earned by the worker, and give us some idea of what she accomplishes for that, and to what extent she is penalised ?—Here are entries copied from S. G.'s wage book; this is the case of P.'s clothing factory in Belfast. 5s. 2¾d. a week was what she earned.

2335. What was she engaged in ?—Shirt making. From that 5s. 2¾d. she was stopped for damage to the sleeves of a shirt, 1s. 6d, 4½d. for thread, 2d. for being five minutes late one morning, and 1d. for needles, making 2s. 1½d. taken off 5s. 2¾d. That leaves 3s. 1¼d. as her wage that week.

2336. What number of hours did that girl work ?—8.30 a.m. to 7.30 p.m.

2337. There would be an interval for dinner ?—Yes.

2338. Roughly speaking, we will say about nine or ten hours a day ?—It would be nine hours a day without the dinner. The instance I have just given was the week ending April 14th; the previous week she had earned 4s. 4½d.

2339. What was the date of this ?—This was in 1899. I had put all this down carefully for prosecution. I find these cases constantly, but unless they are cases that I think I can support in court it has not been my practice to make notes of them so fully.

2340. Have you any more recent cases ?—I have not got definite notes like this of recent cases; I can only tell you from memory; I could not speak to the actual facts. 4s. to 9s. a week would be the wages, and from this 7d., 6d., 8d. may be deductions for thread, 1d. for needles, 4d. for being late, and then 4½d. or 8½d. or 1s. 1d. for some damage done.

2341. What we are anxious to know is this. The instance you gave us is as far back as 1899. Does that system to which you have testified prevail now ?—Yes, certainly.

2342. Where does it prevail in Belfast ?—In clothing factories.

2343. In clothing factories all over the country ?—I think in clothing factories all over the country. In the particular clothing factory that I mentioned just now in Manchester, the total amount of recorded damage done by over 100 girls in the year was only two guineas worth. It was a considerable factory, and the whole of the damage was deducted from their wages. Each girl who has spoilt a little thing has the equivalent value deducted. My point is that there are a number of workers, some of them ill-trained, most of them young, and that every scrap of damage which arises from their working fast or from their being piece-workers, or being ignorant or being ill-trained—every scrap has to be paid by them: it is not looked upon as a risk that the firm would naturally run in employing ignorant girls who make the natural kind of faults that one would expect in hurried work.

Miss L. A. E. Deane.

2344. Have you seen the books of those firms?—Yes, I took this total of two guineas from their books.

2345. We may have to make investigation about that, but is there any means of ascertaining the total amount of deductions from the total wage bill; will those firms have the means of supplying that information?—I think so, certainly. They are required to keep a record of the deductions that they make under the Truck Act, and where they do that it would be possible to obtain that information.

By Mr. Yarrow.

2346. How many workers do you think there were in that case?—One hundred and twenty or 150. I asked the manager and he was not quite certain, but well over 100.

2347. Then it does not amount to much per head?—It amounts to very little indeed, but the wages are so small. Each particular worker has such small wages that the tiniest deduction from them amounts to something to her.

By the Chairman.

2348. Your point is that if the total damage is so small surely it would be better to abolish a system which produces individual hardship, and trust to general discipline?—That is what I feel very strongly. May I say one other thing about damages? Very often they arise from a lack of discipline, and lack of training. There are not sufficient foremen to train the girls and consequently they make mistakes which could be avoided, I think, with a little more supervision. Even where expensive things are dealt with—for example, expensive china—I have found a china-factory, where a plate may be worth ten guineas when it is finished, and where the girls are employed in one of the last processes, the burnishing of gold upon the plate—the firm which used to fine for breakages have abolished that entirely.

2349. What firm is that?—The Worcestershire China Factory. They have abolished fines there because they found that it was a hardship on the girls and was of no earthly use to them.

2350. At what date did that abolition take place?—I cannot tell you the date; it is within the last two or three years. They argue, "We cannot charge these workers ten guineas for a breakage, it would be outrageous. Fining only frightens those who are nervous and does no good. If they are careful workers and they make a few accidental mistakes, we will try to make them better; if they are not careful workers it is not worth our while to keep them at all." I was speaking to the manager of a well-known china factory in London the other day. He again, said, "We used to fine, and we do not fine now, because fines make the girls nervous; if they feel when they have a plate that they should be fined if they drop it, ten to one they are likely to drop it."

2351. Now you have dealt with the first head, which is deductions for food, and with the second, which is deduction for things to be done or provided, and with the third, namely, deductions for damage such as you have been describing. The fourth head is disciplinary fines?—I find that they are not much use.

2352. In each and all of those cases the provision of the Statute with regard to having the contract in writing has of course been complied with, at least in those cases?—Yes.

2353. So that you cannot attack it on that footing?—No.

2354. Then you cannot get at it upon the footing that it is not fair and reasonable, at least you have the greatest difficulty?—The greatest difficulty.

2355. Now, on the system under each and all of those heads I wish to ask you this: for instance, as to disciplinary fines, deductions in respect of damage and things to be provided by the employer, including food; in all those cases—charges to be provided by the employer—do you think that the full wage should be given?—I do, the full wage in money.

2356. Are you in favour of the total abolition of fines?—Yes, I do not think that that is the proper way of dealing with the question. I do not think that the wages themselves should be touched at all by way of punishment.

2357. Now as to the alternatives. The alternative is suspension or dismissal, I presume?—The alternative is dismissal. A worker who is a bad worker and not worth keeping, should go. In places where fines have been abolished I do not find that their workers are more careless than any others. There are firms who used to have fines and have now abolished them; I know a number.

2358. Can you tell us the names of those firms?—There is P. 10; there is R. 10—may I send you in a list?

2359. Certainly. We want on this point a list of firms that have found it not inconsistent with the good of their business to abolish fines altogether?—Yes, and may that list include shops?

2360. Certainly?—I am surprised to find that in shops (where fines are held to be so necessary) there are numbers of firms that have abolished them, or never had them, and got on quite as well without.

2361. But your point is that even taking into view the possibility of dismissal, you think on the whole the general advantage would be greater?—Certainly I do. I do not think it would make the workers more careless; it merely means better control over them.

2362. And probably better attention to machinery? Very likely; it certainly reduces irritation amongst the workers. Over and over again a worker will say to me on a matter of fines, "Well, I have paid for it, I am squared with him; I have been late or I have done something wrong, but I have paid him the fine; it is over and done with." The point is that it is not over and done with. The girl has committed an offence, and she ought not to be able to feel that she has "squared it" by paying for it. She ought to feel that she has done wrong; she ought to be reprimanded and threatened with dismissal, and eventually dismissed if she continues the wrongdoing, whatever it is, but she ought not to feel that she could "square it" by paying a small sum in the way of fine.

2363. You will give us a list of the firms that have abolished fines and found that they could get on very well without them?—Yes.

2364. Have you any knowledge of firms that have abolished fines and reverted to the fining system?—No, I never found a case. The other day a firm who had never had fines suggested that they should start them. I do not know whether they have, but that is the only case that I have in my mind now.

2365. Now may I revert again to what you said about two guineas being the total amount of fines in the year?—Not the total amount of fines in the year—the total amount of work damaged.

2366. It was the total amount of damage you meant?—Yes. This is a skirt factory, and the girl who spoils a length of flounce spoils a certain amount of material. It is the custom to deduct the total amount of the actual value of the material; and that amounted to two guineas.

2367. What we are anxious to get is, in respect of that total amount of damage, what was the total amount of fine?—She paid for the damage—nothing besides the damage; she paid all the damage, but nothing in addition.

2368. Mr. Yarrow has been calculating and he brings it out that that would only come to about 3d. per worker per annum?—Yes, that is my point; that, in spite of all this, in spite of the girls being so young, in spite of their being so ill-trained, in spite of their working so fast, they yet do really so little damage. It is extraordinary; I am astonished at it. This kind of "damage" is so natural under the circumstances that it should be regarded as a risk incidental to the advantage of employing cheap (i.e. incompetent) labour, or working at great pressure and should be dealt with otherwise than by fines or deductions

This deduction in respect of spoilt work seems to be in certain trades only. In the clothing trade, for instance, I find this system of deductions for damages in the clothing factory, but in the dressmaking trade, the millinery trade, there are factories now in these trades, and certainly hundreds of girls deal with material which is not cheap —lace, silk, poplin, and other expensive materials—I have never found a case of detention for damage. Lace or expensive stuff, perhaps may be spoilt by being carelessly sewn or crookedly done. They succeed in keeping their discipline and preventing too much damage, without any system at all of deductions for damage.

2369. So that in cases where if it was effective for its purpose it would be most important, namely, where the material is expensive, you have not found the system ?—No.

2370. And in cases where the material is cheap you do find it ?—There may be many cases where the material is expensive in which it exists too, but I was dealing with that particular instance, I am taking two branches of the clothing trade.

2371. In these two branches the fines prevail where the material is cheaper, and they do not appear to prevail, at least nearly to the same extent, where the material is expensive ?—That is so.

2372. Now we will go on to the evasions of the Truck Act as you view them, first by means of the bonus system which you have described. We know that generally, and you can give us a list, can you, of firms where that bonus system prevails ?—I think it prevails in all the flax mills, with a few exceptions, in the north of Ireland. I have in mind now a large flax-spinning firm at Dungannon, who have abolished the system of bonuses for being late. I asked them what the result was ; they said there was no difference in the attendance of the workers. I asked if they had instituted a fine instead, and they said no, there was no difference.

2373. It is merely the moral force of discipline ?—Yes. It was in that firm that I found as I have found in others, that in two spinning-rooms, the girls in one spinning-room were constantly late ; the girls in the spinning-room beneath, doing just the same kind of work, were always up to time The manager called my attention to this. He said, "You see how different the two spinning masters are, the one succeeds in keeping up discipline" (there was no question of fining at all), "I hardly ever have a complaint of lateness, and in the other room they are constantly a little late." He attributed it entirely to the fact that one of the spinning masters was able to keep discipline and the other was not. I found that in different rooms of factories with different forewomen the results were quite different. In some rooms there are hardly any errors or mistakes or unpunctuality, and in another room, doing the same kind of work, and employing the same kind of people, there is a great deal of it. I attribute it to the difference in the moral force of the forewomen.

2374. Then what is your opinion about this bonus system ?—I should like it abolished.

2375. You do not think it effects its purpose ?—I do not think it effects its purpose. A time bonus is simply a fine turned round the other way.

By Mr. Yarrow.

2376. Is not it an addition to wages ?

By the Chairman.

2377. In your view I gather the full wage for good work is the wage plus the bonus ?—Yes.

2378. And the way that that fine comes in is that if there is the slightest slip from perfection the bonus is not given, and the worker does not get the full wage inclusive of the bonus, but only the "wage," and thus the bonus turned round the other way operates as a fine for any slip, however slight, which is a failure from perfection ? —Yes, and that applies where it is a time bonus also. A worker who works fifty-five and a half hours in the week, which is the full time that she could work in this particular mill that I have mentioned, gets the full wage plus the bonus ; she gets the whole thing, and she calls it her wage ; when I first inquired amongst these workers, they always said, "Our wages are so much," when I came to inquire I found that what they called their full wage was the wage plus the bonus which they get when they work full time. If they do not make full time they lose the 2s. bonus.

2380. Then there is an evasion which you have in mind which you speak of as "renewals of contract of employment" ?—Yes, I did not know how else to express it.

2381. Will you explain what you mean by that ?—Where the factory inspector has suggested to a firm that fines for unpunctuality are unreasonable the firm may reply, "Very well, we will not fine at all, but next week when the worker comes we will make a fresh contract with her ; instead of paying her 10s. a week we will pay her 9s. 6d. for that week ; the following week she shall go back to the old contract and have 10s." That is a fine really. It is very difficult to deal with. I do not think one could prosecute for it. I am thinking of a firm where this occurred, an asbestos works. They do not exist any longer. There they said that they would institute this system of renewal of contract, giving a worker a different wage the next week if she had not behaved well the week before.

2382. That is to say, it was not a fine or a deduction from the actual wage earned, but it was a fresh stipulation that she would have less for the same amount of work ?—Yes, she did exactly the same work and was paid less.

2383. That system is not very general, I should think ? —No, I do not think it is.

2384. But it is objectionable ?—Very objectionable. There is also a system called suspension—sending a worker out, giving her what they call a "pass out" for the half-day or for a day, or an hour, or two days, for committing any offence.

2385. Is that pretty largely resorted to ?—I do not think so. I have not found it very often.

2386. Have you any opinion, with regard to the advantage in conducting the inspection duties, of having the law codified ?—It would be very much easier and simpler not only for the inspectors but for the employees.

2387. You have given us your opinion with regard to the need for amendment in detail in regard to all those provisions ?—In my opinion deductions should be abolished altogether. I do not wish to commit myself to the statement that the provisions can be amended in a little matter here and a little matter there. Having found how difficult it is so to word any section that it cannot admit of being evaded, it seems to me that it would be better not to attempt it, because the advantage of deductions is so little to anybody, in my experience. The advantage to the workers I do not see, and in talking to the best employers, those who have the keenest interest in their workpeople, I do not see that they find that there is any advantage in it, because they do not take advantage of the possibility of fining.

2388. The judges of the land seem to have been successful in finding imperfections in any form of Parliamentary language ; is that your view ?—Well, in the case of the Truck Acts.

2389. And you think a universal negative could not be misconstrued ?—I do not know that I go so far as that.

2390. But at all events you would rather have a definite exclusion of the whole thing ?—I would rather have something definite. One employer who secures his discipline without fining should not see his next-door neighbour imposing fines and feel it impossible under the Truck Act to prevent him doing so.

2391. In carrying out your duties you have endeavoured, of course, in all cases, to the best of your judgment, to carry out the spirit of the enactment ?—Yes.

Miss L. A. E. Deane.

28 June 1906.

2392. In applying those Acts, for instance, to out-workers, you thought that you were carrying out the mind of Parliament on the subject—you were endeavouring to do that?—I hope so, yes.

2393. Now, what I want to put to you is: do you think that those efforts that you were making should in the future be rendered successful by some alteration of the language of the Act of Parliament?—Yes.

2394. Do you think that that is necessary in order to avoid cases of extreme individual hardship?—Yes.

2396. That applies notably to all the classes of out-workers in the kingdom?—Yes.

2397. And particularly in the soft goods trades, or does it apply to the hardware trade too?—I do not know about out-workers in the hardware trade; my experience has been chiefly in soft goods.

2398. Then we should like to get from you any evidence that you are able to furnish with regard to the system of fines and deductions in shops, which were not under your jurisdiction as an inspector. I understand you are engaged in making investigations into that subject?—Yes.

2399. It may be necessary for us to call you upon for that, but I would ask you, if you could, to complete your investigations as soon as possible?—Yes. You ask for a list of the kind of fines that I have found. I have a list here of fines, either written down or which the employers have themselves told me of, but not all in one place. They have not given me, and I have not been able to ask for, except as a favour, a list of fines in a shop.

2400. How many fines are there on that list?—There are four pages of them.

2401. Are you able to testify to the contents of that list?—They are actually taken from lists of fines, or taken from what the employers have told me.

2402. So that they are in operation in each and all of those cases?—Not all in the same place.

2403. Does that apply to shops?—This is only shops.

2404. Will you kindly, before you resume your evidence, cross the items upon which you wish to comment, in the list, as illustrative of what you think demands remedy?—Yes.

2405. Then you have been investigating the case of living-in also?—Yes, I have visited a considerable number of drapers' shops and dressmaking and millinery workplaces, where the dressmakers and milliners or the shop assistants live in. I have only asked about women. I have not many enquiries concerning men.

2406. Have you completed that, or would you rather defer it?—I would rather defer it, if you do not mind.

By Mrs. Tennant.

2407. As a matter of fact have any of the appeals under the Truck Act taken by the Home Office been successful?—There is one appeal which was successful, but it was in respect of a matter which really related to the powers of inspectors; it was not on any principle of the Truck Act. All the appeals have been dismissed.

2408. You referred to a firm at Dungannon having given up fines. Was that quite recently?—It was quite recently, within the last two years I think.

2409. Have they described their experience since then; are they quite satisfied with the result of their giving up fines?—They are not satisfied with some of the workers being late, but the manager said they were not more late than they were before; there is no difference. That is the usual result when I ask; they tell me there is no difference between the former condition and the present condition.

2410. Have any of those firms with whom you discussed the abandonment of their fines, in relating their experience, said anything to you about hope for the future; had they any opinon as to whether discipline in the future would be improved, even though it had not been so far?—No.

2411. Have you yourself any opinion as to whether there would be improvement?—No, except that where fines are not resorted to, better means of discipline, better foremen, more competent foremen, more competent overlookers are required, and consequently I should think a better condition would arise in the factory.

2412. Now what would you like to see done in the two matters that you have referred to towards the end of your evidence, the evasion of the present Truck Acts by means of bonuses and by means of this system of renewals of contracts of employment. You said that you would like to see the bonus system abolished. Would you like to see the system of payment of wages in that way made illegal under any amending Truck Act?—Yes; when I say abolished, I mean, made illegal.

By the Chairman.

2413. You mean, abolished by Act of Parliament?—Yes.

By Mrs. Tennant.

2414. With regard to the renewal of contracts of employment, do you think that that could also be anticipated in an amending Truck Act; do you think that system of the evasion of the law could be made impossible under any new law?—Any amendment of the Truck Act in the way I suggest, it seems to me, would have necessarily to carry the possibility of inspectors inquiring into such matters as conditions of employment and methods of dismissal; otherwise one would have an evasion of it in that way. It seems to me that where the spirit of the Truck Act was evaded by disciplinary suspensions that ought also to be abolished; I mean, the possibility of evading it in that way should be abolished—the possibility of substituting for fines disciplinary suspensions, which means deductions from wages. There should be no way of touching wages as a punishment.

2415. And, even if certain evasions were discovered, would you feel that at any rate the worker would have a clearer issue in combating the new system instead of the present system of fining. Supposing something was designed which it would be very difficult for any law to anticipate, or very difficult for any inspector to deal with—this question of the renewal of contracts of employment is rather a case in point—would you consider that at any rate there was a clearer issue and one which the worker would be more likely to deal with effectively than she could with surreptitious deductions from wages?—Yes; I think the whole thing would be clearer. A woman would know where she was; she would know better what she had to face. She would not be told that she was going to make a certain sum as wages, and then find that she did not get it. If she did wrong she would be reprimanded or dismissed. She would know exactly where she was in regard to what she would earn in wages.

2416. Taking now into account the interests of the worker, would you rather see a firm who did not wish to dismiss its worker, saying to the worker, "Well, we do not think you are worth 10s. a week, we think you are only worth 9s., and that is what we propose to give you"?—I would rather that.

2417. You would rather see a direct reduction of wages?—Much rather. If she is only worth 9s. a week, she should only receive 9s.

By Mr. Ramsay Macdonald.

2418. I think you said that you did not know cases of middlemen in the sprigging trade that gave out work without receiving any commission from the large wholesale houses—referring to the North of Ireland?—Yes.

2419. Have you had any experience of those commission agents in the knitting industry?—No.

2420. You do not know whether commission is or is not paid in that industry?—No.

2421. There was a question raised about how far truck practices were prevalent in the North of Ireland. Would you say generally that truck was the practice and that payment of coin was not the practice, but rather the exception?—No. I think that truck is the exception now anyhow.

2422. Now the workers you have described and Miss Squire has described previously are as a rule paid in coin?—They are most often paid in coin, I think, now.

2423. Then with reference to fines in shops, who enforces those lists of fines? I am thinking more of a sort of departmental shop. I suppose the man who would enforce the fines would be the man—I do not know the technical expression—I suppose you would call him the shopwalker?—As a rule the shopwalker inflicts the fine. The shopwalker has a certain number of girls under him behind the counter, and he inflicts the fines—for instance such a fine as for allowing a customer to leave the shop without first speaking to him, if he has not bought anything, fined 6d.; leaving two boxes in front of a customer—not moving away one box before he got the other box in front of a customer.

2425. The employer himself is not in any way directly responsible?—He makes the rules, but he often knows nothing about the matter.

2426. He does not make himself responsible for the administration of the rules?—No.

2427. Then with reference to your opinion that the bonus system should be made illegal. I suppose your suggestion about that would be that the law should define wages or payments in such a way as to exclude the possibility of this bonus being regarded as legal?—The definition of wages could include bonus I think.

2428. The definition should be such that the payment should be regarded as one and indivisible—that all payments made in respect of work done should be indivisible?—Yes.

2429. And that they should not be capable of being divided into wages and bonuses, premiums, commissions, or anything else?—Yes.

2430. That the whole thing should be wages?—Yes.

2431. And that from that indivisible lump sum no deductions or fines should be made?—Yes.

2432. That is really what you want to suggest to us, is it not?—Yes.

By Mr. Maddison.

2433. I think you have made it plain in your evidence that you are against fines of any kind, and that you face the alternative of dismissal, and think that it would on the whole be better all round?—I am sure it would. I do not think it would be a hardship to the worker at all,

2434. And you include in that belief suspensions. I gather that if they were to suspend a girl or a woman———? —That is a practical dismissal, or rather I should say it is a practical deduction.

2435. Of course you would be careful there that the suspension was purely a disciplinary one?—Simply by way of punishment. What I mean is, I would rather that wages should not be touched by way of punishment—that the punishment should be inflicted in some other way.

2436. You could conceive of a form of suspension that would not quite come to that?—No. I do not think I have ever found in my experience any form of suspension that was not punishment.

2437. Now, have you had any experience of the working of the Lancashire women weavers who, as you know, are out of the Act of 1896. What is your experience as to them?—I have had none. Miss Paterson has had experience of that.

2438. Then there is one question with respect to this very deplorable description we have had of the truck system in Ireland. The argument is used that if we were to interfere very much these poor women would lose their work altogether. What is your view as to that?—The work has got to be done. I do not think they would lose it at all. I think they will get lower wages than their present nominal wages. The contractor who gives say 8d. in cash, and what he calls 8d. in goods, would probably give 8d. in cash and 4d. additional in cash for the goods no longer given.

2439. One word about sick clubs and mess rooms, and kindred things of that kind. I suppose you are against any of those being made a condition of employment in any case?—Certainly.

Miss L. A. E. Deane.

28 June 1906.

2440. But in case they are not made a condition of employment, do you think that sick clubs are altogether free from objection?—I have not had much experience of them, but where I have found them it seemed to me that there was always the danger that women might put their money into a thing and then find that the firm failed, or if they moved away they could not recover. I think it is unsafe.

2441. And is it not difficult to avoid making the membership of such sick clubs in actual practice a condition of employment, or are women fairly independent in these matters? I do not know whether I have made myself plain. Here is a firm that does not make it a condition of employment, but it is pretty well known that they want the workers to join a sick club. Now, what is the result of that?—As a rule any wish expressed by the firm in such matters as that is looked upon by the women as a matter to be acceded to if possible; I mean they are afraid as a rule of doing anything which would put them out of favour.

2442. But you have had no large experience of that question?—That is so.

By Mr. Delevingne.

2343. I should like to clear up the point about the Home Office appeals. You said that the Home Office had lost every appeal that it had taken since the Act of 1896, except one. There have only been five appeals altogether?—There has only been one in my case; I do not know how many there have been altogether.

2444. There have been five. I will just take you through those. There were two cases of Squire v. Sweeney, one was successful and one unsuccessful, and the unsuccessful one was under the Act of 1831?—Yes.

2445. Then there was the case of Squire v. Bayer under the Act of 1896, which was lost; there was Squire, v. The Midland Lace Company, also under the Act of 1896, which was lost; and then there was the Hooper case which was taken by one of the men Factory Inspectors under the Act of 1831; that was a case in which deductions were made in respect of the Workmen's Compensation Act payment, and that was lost?—Yes, and then the Newry case—the recent one.

2446. But under the Act of 1896 the Home Office has taken four appeals, and won one and lost three?—Have we won any appeal?

2447. Yes, Squire v. Sweeney, under the Act of 1896?—But it was not really upon the Truck point that we won; it was simply whether the inspector should have a right to inquire of the outworker.

2448. It was under Section 6 of the Act of 1896. However, I will not pursue that. Then on the question of bonuses you say you think that the definition of wage should be so framed as to include bonuses?—Yes.

2449. Is it not rather the case that wage as defined in the Act of 1831 already includes everything paid by way of recompense or reward of labour?—That is what I thought, until the Newry case. That was the ground on which that case was fought. The Solicitor-General for the Home Office urged that the definition of wages covered everything paid as the remuneration of labour. It is a very, very wide definition. His expression was, it was not possible to conceive of anything wider. The words are, "Any kind of reward or remuneration in respect of labour." But now the decision is that it does not include bonuses.

2450. Do you know that the decision has gone upon that particular point?—That was the decision of the magistrates; and the telegram that I received yesterday states that the High Court have unanimously upheld the decision of the magistrates. The magistrates argued that bonus is not wage, and therefore this case does not come under the Truck Act, and we dismiss it.

2451. Then on the question of bonuses generally, are you opposed to every kind of bonus. Would you be opposed to a bonus which was given to encourage a worker to produce more work in a given time?—My experience is (it is only amongst women) that such bonuses are generally given where the normal wage is low. It is a kind of driving. In order to get the bonus the woman has to work very hard indeed—harder than normally—and it gives her a false impression as to what her wages will really be. She reckons when she goes to a place, and hears that the wages are so much, that she will get the bonus too, and she takes the place instinctively thinking that she is always going to get the bonus. She finds that she does not get it. She finds that unless she does a little more than the usual and normal amount of work she does not get it. Take the case of reelers in a flax mill; they get a set price for so many reels. If they do more than a certain number of hundred reels they get 6d. more. If they are late for a few minutes they cannot do it; if they do not work at top speed they cannot do it. I think it drives the workers. It does not give me the impression of being a fair thing. When it is a case of piece-work, a good piece-worker naturally will make more than a bad piece-worker, and that in itself, it seems to me, is a sufficient difference between the bad and the good.

Miss L. A. E. Deane.

2452. Is the bonus system as you know it only in the case of piece-work?—No. In this particular Newry case they were time-workers.

2453. But is it not a fair thing that an employer should be able to say to his time-workers, "You shall have a bonus for extra diligence or extra good work," so as to encourage his time workers to give the firm their best efforts?—No, I think he should engage a piece-worker to give as much as she possibly could, and pay her a wage for that. It is only a fine hind-side before, really; it means that unless you do a little more than the normal thing you do not get the full wage.

2454. Of course, I am not thinking of cases where the bonus, as in the Newry case, is really a fine and an evasion of the Truck Act, but I am thinking of cases where the bonus is really given not to reduce wages but to increase them?—My experience is that it often does lead to reduction; that you do not get the proper wage except as a bonus. I am talking only of women, and of rather low paid work. I think that is the tendency—that the full wage is really the wage plus bonus—that the real wage itself gets lower and lower, because they can make the bonus if they work extra hard.

2455. What action have you taken under the Truck Act in regard to the living-in system in millinery and dressmaking workshops?—I have taken none. I had not considered the subject.

2456. I do not think you gave the Committee any estimates as to the extent to which it does prevail?—Do you mean simply among dressmakers and milliners?

2457. I mean in workshops under the Factory Act?—I do not think it exists very largely. The heads of millinery and dressmaking workshops often live in; milliners more often live in than dressmakers; but I do not think that it exists very largely. Where I have found it is amongst foreign workers. It is getting more and more the custom for French women to be brought over in a number for the season, and they live in.

2458. In your experience is the system attended with good or bad results; I mean, is it fair to the workers on the whole; is it fairly worked, or are they put off with bad food and insufficient accommodation?—May I look upon that as two questions and deal with the last first? I think there is a great deal of abuse, but I am not prepared to say whether I think the system is, on the whole, bad or good; I do not know enough to express an opinion. I only know that there is a great deal of abuse, and I think it should be regulated; but I do not know enough to know whether the whole system is really very bad or very good. I should not like to give an opinion.

2459. You would not like to say the living-in principle is a bad one in itself?—No, I would not say the principle is bad in itself, but I do say that I have found very bad cases indeed in connection with these workshops. I do not know enough to give a general opinion.

2460. Suppose fines and deductions were not abolished altogether, would it help you at all in proving cases if the burden of proof in regard to such matters as the cost of materials or the amount of damage done was thrown upon the employer instead of upon the inspector?—Certainly.

2461. Would that tend to make the existing sections fairly effective?—I think that would make them a little better.

2462. Or do you think that, at any rate in the case of damaged articles, the proof which the employer would produce would be much the same as the proof he already produces to meet your arguments?—Yes, that is true.

2463. Now, about the overalls. You are opposed to the employers making deductions in regard to the overalls?—Certainly.

2464. I suppose in some cases the employer does not supply the overalls himself, but he makes it a condition of employment that the worker shall come provided with overalls?—Yes, and in some cases he charges for them; I mean, the worker can only get them through that particular firm. In other cases it is a condition of employment that the worker shall come provided with them.

2465. You do not see any objection to that, I suppose?—It comes to pretty much the same thing as making her buy the overalls, does it not. Suppose the employer supplies the overalls at cost price. It really means that the worker's first week's wages are not her full wage, but very much less. A girl who is earning 10s. a week and has to live on that, when she goes to a place in which an overall is required from her, has to spend—or rather has to begin first of all by getting into debt, to the extent of the price of the overall, out of her first week's wage before she can start work at all; therefore, for that week her wages, instead of being 10s., are 8s. 6d.; I think 1s. 6d. is the price of the overalls.

2466. Does not that raise a wider question? In many cases the workers are required to bring and use their own tools?—Yes.

2467. Would you go so far as to say that that should be prohibited—I mean, looking for the moment upon overalls as being one of the things required for a particular employment?—It is not a thing necessary to the work in the way we are looking upon it; but supposing it were, even, I think that is rather different. A workman who brings his own tools is in the nature of a person who has a certain amount of capital; he has his capacity for work and his tools help him. I think it is different with a girl who has no tools like that. A man goes to different places and his hammer lasts him, I suppose, half his life if he is careful of it.

2468. Still, it is difficult to interfere in a matter of that sort?—My impression would be that it was the duty of the employer to provide his own tools, and to punish a workman who destroyed them—to take him into court if he destroyed them or damaged them unnecessarily, maliciously, or wilfully; he should sue the workman.

2469. Now, with regard to the two sets of cases that you gave us in regard to clothing factories, where in the one case material is cheap and deductions are common, and in the other case where the materials are expensive, and deductions are practically non-existent: what would you suggest to be the explanation of that?—Custom. I think that is only a custom. It may be partly because in clothing factories there is a good deal of piece-work. The workers are working as fast as they possibly can. Their piece-work wages are lower, comparatively speaking; they have to work as fast as they can and they are likely to make many mistakes. They have not time to be careful. It may be partly that, but I think it is largely custom. It is not the custom in the dressmaking trade to deduct for damages, and it is the custom in the clothing places.

2470. It just occurred to me that it might be connected with the profits made in the two trades respectively. In the clothing trade the profits would be very much cut, I suppose, and in the expensive dressmaking shops——?—Tney often make no profits at all. The risks in expensive dressmaking shops are very great indeed.

2471. One last question. I think you have had some experience of fines by gang masters?—In the Potteries where they have the team system, and where the team master employs two or three men under him and fines them. I cannot speak to special cases, but I found that was the custom when I was in the Potteries some years ago.

2472. Have you made any attempt to deal with that under the Truck Act?—No, I have not.

By Mr. Yarrow.

2473. The bonus system is being very rapidly introduced into this country as you no doubt are aware, and therefore anything you can tell us about it will be particularly valuable. Now I infer from what you said that you do not approve of bonuses, because the non-giving of the bonus is practically a fine ?—Yes.

2474. I take it that if the bonus is a payment in addition to the usual wages, it is really a reward for extra diligence, and in that case I suppose you would approve of it ?—No, not in the way you put it, quite. I can only give you my impression about it, but my impression is that where there is a bonus it is really less than the usual wage, and the usual wage, the normal wages tend, to sink. For instance, an addition to wages will be put on to the bonus instead of on to the wage.

2475. I assume in my question that the bonus is in addition to the wage, and that the wage is not reduced. If the bonus is in addition to the wage it would be as a reward for extra diligence. You would approve of giving a reward for extra diligence, would you not ?—No, I think you have a right to require full diligence from your worker. You have a right to have the best she can give in return for the wage you give her. I do not think it would be right to suggest that she could be extra diligent. She has to give you the best that she can.

2476. I will put it in another form. Suppose the employer and employed are working on the bonus system, and they both are perfectly contented and very pleased with it; you would not make any law to prevent that being carried out ?—I do not feel that I can judge about that. I would remind you that when the provision as to overtime was first brought in a great many of the workers felt that overtime was a very good thing, and that it ought not to be abolished. And yet I feel that it is very important to regulate it. Speaking of women more particularly, I think that they often do not realise the position. They have said to me: "Oh, we get a bonus in such and such a place," as if it was something extra. It may be in a few instances something extra, but as a rule it really means that the woman gets the full wage in that place.

2477. Do you think there would be a strong opposition to the abandoning of all fines by law on the part of the firms themselves ?—I believe the opposition would be much less now than it would have been even when the Act of 1896 came in.

2478. That does not tell me whether you think there would be a strong opposition now. In your conversations with the heads of firms did you form the idea that there would be opposition ?—Less and less. I am sure there are a very large number who would strongly object, but there is an increasing number who would not object—they say that they do not find the system of fines of any use to them.

2479. Now, in regard to that extract from a newspaper: your evidence conflicts entirely with what was stated in the paper. Can you suggest any means by which we could get confirmation on one side or the other ?—I should suggest that the writer of the paper should give his evidences, and if you arrived at no further results there should be an inquiry about it. But I should like to say that an inquiry which had been blazoned abroad beforehand would stand little chance of being very successful. I think if I had gone down to Ardara and everybody knew that I was coming to inquire into a case of that sort, payment in goods would have been stopped.

2480. But if you went down without anybody knowing it ?—I did go down without anybody knowing it, or very few people knowing it——

2481. You told Mr. Maddison that with regard to truck in Ireland, the workers if they had been paid in cash would probably have lower wages ?—Yes.

2482. If they are paid in cash entirely, do not you think their wage would be lower ?—Nominally lower, not really.

2483. When they came to exchange the money for necessaries would it not come to the same thing, because of course the object of money is to buy necessaries ?—I think it would be better, because they could get their necessaries in the cheapest shops. A worker gets a certain sum of money and a certain sum in goods from a shop valued by the employer at a given amount. If she had had the money she would probably be able to say: "I have not been having sufficient value from that place, and I will go to some other place where I shall get more value for the money."

Miss L. A. E. Deane.

2484. Do you think the worker would gain by it, really ?—Yes, because in the first place she would be able to take advantage of competition as she cannot now, where she has to go to only one shop and take whatever goods are given to her.

2485. But if she had an equal number of the necessaries of life by either system it would not matter which system was adopted ?—Yes, I think it matters very much.

2486. The object of the work is to get the necessaries of life ?—I do not quite think that. The object of work is to get the necessaries of life, but if in getting the necessaries of life you also lose your independence and get into debt, and are not in a proper position to use your wages as your own to do what you like with, I think that is a drawback.

2487. Now with regard to the girls working in factories where there are fines. Do they know all about these fines—what they are and what the amount is—prior to applying for the employment; because it would appear that a person ought to know before applying, the conditions of the employment ?—Certainly.

2488. Are the girls able to get the full information as to what the fines are before they apply ?—No.

2489. Do not you think it would be a very good thing if they did ?—It would be an advantage, certainly.

2491. If there were a certain system of fines and the people were engaged based on that system, it would not be competent, probably, to make any change. Would it not be a great advantage for them to know before they took the employment what the system was ?—It would be better than not knowing it, but I do not think it would be a good thing. The girl has to calculate what her wages are. I do not think in ordinary cases the girl is able to calculate and to find out how much goes in fines and what is the real wage.

2492. Still if there are to be fines, you would prefer that the workers should know what they are beforehand ?—Certainly.

2493. And at present they are not always capable of finding that out ?—No.

By Mr. Ramsay Macdonald.

2494. I should like to put a supplemental question upon this bonus matter, just to try and get it clear. I think your experience of the bonus payments has been under conditions where there has been a standard wage paid. What I mean by that is that there has been no form of collective bargain, no trade union, and nothing but a wage which is common to a locality ?—That is so.

2495. And that there is no protection such as trade union negotiations provide, for keeping that wage up or for improving it ?—In the North of Ireland there is a trade union for women, but it is a very weak one; it practically means the wage in the locality.

2496. Then you told us, as far as I could grasp what you said, that in the North of Ireland, although the bonuses paid varied, say, from 6d. to 2s., nevertheless, the wages plus the bonus, in spite of the variation of the bonus, came to generally the same total amount ?—Generally it comes to the same thing for the same amount of work.

2497. That applies to flax spinning places in the North of Ireland ?—Yes.

2498. Now outside the North of Ireland could you make the same statement with regard to wages. I think you have had experience in the West of England ?—No, I am sorry to say I have little experience of the textile trades outside Ireland. My fellow inspector, Miss Paterson, has had experience there.

Miss L. A. E. Deane.

28 June 1906.

By the Chairman.

2499. You referred to various cases in answer to Mr. Delevingne. There were two stages in the case of Squire v. Sweeney. There was the stage in which you were successful in obtaining access to all the parts of the factory, but when it came to the merits of the matter, so far as truck was concerned, upon that you were not successful ?—No, I do not think it was access to the factory ; I do not remember whether it was access to the outworkers' houses.

By Mr. Delevingne.

2500. It was access to the places where the work was being given out.

By the Chairman.

2501. You wanted access and there was difficulty about that, and that came to be ultimately a question which the court settled in favour of giving you access ?—Yes.

2502. Now, the only other point is this : I was interested in your answer to Mr. Yarrow. You said you thought there might be less opposition now to the abolition of fines. Do you attribute the decrease of opposition to such a proposal to the experience had by those firms which have abolished fines. Do you think that that has assisted in ripening opinion as to the feasibility of the abolition of fines ?—Yes, because I think a number of firms since the Truck Act of 1896 have gone into the question a great deal more than they used to, and even though they have not abolished all fines they have had to abolish some of them—the inspector having shown that these were illegal : respecting those particular fines they have found that they are no worse off, and they therefore have had their opposition to the abolition of all fines a great deal weakened by that experience.

By Mr. Yarrow.

2503. Suppose the fines at a factory or shop were put outside so that anybody could see them before they went for the job ; do you think that that would have the effect of abolishing fines ; do not you think that that might have a self-acting effect ?—Do you mean in making them so public ?

2504. Making them public so that everybody could see them, including those who applied for work. Do not you think that that might have a double effect, one of letting the people applying for work know exactly what the conditions are, and another effect that the firm instead of putting up a list of fines might think it worth their while to abandon fines ?—Taking the first question, I think I must point out that women seldom read notices ; sometimes they will not read even the Truck Act notice ; they hardly ever read the abstract of the Factory Act ; it is couched in language that they do not always understand ; and sometimes they cannot read it. They like to have a thing in their hands that they can take home with them, and study and compare : directly you have to set up a list of fines it tends to reduce the number ; but it has not tended to make these firms abolish all fines.

2505. I mean putting them up outside so that the people could see them before they went inside to apply for a berth ?—I do not think that would have much effect. It would certainly not have much effect on the people who go in, and I do not think it would occur to anyone to stop outside and read the notices.

TWELFTH DAY.

Thursday, July 5th, 1906.

PRESENT.

The Right Hon. THOMAS SHAW, K.C., M.P., Lord-Advocate for Scotland (Chairman).

E. A. BROTHERTON, Esq., M.P.
F. CAWLEY, Esq., M.P.
MALCOLM DELEVINGNE, Esq.
J. RAMSAY MACDONALD, Esq., M.P.
Mrs. H. J. TENNANT.

T. E. BETTANY, Esq. (Secretary).

Miss MARY PATERSON, was called ; and Examined.

Miss M. Paterson.

5 July 1906.

By the Chairman.

2506. You are one of the inspectors of factories ?—Yes.

2507. I understand you were appointed a factory inspector in 1893 ?—Yes.

2508. And since then have you been constantly engaged in inspection ?—Yes.

2509. What is the range and area of your duties ?—I inspect in Scotland, and the north of England, including Northumberland and Durham, Lancashire and the northern counties generally. I have also been occasionally to Ireland with reference to Truck matters, and to the fishing industry there. I always take Miss Anderson's place in London when she is away for any long period, so that from time to time I do some inspecting in London.

2510. Miss Anderson is your immediate superior ?—Yes.

2511. Does the whole of Scotland come within your sphere of duty ?—Yes.

2512. Speaking generally with regard to Scotland, what would you say on the subject of fines and deductions ?—As compared with the north of England—Lancashire for instance—I should say there is less systematic fining in Scotland. Fines and deductions are made, but the practice is not so systematic nor so extensive.

2513. Does that apply to any particular industry ?—I have found it to be so throughout the clothing industries—the making of wearing apparel—and also in the cotton trade and other textile industries.

2514. Of course your labours are confined to cases in which women and children are particularly affected ?—Yes.

2515. Do you find that in Scotland fewer contracts are made in pursuance of the 1896 Act ?—Yes.

2516. What is the attitude of the workers in Scotland with regard to deductions ?—The workers rather resent deductions. They don't understand the Truck Act very commonly, and are of opinion that deductions are illegal.

2517. Do they resent deductions even in cases of damage to work ?—Yes, I find that is much resented in the textile industries.

2518. You find the prevailing opinion to be that deductions in general are illegal ?—Yes.

2519. What is your own view about that? Would you rather that they were made illegal?—Yes, I should prefer them to be made illegal. I think the existence of the present system and the affixing of notices and the arranging of machinery leads to the infliction of fines and deductions.

2520. Would you explain that a little more fully?—I find that in some cases where there had been no contract, but where deductions had been made—perhaps half a dozen deductions during the previous six or twelve months in a factory—that when the firm took the trouble to make a contract and arrange for giving particulars, etc., it really led to a feeling that it was part of the business of the factory to make deductions and fines, and I have found them increase very much.

2521. Once the thin end of the system was in?—Yes.

2522. They wanted it justified by going on with it?—Yes, and it sometimes seemed in doing so as if perhaps, the inspector was almost instituting the system by calling attention to the Truck Act.

2523. Do you think there was a healthy ignorance on the part of some employers of the power to impose fines?—I think there was, and I think there still is to some extent.

2524. And that, in your judgment, is quite beneficial—the fact that people should not know that they have power, by law, to impose deductions?—Yes, I think that is rather beneficial.

2525. We will ask you your general opinion by and bye, but let us first take the case of the textile trades, and begin with, say, Dundee, where the prevalent industry is, of course, jute. What is the rule with regard to that industry?—In that industry there are practically no fines. The rate of wages is low, but the work is rough and hastily done, and not much examined; so there are practically no fines.

2526. Is there any system of contracts in that industry?—No.

2528. Now take the finer classes of work—the damask and linen weaving in Dunfermline, Brechin, and such places? What about the fines there?—I think there are more fines and deductions for damaged work in Dunfermline than in any other part of Scotland, so far as my experience goes. It is done more systematically.

2529. Would you tell us generally the nature of these deductions?—In weaving table linen, I find that the deduction practically resolves itself into the worker having to pay for damaged work—that is, having to buy the work.

2530. Can you give us any idea of the relative figures about that, in order to make it as clear as possible? What would be the average weekly wage for the work of a woman of full age?—I think it would be probably about 15s. or 16s. per week, but for fine work it might be £1 per week.

2531. They are somewhat highly paid women?—Yes, pretty well paid. They are very skilled workers.

2532. What is the amount of the fine that is usually imposed?—I have found that a worker doing table napkins, has had to buy the napkin that is damaged, but much would depend upon the kind of work she was doing. The value of the napkin might be put at about 1s. or 1s. 6d.

2533. She takes the single damaged article?—Yes.

2534. What is the nature of the damage upon it?—There may be threads out, or a certain kind of damage called scobs.

2535. What is that?—That is caused by the breaking of the yarn which gets into a sort of knot, and then requires a good deal of darning and often cannot be put quite right.

2536. Then that means the equivalent of 1s. or 1s. 6d. deducted from the woman's wages?—Yes.

2537. Have you any idea how much would be deducted in a week from a worker's wage?—The workers in Dunfermline are very skilled, and do not damage their work much, but there is a system of making them pay for all they do damage.

2538. Now that we know the amount of the wages, and the nature of the operation, I want to get at the amount of the deductions. Would there sometimes be two napkins a week deducted?—There might be.

2539. That would mean between two and three shillings?—Yes.

2540. What is the attitude of the workers themselves with regard to that?—The workers, as a rule, consider these deductions as unreasonable and unfair. They blame the yarn for it, and, considering the general excellence of their work, it very often seems as if there was a good deal to be said for their point of view.

2541. Can you distinguish between one factory and another in that respect?—Yes.

2542. Are there some factories who conduct their business without that system of deduction at all?—Yes. Some time ago when I was in communication with them, the manufacturers (in view of contracts which were not valid under the 1896 Act, but dated back to 1882), went into the matter with the result that all of them put up notices which were practically the same, differing only a little in detail, but I found that they acted very differently upon the notices. I have not recently been able to make systematic inspections in Dunfermline, but I find that one or two firms who fined heavily some years ago, are still the firms who fine heavily now. I think I may say that there is one firm that does not fine for damaged work at all.

2543-2544. What firm is that?—S.10. I think they make no fines.

2545. Is that a firm of good repute?—Yes, I think so.

2546. Of the highest, I believe?—I think so.

2547. Then at the end of the scale there are firms that fine heavily?—Yes.

2548. And one firm in particular, I think, you said?—There is one firm whom I prosecuted, but there is also one firm in my mind that stands out as fining heavily too; there are two.

2549. Is that also a firm of high standing?—Yes, I think so.

2550. Do you find that there is any complaint by the manufacturer in a case where there are no fines; does that manufacturer who does not impose fines complain of lack of discipline by want of them?—No.

2551. Did you ever know a firm or an employer who did that?—No, I do not think so.

2552. Have you discussed the matter with the firms who fine heavily?—Yes.

2553. What is, speaking generally, their attitude with regard to that; do they represent it to be a necessity in their business?—They represent it more as a method of enforcing discipline.

2554. Does it appear to you as if it had rather been a growth, in Dunfermline especially?—Yes.

2555. It is a long standing custom?—I think it has been a long standing custom there.

2556. Who could give us information about that; have they a workers' union there?—Yes, they have a small union. The secretary of it is a weaver.

2557. I want to get from you, since we are having the advantage of your evidence, your opinion as to whether you think that system of fines and deductions operative in one factory and not in another, is in the cause of good discipline. Does it promote good discipline, or could it be dispensed with and yet there be good discipline?—I think it could be dispensed with. I do not myself think that it even meets its end of good discipline.

2558. Tell me how that is?—The fines take the place of supervision, that is much more effective than fining. In Scotland fines are imposed very often on workers who are late in the morning——

2559. Would you mind keeping to damaged work for the moment?—I think it has the same effect in the matter of damaged work; the worker does not put any better work into her work because she thinks she is going to be fined. I very often feel when I have heard both sides that the worker is right; that it could not be avoided, that it was something beyond her control, and the worker feels it keenly, having done work with which no fault has been found for perhaps six months, that one oversight even, should be the cause of a fine.

Miss M. Paterson.

5 July 1906.

2560. In saying that the absence of fines would promote better supervision, do you refer not only to the supervision of the workers themselves, but supervision of the plant and of the raw material?—Yes I think so.

2561. The yarns particularly?—Yes.

2562. Take the firms that you have in your mind, where fines exist and are carried on from year to year. Suppose a recommendation given effect to by Parliament that would hit that system and abolish fines; do you think even in those factories where they have had them there would be injury done to the employers?—I cannot think so.

2563. And would it promote satisfaction among the workers?—I think so.

2564. Under the system of fines would you put it that your experience is that in not a few cases under such a system injustice is being done to the worker. She is being punished for a defect or a damage to raw material?—Yes, or a defect in supervision. The overseer, the tenter as they call him in Scotland, does not look after her looms perhaps as he would do if there could be no fine.

2565. Then you spoke of fines for unpunctuality and absence and so on; how do these run?—In Dunfermline they are pretty general in the factories. As a rule they go to 1d. for being late up to ten minutes; then 3d. if they are out from between six and nine in the morning, nine o'clock being the breakfast time, and 10d. as a rule if they are away a day.

2566. They are pieceworkers?—Yes.

2567. These fines for unpunctuality and absence seem to be small in amount?—The workers do not find them very small.

2568. Just give us your evidence as to that?—Coming from pieceworkers, of course 10d. off for a day's absence does strike the pieceworker, and it strikes me as being rather large—for a pieceworker.

2569. Is that system general?—In the textile factories the cotton factories and tweed factories and linen, it is fairly general.

2570. Do you approve of it?—No.

2571. What do you propose should be substituted for it?—Well, I think, again, supervision, and the understanding that the worker who keeps time and is punctual is the worker who will be approved by the firm, and will be given better work to do, and encouraged to come in in time, instead of letting her be fined for the time she is out.

2572. On the other hand, the bad worker would have a chance of earlier dismissal?—Yes.

2573. Then still coming back to the damaged work, what does the worker who gets these table cloths or table napkins in her possession do—how is she able to realise anything on them?—I have not found a case in which she has been able to realise anything at all; they are not easy things to dispose of; I do not think I have found any case in which a worker has been able to sell them.

2574. At all events, the practice, bad as you think it, seems to be not very widespread?—That is so.

2575. Do you attribute that largely to the high skill and attention of the workers?—Yes.

2576. Now will you tell me about the system of bonuses in the textile industries?—That I found in Brechin a good deal.

2577. Does that prevail in Dunfermline?—No, I have no knowledge of it in Dunfermline.

2578. That must be because it is not there, I think?—I think it must be because it is not there, but at the same time one's attention might not be directed to everything.

2579. In Brechin how does it work?—It is an addition to the wage, which may be kept off for any reason, any unspecified reason, at all. A bonus is given if there is regular attendance and good work—a bonus of 1s., or something of that kind, is added.

2580. To put it in a word, does that result substantially in a system of fines made easier—a system of fining any way?—I think it does.

2581. And it is an easy way of getting a fine by simply saying that they have not reached up to the bonus standard?—Yes—just withholding the bonus.

2582. Do you think the bonus is withheld for trifling causes?—Yes, I think so.

2583. Does that give rise to dissatisfaction?—Yes, I have had complaints many times.

2584. I suppose the worker treats the full wage to be the wage plus the bonus?—Yes.

2585. That is reckoned as the wage?—Yes.

2586. Then the withholding of the bonus is just a fine?—Yes.

2587. Is the bonus system universal in Brechin?—I think so. I have found it both in the weaving and in the spinning factories there.

2588. Do you think that good discipline is promoted by that bonus system?—No, I do not think so.

2589. Suppose Parliament were to abolish it as substantially a system of fines made easy, do you think that harm would ensue to the relations of worker and employer?—No, I do not think so.

2590. Or do you think that worse work would be given or less work would be given?—I do not think so. I do not see how it could work in that way.

2591. That is your evidence with regard to the jute and damask and linen. Now we come to the cotton weaving factories. I understand there is much variety of practice there?—Yes.

2592. Did there use to be a large number of deductions for bad work?—Yes, in Glasgow there have been, I think, more than there are at present.

2593. Why have the deductions not continued?—Just now I think the scarcity of workers has something to do with it. Any heavy deduction for bad work made from a worker is very apt to result in her leaving her employment, and workers are scarce just now, the cotton factories are very busy.

2594. As a rule you say that the cloth inspector has that in his hands—I mean the deductions for bad work?—Yes.

2595. He is the sole judge, in fact?—Yes, he assesses the damage.

2596. And does it depend upon his personal feeling or caprice?—It is very apt to. Very often, on inquiring into deductions, I find that kind of thing.

2597. That of course might result in injustice from any detestable causes?—Yes.

2599. On the whole factory?—On the whole factory.

2600. And yet the system was kept up?—Well, it is done very unsystematically. There was no contract under the 1896 Act, and they were done, I think, almost by the caprice of the cloth inspector.

2601. Is that a case that in your mind points clearly to the possibility of the system being abolished without harming anybody?—Yes.

2602. Who is this cloth inspector?—He is in the warehouse. When the workers bring in the woven cloth there are, according to the size of the factory, a certain number of girls who will look it over, and he is the judge of what is to be kept off, and is responsible.

2603. He is the employee of the firm?—Yes.

2604. The workers themselves have no voice in his appointment?—No.

2605. Now we come to a very important district, the tweed district of the south of Scotland. Will you tell us about that. What are the towns that you are referring to there. I suppose Galashiels, Peebles, Donner Law, Walkerburn, Selkirk, and so on?—Yes.

2606. There is a system of deductions there ?—In weaving there is a system of deductions.

2607. For what purpose—for defective work ?—Nearly every piece of tweed or cloth that is woven requires a certain amount of darning, and many firms allow so many hours for darning a piece ; the darner, after she has used the hours allowed, is paid by time ; anything over the amount of time allowed to her is paid by the weaver.

2608. That is the weaver who works at the loom and produces the piece ?—Yes.

2609. Then there is another person who has to darn, to pick up short stitches or anything of that sort ?—Yes.

2610. Then if she has too much darning to do that is treated as a fine upon the original worker ?—Yes, the original worker will pay the darner the amount per hour that she receives for darning over a certain amount.

2611. Now the whole of that system assumes that, to begin with, there would not be perfection in the weaving ?—Yes.

2612. That some darning would be required ?—Some darning is supposed to be required.

2613. Is that practice universal ?—Yes, I think we may say it is universal.

2615. They are as highly paid as the damask weavers almost ?—Yes, I think so.

2616. Then the amount of deductions ?—The amount of deduction would depend on the length of time taken in darning.

2617. But take some cases that you have had experience of ?—I have known cases in which there was ten hours of extra darning paid for by the weaver at 4d. an hour.

2618. That is 3s. 4d., off a wage of 15s. or 16s. ?—Yes.

2619. Is that system acquiesced in by the workers. I suppose it has grown up in the course of a long period of years ?—Yes, it has been very general. It is not done to any great extent in any of the factories ; they all have the same system of doing it, but many of them are much better than their contracts about it.

2620. Can you tell me any factories whch practically dispense with it, or have you any such cases in you, mind ?—I have a note of one factory where they adhere to the system, but one only found in going through the records two deductions in almost twelve months, and these were each 6d.

2621. That is substantially free from it ?—Yes.

2622. I may take it that that is a good high-class factory ?—It is a good factory ; it is not an outstanding factory in other ways.

2623. Is the supervision of it good ?—Yes, I think so.

2624. You might give us that name ?—That is T. 10. I think that is the name now.

2625. Then they have a system grading from that down to the pretty bad ones, where there is a lot of deductions ?—In relation to the wages, there is not any, I think, in Galashiels which I know best where they have frequent heavy deductions ; these do not seem necessary ; they do not seem called for by the work. The system is to keep a book of all the extra darning that is required, and one finds that the allowance of time for darning, if it is five hours for a piece, or something of that kind, nearly always covers the requirement.

2626. Do you find that this system is approved by the workers in Galashiels ?—No, they complain of it very much.

2627. Do they attribute the extra darning sometimes also to the raw material not having been quite up to the mark ?—Yes and they feel very strongly that very often their pieces are so well woven that they do not require the time that is allowed ; I mean if five hours are allowed, they do many pieces that only take two hours, and they think they should have the benefit of the average.

2628. There is no system of average there ?—No.

2629. Then about that system would you approve of its abolition ?—Yes.

2630. And it would have the same good consequences you think as you mentioned with regard to the other ?—I think so ; they are very careful workers.

2631. Are there fines in these tweed-side factories for other things ?—I have not found deductions there for being late.

2632. There is no such thing ?—No, not to my knowledge.

2633. I need hardly ask you whether these mills are not extremely well conducted ?—Yes, they are good mills. There have been one or two deductions made there for things supplied, but I think in all cases I have been able to get them to give them up.

2634. And have they done so without disadvantage on either side ?—Quite ; I have never heard of any disadvantage.

2635. Indeed, it gives great satisfaction ?—Yes.

2636. You find the workers there very intelligent ?—They are intelligent, and they are very careful workers ; they take a good deal of pride in their work ; they feel the criticism of it that is implied by a fine very much.

2637. Does that exhaust the category of suggestions with regard to the tweed district ?—Yes.

2638. So that substantially your recommendation would result only in this : the abolition of those fines or deductions in the infrequent cases that you have alluded to ?—Yes. I do not know whether I should say this ; I do not know whether it is necessary, because I do not think it exists now at all, but at first when I used to go into the tweed district there was a large system of selling goods to the workers and deducting for their payment from wages.

2639. Is that abolished ?—I think that is abolished. I went into it pretty fully, and I think it is all abolished.

2640. And its abolition has produced much satisfaction ?—Yes.

2641. Then come now to the cotton factories in Lancashire. There are many deductions made there, I believe ?—Yes, I hear of a good many deductions.

2642. Are there disciplinary fines there ?—Yes, one sees the notices up.

2643. For what kind of thing ?—Well, for being late, in the first place ; there are fines for cleaning and fines (one I noticed the other day) for letting any weft fall out of a box, 1s. fine.

2644. Have you got any list of these ?—I am afraid I have not here ; one could not investigate them.

2645. If you could possibly supply us with any list we should be glad ?—Yes, I think I could ; of course, one cannot investigate them ; I know about them, because I have seen the notices up, and I have a good many complaints about them, but at present we have no power to intervene at all.

2646. That is because they are in writing ?—No, it is because the cotton manufacturers of Lancashire have got an exemption.

2647. Now just explain that to us ?—There is an exemption granted by the Secretary of State to the cotton manufacturers in Lancashire and Cheshire.

2648. You refer, do you, to Section 9 of the Act of 1896 ?—Yes, that is the section giving power to the Secretary of State to exempt.

2649. The section gives power to the Secretary of State "if satisfied that the provisions of this Act are unnecessary for the protection of the workmen." Now I want your opinion about that. Do you think that the provisions of the Act of 1896 are unnecessary in the case of these exempted districts. No, I do not think so.

2650. You still think these workmen require the protection of the Act of 1896 ?—Yes.

2651. I want you please to give me that more fully ?—I find that in Lancashire in cotton factories there is a very systematic fining and charges—fining for bad work, and charges for a great many things; fines for being late, fines for all sorts of little omissions in their work, and charges for such things as cut carrying—that is carrying cuts from the weaving shed to the warehouse—charges for cleaning and charges for food supply and things of that kind. It is done on quite a systematic basis.

Miss M. Paterson.

5 July 1906.

2652. What is the system?—There is as a rule a notice put up about it, and the fines are heavy and are enforced systematically from week to week—not just occasionally.

2653. How are the wages there; do they earn as much in wages as the tweed workers or the damask workers that you have referred to?—Yes, I should think they do.

2654. About 15s. or 16s. a week?—Yes, and often more than that.

2655. What do these fines and deductions amount to in your experience in a week?—It is very difficult to say, they vary so greatly.

2656. But it might be 2s. or 3s.?—Yes, it might be 2s. or 3s.

2657. Is that a cause of dissatisfaction?—Yes, I have constantly appeals from workers about that.

2658. Is that an organised trade?—Yes.

2659. Do you happen to know why no representation has been made to the Secretary of State, who has power under Section 9 to amend or revoke any such order. Let me put it in this way. That system goes on because it has been exempted from the operation of the Act by the Secretary of State; but the Secretary of State has power under Section 9, Subsection 2, "At any time to amend or revoke such order." Has there been any agitation to ask the Home Secretary to amend or revoke that order?—Not to my knowledge.

2660. Can you explain why that has not been done?—No, I cannot.

2661. Suppose Parliament stepped in and revoked all that, and made them fall under the general law, do you think it would be to the advantage of all concerned?—I think so.

2662. Is that system in these exempted districts general—I mean the system of fining and deductions?—My inspection in Lancashire has hardly covered enough of the factories for me to say. I find it very common and very much complained of, for instance, in Bolton. I heard much less of it in Preston, and of course it is not one of the things that come into the region of inspection because it is exempted.

2663. You have sufficient knowledge at all events to say that complaints reach you?—Yes.

2664. Then in the wearing apparel trades in Manchester, you say there is a system of compulsory purchase of damaged goods?—Yes.

2665. There is great diversity of practice there?—Yes.

2666. Are there heavy deductions made there sometimes from slender wages?—Yes, sometimes the deductions are very heavy, if one takes the wages into account.

2667. Could you give us any helpful figures about that. Take the wages to begin with?—There is a case—I cannot call it a heavy deduction in itself, but it was a deduction that pressed very heavily on a child. This was a case only last week in a skirt-making factory. A little girl of fourteen was engaged in doing machining for the upper parts of skirts; she got for doing this ½d. each; the thing was in six seams, besides a seam round the top at the waist part; she got ½d. each for doing these things, given out in threes. Some damage happened to half of one, that is to say a sixth part of the whole skirt, and she had 1½d. fine. It was a small fine in itself, but it represented what she was going to have for the whole work on three of them. She had only been two months at work, having worked one month without any wages at all.

2668. What was her wage at this time?—She was a pieceworker. That one day (it was a Monday) she got six of these things to do; her wage for that day was 3d. and she had 1½d. taken off that.

2669. Did you take any action about that?—I threatened a prosecution and as a matter of fact it was not kept off; but it had been written down and handed to her before my visit, that she would have to pay that fine.

2670. That is a small instance, but is that an instance of a large system?—Yes, that is a type of a very general system in Manchester.

2671. 3d. a day is a very small wage, of course?—Yes, on one or two days she earned more. I think she might earn about 4s. in the week.

2672. Now do the workers complain very bitterly about this system of deductions?—Yes. In nearly all of these clothing factories the actual deduction presses less heavily upon the actual worker because of the system of raffling. It is almost universal in factories of that kind that where the worker damages some work she buys it and raffles it.

2673. She is compelled to buy it?—Yes; she is given the work, and then raffles it amongst her fellow-workers. In some factories there is quite a system of raffling: there are raffles every week as a rule.

2674. Do you approve of that system?—I think it is a bad system apart from the fine, the deduction from the wage.

2675. You mean it is not auctions; it is literally raffles; that is to say they stake a penny or two, or 6d. or so?—Yes, generally a penny.

2676. And take their chance of getting a damaged skirt for it?—Yes.

2677. Is that general?—It is very general.

2678. Then with regard to charges for deductions for things provided by the employer?—Charges or deductions for things provided by the employer in relation to the work make it difficult for the worker to estimate at all correctly what her wage will amount to, even where she knows exactly her piecework rate. Needles, sewing cotton and silk, power, machine straps, and other machine parts, oil, overalls, cleaning, are all charged under this section, and make the price list misleading, especially to inexperienced workers.

2679. That is your experience?—Yes.

2680. Do you think that with regard to those things there should be a system under which the worker should know her net wage to begin with?—Yes.

2681. Should know exactly where she stands?—Yes.

2682. And then that the cost of the establishment should include the power, machine straps and oil, and all the apparatus?—I think so.

2683. Do you think that waste would be incurred to the factory if that were done?—No. I do not hear of it in the very large number of factories where they do not make these charges.

2684. Do you know of cases where they have been abolished?—Yes; I do not know whether I could name any factory at this minute, but I know that they have been abolished in a number of Glasgow factories.

2685. And with satisfactory results?—Quite. I have heard no complaint of waste.

2686. They have been perfectly pleased with the result?—Yes.

2687. Assume the system kept up—in fact take your present experience—is it practically impossible with your present powers under the Statute, to ascertain whether or not those things have been overcharged?—I think it is impossible.

2688. You have all those difficulties as to fair and reasonable and so on?—Yes.

2689. All these calculations had to be made, and under the Statute you have the onus of proving that they are unfair and unreasonable?—Yes.

2690. And you find that result, as you say, in practically an impossible situation?—Yes.

2691. Now tell me about deductions for sick clubs. Have you had grievances brought before you about that?—Yes.

2692. What is the nature of those grievances?—The want of organisation of the sick clubs. There have been two special cases lately in which sick clubs have been in the hands of the manager of a factory, who took all the trouble about them and did all the work, and where they have collapsed on the manager leaving. In one of the cases, a large biscuit factory employing, I think, about 200 girls——

2693. Was that in Glasgow?—In Edinburgh; there was a deduction of 3d. weekly. The manager had that entirely in his own control, and some little time ago he left; he got another position and left there, leaving them £5 to the good, which was in the hands of one of the clerks. Then it was found that there had never been any banking account at all, but that he had simply had this money and that there was £17 of debt. The girls wrote to me about it. There were many girls there who had been paying for eleven or twelve years and had not needed the help of the club. I found on going into the accounts that the manager had been very generous in giving wedding presents to girls who left to be married; he had given them on a far more lavish scale than the funds permitted; also payments to girls who left, if they left for any other cause than being dismissed, and the result was that there was only £5. The firm had been told by me some time before that they could not have anything of this kind on a compulsory basis, and they understood that when the control was in the hands of the manager it became practically compulsory; the girls could not incur the risk of his disapproval by not joining, and the girls I suppose might have been called upon to pay up; but the firm subscribed something, and the doctors whose accounts were outstanding agreed to forego part, and it just came to an end.

2694. That was one case; I think you said you had another?—Yes, another was in a rubber factory where there were about 800 girls who also paid 3d. a week.

2695. Was that in Edinburgh?—Yes. There the manager also took all the responsibility. The money that he got, which was collected by the forewoman on pay day, was given to the firm, who paid a rate of interest for the loan of it, but otherwise contributed nothing and took no part in it. There were things in it that were felt to be very unfair. Any worker who had to leave because of work being slack, whether if she left for that reason or was sent away to take a holiday, if she took other employment even for a week or two, her right to be a member of it lapsed and she had to re-join and pay for six months again before she could be eligible for any benefit.

2696. Was that a condition of employment?—No, it was not, it was left to the manager; the firm took no responsibility about it; but the manager for some reason was very convinced of it being a useful thing, and he had his own views about things; he left the firm and I could find nothing out about it after he had left; it simply collapsed.

2697. Now suppose workers had entered there and said: "No, we do not want to join this sick club." Would they have been free to say so?—They would have been free there. It used to be compulsory in both these cases, but I had told them it must not be compulsory. They would have been free to do it, but it would have taken more courage than I think the girls could be expected to have. They practically all did join.

2698. Have you known any cases where there have been joint committees of employers and employed to arrange about these sick clubs?—I do not think I know any.

2699. Does that occur to you as a good system?—Well, the system of sick clubs appeals to me much more, quite detached from the factory; I think they ought to get all the benefits they want by joining other clubs in the ordinary way—keeping it quite apart from the employment.

2700. Then the tendency of these voluntary clubs inside a firm, so to speak, more particularly if they are under the charge of any servant of the firm, like the manager, is that they become practically compulsory, although voluntary to start with?—Quite so.

2701. Now I think you find deductions also for rent?—Yes.

2702. That is permissible of course under the Statute?—Yes.

2703. Have you anything to say with regard to that?—I think the only thing is that sometimes I have found deductions made for rent from workers who were not responsible for the rent; I mean a deduction made from a girl's wage for the rent of a house really rented by her father.

2704. Of course that ought to be stopped, if possible?—Yes.

2705. Then, is there evasion of the Truck Act in your opinion sometimes by wages being reduced temporarily?—Yes, I have found that in three cases in my recent experience. One was a factory in Liverpool where there was a very unreasonable system of fining—very heavy fines—and on calling attention to it and requiring it to be stopped, the occupier substituted a notice stating that any workers who incurred any of what had been fines would be dismissed and allowed the option of re-engaging themselves at a reduced rate.

2706. You say that that is an evasion of the Truck Act?—Yes.

2707. Have you any way in which we could hit it?—On instructions I treated it as an evasion or contravention of the Truck Act, and the employer substituted a third notice in which he simply said he would dismiss them. He told me that he meant to do the same thing, only he did not need to say it on his notice. The present position is that he paid up all the deductions from wages that had been made for three months back to the girl, and it stands there now.

2708. Have you cases of dismissal with the punishment operating in this way, that there is a re-engagement at a lower rate of wages?—Yes.

2709. Then do you know cases of heavy deductions for waste?—Yes, one finds that in some of the piecework trades. I have mentioned the toy balloon trade. There the balloon goes through a great number of hands, chiefly little girls; there are six or seven processes. The work is counted or weighed, sometimes one, sometimes the other. The only process in which there is any waste made is the last process, when the balloons, after being finished, are blown up with little bellows fixed on them; a very large proportion of them burst. There is no suggestion that it is the workers' fault that they burst; they do burst to as much as half the number, especially in some conditions of weather. But the workers who have made the balloons, the workers who have worked the beating machine, the workers who have vulcanised them in bi-sulphate of carbon, are mostly little girls, and the deductions come out at the end, not for what they have done, but in consequence of the bursting of the balloons; so that they all suffer for this unavoidable waste at the end.

2710. You say they suffer; that is to say that the mode of computation of the wages is the finished product?—The finished product all through.

2711. That is a curious kind of piecework?—Yes.

2712. Do you mean that atmospheric changes might, for instance, alter these girls' wages?—Not the rate of wages, but in certain conditions of the weather, the amount, at least so I am told.

2713. I admit not the rate, but the atmospheric changes to which you have referred might result in giving them a smaller or a larger wage?—Yes, the proportion of good balloons at the end of the blowing up process is smaller or larger according to the weather.

2714. Then the children can never say what is to be their wage at a week's end?—No.

2715. Now, do deductions and charges press very heavily on the young worker?—I think so.

2717. Are deductions made even from the work of young people who are learning a trade?—Yes, that I found very frequently in Manchester, more than any other place I know of.

2718. Do you think these deductions might be removed with advantage?—Yes, I think so very strongly.

2719. And if they were removed, you think that much njustice would be removed with them?—Yes.

2720. Injustice and uncertainty?—Yes, and dissatisfaction generally in the factories—friction of all kinds.

Miss M. Paterson.

5 July 1906.

2721. Then as to these disciplinary fines that you have spoken of. They are not generally considered necessary, I believe, in factories where there is good supervision?—I think not. They take the place of supervision.

2722. Now, I want specially to ask you with regard to the cases in Shetland. You refer there, I think, to the 10th section of the Act of 1887: "Where articles are made by a person at his own home or otherwise without the employment of any person under him except a member of his own family, the provisions of this Act shall apply as if he were a workman." You refer to the Shetland shawls?—Yes, they work in shawls and hosiery; it differs from the Irish work as far as I know it in the fact that the work is not given out to them. They are nearly all people who have some sheep, and, of course the feature of the Shetland shawls is that they are made of actual Shetland wool, so that they grow their own wool; they have their own few sheep, or they might get it from a neighbour, but they do not get it from anyone giving out work, they do not get it from a shop or an agent. They card it and spin it themselves and knit it and then sell it. As a matter of fact they barter it generally for goods.

2723. They are not paid in money?—They are not; the system there is to pay them in goods or else put it against their account. I think one would find that if they demanded money they could get it, but they are not paid at the same rate in money as they are in goods. For instance, they pay there very frequently in tea. The shawl industry goes to provide the family in tea. If the worker were going to get a pound of tea priced at 2s. and she said, "Give me some money for it," because she needed some money for rates or something of that kind, then she would get 1s. 6d. There are cases I am told in which some merchants only give 1s. 4d., but I did not find any myself.

2724. Have you found 1s. 6d. cases?—Yes, I had a long conversation with a man at a general shop who does a great deal about this; he was quite frank about it all. He said that that was the system; that he would give 1s. 6d. or a pound of 2s. tea. At the same time he said to me: "I would never take work again from a woman who asked for money except I knew she wanted it for something special. There are times when there are rates to pay, or the doctor to pay, or something like that."

2725. Had you any jurisdiction in those cases?—Yes.

2726. In what way?—I think the Act of 1831 applies to it.

2727. That was for contracts for hiring, you mean?—Section 10 of the Act of 1887 says that the principal Act shall apply as if he were a worker.

2728. That is right; "and the shopkeeper, dealer, or person by whom he is employed." That gives you jurisdiction?—Yes. I think in the next paragraph it points out that there must not be more than £5 involved in the transaction altogether.

2729. That is exactly the Shetland case?—Yes, it is generally a few shillings.

2730. Now, is the result of your evidence that this section has been inoperative in Shetland?—Yes.

2731. Notwithstanding this statutory enactment this thing goes on?—Yes, it is inoperative—quite admitted to be inoperative in the inquiries I was able to make elsewhere.

2732. How could you get at that? Could you prosecute in any such case?—No, not then. I was in Shetland entirely for the purpose of the herring fishing, and it was only incidentally that I could give any time to it. I was not there for the purpose of inquiring into the shawl industry, and I could only do it by seeing some shopkeepers and workers occasionally and getting information. I just happened to see two transactions.

2733. Are you referring to Lerwick?—Most of my time I was in Baltasound, which is the furthest north part, and there the people were all in connection with fishing.

2734. But were these shops that gave the tea in Baltasound?—Yes, and in Lerwick too. In Lerwick the hosiery people who have shops for the tourists and so on all keep tea, simply for the purpose of paying the hosiery knitters, who do not buy hosiery; they keep tea there.

2735. Have you any opinion upon this point. Is the tea business a source of profit in the way of giving to the workers a payment which results in their getting less in the cost value of the tea than they would have got in money. Have I made myself clear to you?—I think it is clear; you mean whether the tea was worth the 2s.

2736. No, I mean more than that. I say assume that the merchant buys his tea at 1s. 3d.; you say that he sells it to the worker at 2s., but if the worker asks money he gets only 1s. 6d. Now, I put it to you, do you not think there must be a profit any way in it?—I should think there must be a profit to the merchant any way.

2737. That even although it was only 1s. 6d. in coin that the worker was entitled to, and even although she got the bonus of getting 2s. tea, still it was tea which only cost the merchant 1s. 3d.?—Yes. The merchant whom I had an opportunity of speaking to about it never suggested that he lost money if he paid in money, and it seems unlikely that he would; it would be rather contrary to his nature I should think.

2738. Then is there any bargain for money in those cases?—The workers now seem never to ask for money unless at the same time they can say that they must have a certain amount of money to pay some special thing. The workers are very largely in debt to the merchants.

2739. Have you any opinion as to that system being good or bad?—I think it is a very bad system.

2740. It might result of course in placing these workers at the mercy of these shopkeepers?—Yes, that is what it seems to do in fact.

2741. Have you seen the workers in their own homes?—Yes, a good deal.

2742. Are they in humble circumstances?—Yes, they are poor.

2743. They are pretty well housed, are they not?—Well, compared with the western Highlands of Scotland, I should say the Shetland houses are fairly good.

2744. They have patches of land and they have little Shetland sheep?—Yes, the land is mostly peat.

2745. And they have ponies?—There are a good many ponies, but they now almost all belong, at least in the northern island, to one man, a Shetlander, who also carries on a very large system of trading with the people. He has a good many shops and owns fishing boats, and so on.

2746. We are rather anxious to get your idea as to what could be done to stop that system. In the first place, would it be an advantage, do you think, to this humble class of workers if they were paid, as of right, in coin?—Yes, I think it would.

2747. How can you stop the existing system, do you think?—I do not know what effect taking proceedings in some cases might have. One merchant in particular said to me that the system was much more extensive than I knew of; that as a matter of fact he could hardly stop it unless it were stopped at the same time on a big scale; that his transactions with the people who supplied him with goods were carried on in the same way with the Glasgow merchants and so on—that he paid them in Shetland goods also. But, of course, the transactions then would be very different.

2748. There would not be the statutory limit of £5?—Yes; he said it was a deeply involved system, that it went right through Shetland trading altogether.

2749. I do not want to suggest any laxity about the department, but why have not you had a prosecution in these cases?—I do not know, except in my own experience, which was last year, that I could only get away at the time for three weeks, and I was sent up to inquire into the fishing industry. That I reported on pretty fully.

2750. Does it occur to you that the language of the statute is defective? The 1887 Act appears to cover the very thing you have been describing?—Yes. I do not think it was suggested that it was impossible to take proceedings, if one could get evidence.

2751. But one knows about this class of people; they are highly respectable and intelligent people, and with a great deal of independence about them. You do not suggest, do you, that there would be any practical difficulty in getting evidence ?—I think there would be to some extent the same difficulty that we have found in Ireland.

By Mrs. Tennant.

2752. I gather that you have received complaints from Lancashire weavers about fines. Do you think that those complaints indicate any change of opinion on their part, or do you think that the women who made those complaints have always desired the application of the 1896 Act. Do you happen to know if they were Trade Unionists and parties to the objection that was made on their behalf ?—I have found women who did not know anything about it, who did not know until I told them that I had no power in the matter ; I found that even with women who were connected with trade unions ; there was one woman who was on the committee of a trade union, and she had not known anything about it.

2753. Did you happen to find any who really were parties to the desire to be exempted and who had now changed their minds ?—I do not think so. A woman said to me, just recently, " If we had known as much then as we know now, we would never have asked to be exempted," but I did not question her about who " we " were, or that sort of thing. She was only taking the view, which I found very common, that it was a mistake asking for the exemption.

2754. At any rate, the objection in Lancashire was to regulation of fines ?—Yes.

2755. Have you any experience of the feeling in Lancashire as to the abolition of the fines ?—Just from individuals ; I do not think from organisations, but from individuals I have.

2756. It is very conceivable that an organisation or an individual who would object to regulation would welcome abolition ?—Yes, I think so.

2757. I mean, they would object really on the grounds which were stated to you in Scotland ?—Yes that it institutes a system.

By Mr. Ramsay MacDonald.

2758. With reference to those exempted cotton districts, have you had any experience of the opinion of the men ?—I have heard very little of it since the exemption, very little at first hand.

2759. You do not know if they share in the regrets of the women that the districts have been exempted by the Order of 1897 ?—No, I have heard opinions quoted, but not really at first hand.

2760. Had you any experience of the districts at the time the Order was issued ?—Yes.

2761. Why was it exactly that that occurred ?—Well, there was a good bit of dissatisfaction with the terms of the Truck Act, and I gathered then that the unions thought they could make better terms with the employers.

2762. And the Order was issued with the concurrence of the men's union as well as of the masters ?—I think the men's unions—the weavers unions, which includes women as well—applied also. It was chiefly, I think, at their request that the Order was made.

2763. With reference to Dunfermline, you mentioned that fining in certain firms, particularly in two, was common. Could you give us any idea what the gross amount of the fines levied in either one or the other of those two firms amounts to per annum ?—No, I could not.

2764. Is it a substantial sum at all ? For instance, you mentioned that the fines in one of the Galashiels works amounted to about 5s., I was not quite sure if you meant per week or per annum ?—In the case of the Glasgow firm where I mentioned that they were paying £300 a week in wages, it was 5s. per week.

2765. Take the Dunfermline case ; was the gross amount, do you think, a substantial sum. I am referring to those two firms that you had specially in mind as being bad ?—I am afraid I have never ascertained what the amount was per annum ; only that, taking any given week in which I was inquiring, one found heavy fines.

2766. I would like to know whether you think that a substantial injustice is done. Apart from anything else but justice, is a substantial injustice done to workers in firms like those two that you have in mind, by having a system of fining imposed upon them ?—Meaning specially deductions for bad work ?

2767. Yes, fines and deductions ?—I think so. I think the things that happen among workers such as the Dunfermline workers really are rather inevitable accidents that happen to the most careful person once in a while, and which the firm might be expected to stand.

2769. I will put it in another way Is the actual difference between working for one of the good firms, the firms that you have named, and working for one of the bad firms, one of the two firms which you had in mind, but which you have not named—is that difference a very substantial one ?—No.

2770. It really does not amount to very much ?—It does not amount to very much; they are very good workers

2771. So that if the two firms that are fining dropped their fining it would not amount to very much ?—It would not amount to a very large sum.

2772. Either to the workers or to the firm themselves ?—No, I should think not.

2773. And, consequently, you do not think that really it would be any substantial injustice to them if legislation was passed making it impossible for them to impose these fines ?—I do not think it would be any substantial injustice to anyone.

2774. You said that you prosecuted a Dunfermline firm under the Truck Act ?—Yes.

By the Chairman.

2775. Will you give us the name of that firm ?—That was Henry Reid & Sons.

By Mr. Ramsay MacDonald.

2776. What was the point of your prosecution ?—It was really a compulsory sale. I think it was treated as being a sale of work—the worker having to buy damaged goods.

2777. What was the result of it ?—The result was very unsatisfactory. It was dismissed on relevancy. It is very likely to happen in the case of informations in Scotland, which is part of the process in Scotland much more than in England ; they are very complicated, and it is very easy to find objections to relevancy.

2778. It was a technical point ?—It was a technical point, and the case never came to trial.

2779. It was not a case of breakdown of the law as it stands ?—No, it was an irrelevancy objected to by the advocate who appeared for the defendant company, and it was upheld by the sheriff.

2780. It throws no light upon amendment of legislation ?—No.

2781. Then you refer to bonuses. Do these bonuses vary ? That is to say, in some firms it may be 2s., in another firm 1s. 6d., and in another firm 1s. ?—Yes. Sometimes they have a relation to the output and sometimes they are just a certain fixed amount.

2782. You mean that the bonus varies according to scale of the output ?—Yes.

2783. If the output is A the bonus will be A ; if the output is B the bonus will be B, varying directly with the output ?—Yes.

2784. Then the things are paid for over and above a certain fixed weekly wage. I am thinking of time workers, not pieceworkers, for the moment ?—Yes.

2785. Do you find bonuses paid in the case of time workers ?—Yes.

2786. Now, in the case of time workers only—is there very much difference in the fixed wage plus the bonus in various firms when the bonus is varying. I mean, where your bonus is small, is your fixed wage larger, so that the wage plus the small bonus is equal to the small wage plus the larger bonus between two firms?—Well, it is difficult to have much more than an impression about that, but my impression is that the wages, whichever way they reckon them, work out about the same.

Miss M. Paterson.

5 July 1906.

2787. I will put it in this way: that wages plus bonus, however large or small the bonus may be, as a matter of fact, work out to a pretty steady average district wage; a standard wage for the district?—Yes.

2788. That the standard wage, the fixed wage, is sometimes large comparatively and sometimes small comparatively, and that the bonus varies inversely?—Yes. Bonuses in Scotland at any rate are much more common in relation to a piece rate.

2789. I was coming to that. How does that apply to piecework?—I have a factory in mind where they make paper-bags. There is a fixed pay for a certain output per week. A girl has to turn out a certain amount of work for 8s. a week; then anything else she does is paid at a piece rate with a bonus of 1s.

2790. There is a standard output, and over and above that standard output the bonus system operates?—Yes.

2791. Is that standard output calculated as the possible output of an average worker?—No; in this particular case they almost universally would have earned the bonus, if it were not kept off for all sorts of trifling things.

2792. So that really in the case of a worker, whether he is a piecework working for bonus or a time worker working for bonus, the wage plus bonus is really the standard wage?—Quite so.

2793. And experience shows that, as a matter of fact, so far as legislative enactment is concerned, we ought to assume that the fixed wage, plus the bonus, is really the wage?—Yes.

2794. And that any playing with the bonus is really playing with part of the wage?—Yes, it is a form of fine.

2795. Then with reference to Galashiels. I want to be quite clear about the position of these darners. You say that the employers pay the darners for a certain part of work, or for a certain time, but that if that time is exceeded by the necessities of the case, then the person responsible for the weaving of the cloth which has got to be darned longer than is provided for by the employer is responsible for the extra time required?—Yes.

2796. Do you find any variation in that time in the various factories?—Yes.

2797. One employer allowing, say, five hours, another employer four hours only, and so on?—Yes.

2798. So that the amount of deduction that the workers in various factories have got to submit to, varies with the factories?—Yes, and of course the different classes of work done in a factory.

2799. Is that owing simply to the different class of worker, or is it owing to what you might call differences in hardness of employment?—That is difficult for me to say, but I think it is both. There are some firms who enforce the thing much more rigidly; these are usually the firms who allow the least time for darning.

2800. You suggested to the Chairman that the amount of legitimate time required for darning upon each piece was assessed; you said that the workers objected because if, say, five hours were allowed for one piece and only two hours were necessary, they were not credited with the three hours?—Yes.

2801. Then is this darning done per piece or per gross output?—It is done sometimes one way and sometimes the other, curiously enough. Sometimes the darner is paid a time wage, sometimes she is paid by the piece.

2803. In spite of the possible variation—in spite of the theoretical variation that may take place?—Any charge made for darning does really reduce the wage that amount for that week. I mean you will find 2s. taken off for the extra darning.

2804. Let me put it in this way: suppose this darning charge was illegal; would that lead to a reduction of wages?—Oh no.

2805. You do not think it would?—No.

2806. Because then the master would average it up for himself?—Just so.

2807. In other words, I suppose if we regard this darning charge as a sort of on-cost on the industry, we would not be very far out. It occupies pretty much the same relation as machinery and standing room?—Yes. It is not very often made. I cannot say that it would make any appreciable difference except it led to careless work, and that I am sure it would not do, and no employer suggests that it would.

By the Chairman.

2808. Or waste of material?—Or waste of material.

By Mr. Ramsay MacDonald.

2809. Now, with reference to Lancashire, I think you said you could give us a list of the fines exhibited in some of those factories?—Yes.

2810. Could you also give us a list from your own experience, not of the fines exhibited in any one factory, but fines that you know are imposed?—You mean in the cotton factories?

2811. Yes?—I fancy it would be very difficult because they do not give them any note in writing that one could get hold of.

2812. But I mean fines that you know are imposed in your own experience?—The kinds of fines that are imposed are fines for being late; those are fairly heavy; fines for leaving work, leaving the looms too long; fines for being absent; fines for failing to send a notice within a specified time when they are absent, and that kind of thing.

2813. Would it make very much difference if this Order of 1897 were withdrawn; all those fines would be perfectly legal, would they not?—I think some of them would be unduly high.

2814. Then it would be simply that they would have the protection of fair and reasonable?—They would have the protection of fair and reasonable, and I think there are some things that one would question their being fined for at all under the Truck Act; some fines, I mean, made in certain factories.

2815. Could you give us an example?—They pretty often put up the notice that any workers who are found by the factory inspector working during meal hours will have to pay any fine imposed on the firm.

2816. Do you think that illegal?—I think that would probably be an illegal fine.

2817. Could you give us another example?—There are fines, for instance, for carrying too much weft in a tin; that is supposed to lead to the losing of the weft—to its getting on the floor and getting lost.

2818. Could not that be made a disciplinary fine quite legally?—I think it might, but it would perhaps be a little difficult for the employer to show that it might cause any loss or damage.

2819. But you have some difficulty, have you not, in recalling to your memory any fines that you have seen stuck up which would not be legal under the Truck Act even if this order of 1897 had not been issued—with, perhaps, the exception of fairness and reasonableness?—There are heavy charges in Lancashire for cleaning. I do not think that it has ever been tested whether that is a permissible charge.

2820. You would test it for the amount, not for the legality of the fine?—We might test it for the legality of the fine—whether charging the workers for cleaning a factory or part of a factory was legal.

2821. With reference to Shetland, you say that no prosecutions have been taken?—Some years ago there was a prosecution undertaken by the Public Prosecutor, or the Procurator Fiscal; and there was a conviction, I understand; but I could not get much information about it from him and it is admitted to have had no effect on the system; it has not been followed up.

2822. Now, two men assistant inspectors went up to Shetland, did they not, for the purpose of investigating outwork—one from Glasgow and one from Aberdeen?—I do not know about that. I know that the inspectors have been up there during the fish curing.

2823. But especially for this bartering under this section that you have quoted?—I know there have been inquiries made. My colleague in Aberdeen has talked to me about the question.

2824. But you do not know what has been the result of those investigations?—I have not seen any report from them.

2825. And you do not know if any modification in practice has taken place. You were there last year, I think, were you?—Yes.

2826. Then you would know?—I do not think there has been anyone there since or for some time.

By Mr. Brotherton.

2827. You receive complaints from the workers. I would be interested to know how these are usually brought to your notice?—In many forms; I would say by letter is the more general form.

2828. They get your address from the notices outside the factory possibly, and they communicate with you at that address?—Yes, that very often, and very often in the factories—in all sorts of ways.

2829. It would be rather interesting to me to know if you have any suggestions as to how you might be in easy communication with the workers; you are in communication with them, but I would rather put it that they might be in easy communication with you, and that they might know that they are invited to inquire from you as to the points that trouble them?—That has often been discussed. It is rather difficult, because of the workers not reading notices that are put up in the factory unless they are very prominent. I think at times there have been paragraphs put in the newspapers drawing the attention of workers to the existence of factory inspectors; I do not know that it has been done in the case of women inspectors, but notices have been inserted that the resident man inspector was at his office address at such and such a place and at certain hours to see anyone.

2830. You quite agree that it is desirable that the workers should know that you are easy of access?—I think so.

2831. And any complaints they may feel aggrieved over, you would confer with them or they would confer with you?—Yes, I think that is very important.

2832. Do employers appear to give any clear and easily understood record of fines or deductions that is available for you?—Where there is a system of systematic fining there is usually a record kept of the fines made under Section 1 of the Truck Act, which is all that they are required to do.

2833. That is obligatory?—That is obligatory, and many employers will show their wages book, which would show the deductions made under the other sections as well.

2834. Your experience is that you have no trouble in obtaining information from employers as to deductions that may have been complained of by the employees?—Oh yes, I have had trouble.

2835. Perhaps you would have some suggestion to make as to how those could be made easier for access to you?—Under the present Act, you mean—supposing the present state of things continues?

2836. Or suggestions in any direction you like?—Of course, if there were no fines or deductions, there would be no record, but suppose the present state of things continues it is very unfortunate in enforcing the administration of the Act that there is no record necessary of fines made for damaged work or bad work; it is only disciplinary fines.

2837. Would you suggest that some record might be compulsory on employers?—Yes—that the same record that has to be kept now of disciplinary fines should be kept for the others.

2838. You would widen the range of it?—Yes.

2839. With regard to bonuses, you have mentioned that you consider it is an undesirable method; could you give me any specific case that would show where it has been a hardship or injustice?—It is too free from control altogether. The employer and the worker never really look at it in quite the same way. For instance, in the case of the paper-bag workers that I have mentioned, I found that if there was something wrong with the work the girl was fined—I mean even for being five minutes late in the morning, and that involved a loss of the bonus in addition to the fine; the girl is fined 2d. and loses her 1s. bonus. She thinks she has been fined 1s. 2d.

Miss M. Paterson. 5 July 1906.

2840. She may think that, but it may occur to you that the bonus should be a stimulus to good work and that those who were not late or who did not in any way break the regulations would get the benefit?—Yes, but it is a very severe penalty for breaking any regulation, I think. And then it is looked upon as part of the wages. I should think in every case in which I know of bonuses it is really admitted by the firm or manager to be their way of calculating the wages.

2841. You put it then that instead of being a bonus, that is to say, a free gift for good work, it is a penalty?—It is a penalty.

2842. A method of penalising?—Yes, an easy way of penalising.

2844. Do they approach you, or would the worker approach you?—The Dunfermline union approached me.

2845. Do you invite the unions to approach you, or do you prefer the workers or both?—In Scotland amongst the women workers we have really so few unions that it is much more frequent for the workers to approach me, or I am approached through other organisations—through girls' clubs and different organisations.

2846. If they were further organised would it, do you think, remove many of their grievances and hardships?—I believe in organisation, yes.

2847. As to the disposal of fines and penalties; you will have views on that point. If there are fines inflicted, what should be done with them, should you say?—I do not know that I have much view on that point. I do not think the workers are reconciled any more to a fine (I mean from the worker's point of view) from the fact that it is going to swell their contribution to an infirmary or a hospital.

2848. Or even going among themselves for a holiday fund; that would not reconcile them?—No, I do not find that they have complained less where that has been done.

2849. You mentioned a hardship with regard to a child who made about 3d. a day in making toy balloons, and was fined, I think, 1½d., and you threatened the employer with a prosecution. Could you tell me on what bye-law you were purposing to act?—It has to be stated in a rather complicated way, because of the wording of the Truck Act, but it would be really for making a fine that was not fair and reasonable, taking all the circumstances into account.

2850. It rests with the department, does it, to decide as to fair and reasonable?—No, it rests with the magistrate who hears the case to decide whether it is fair and reasonable.

2851. But what you consider unfair and unreasonable you would refer to the department or to your chief, and then in consultation they would decide whether to proceed further?—Yes.

2852. It came under the heading of fair and reasonable and the employers recognised that?—Yes, at least they did not make the deduction.

2853. Now with regard to sick clubs; you mentioned that they have some disadvantages. They are more or less under the control of employers or firms, and you would have them entirely outside that influence?—I think it would be better.

2854. I point out to you that some employers at least contribute to these sick clubs?—Yes.

2855. In that sense it is an advantage for the sick clubs to be associated with the firms?—I suppose an employer might still contribute in some way; his generosity would not cease.

2856. It need not necessarily, but it usually happens that some control perhaps is desired by those who contribute?—Yes.

2857. I do not know whether it would be going outside the terms of our reference to ask you about this; but you mentioned something about the fishing industry in the Shetlands. You have some special knowldge of the fishing industry. Were there any points with regard to that industry upon which you think this enquiry might bear?—Not to any great extent. I have considered that. Of course, there is the question of the housing by the employers of the workers, and I did consider whether it was of importance in this enquiry, but I hardly think it is.

By Mr. Cawley.

2858. In all cases of fines would you say they are purely for discipline and not for profit; I mean disciplinary fines, that they are not used as a means of making profit by the employer, that they are for what they are supposed to be for, for discipline?—I should think sometimes they are profitable to the employer.

2859. I think you said they do not amount to much as a rule?—They do not amount to any great sum in the aggregate in these big industries.

2860. Then they must be imposed for discipline?—Yes.

2861. Then in your opinion discipline could be equally well preserved if there were no fines, is that so?—Yes.

2862. And you instanced better prospects of advancement?—Yes.

2863. Suppose that had not the necessary effect, then the only end is dismissal. Would you say that it is better for the worker to run the chance of dismissal than he to pay a small fine?—One does not think of the workers individually in the matter. I think it better for a factory of girls that a worker should be dismissed occasionally rather than that continual fines should be made.

2864. But we are on the question, rather, whether it is desirable to have fines altogether or not, and I should like you to tell me if possible whether you consider that it would not be on the whole more against the interests of the workers to only leave one alternative to the master, that is dismissal; whether it would not be better for them to be subject to small fines rather than to have dismissal?—I do not think that he has only that alternative. I think he has the alternative of advancement for the worker who keeps good time; the knowledge of the irregular worker that when a slack time comes she will be reckoned one of the least valued. All that I think tends to discipline.

2865. Take a weaving shed; is there any prospect of advancement for a weaver; he is a weaver always, is not he?—Yes, but there are classes of work as a rule that are better paid; there is better paid and less well paid work and there is the slack times too, though not just now.

2866. But in the weaving sheds they do not dismiss one or two weavers; they generally close the shed?—One very often finds in a weaving shed, I think, a number of looms standing.

2867. Just a word about this Galashiels business. As I understand, this darners' department is a separate department?—Yes.

2868. The weavers get so much wages?—Yes.

2869. Then the wages of the darners are paid for by the masters?—Yes.

2870. A good weaver only perhaps finds that half the time is necessary for the darner to work on the article produced?—Yes.

2871. The weaver who sends out the most perfect piece finds very little work for the darners?—Yes.

2872. The grievance is not from the whole of the weavers but from those weavers who turn out very good work, and therefore the darners have very little to do, and they complain because they think they would have more wages if they were not subject to this charge for darning?—In the Galashiels tweed industry the reason why the workers complain is almost never on account of their having more wages or less wages. I do not think that the amounts matter greatly to these workers. What they do complain of is the injustice of it.

2873. I want to see where the injustice comes in. Does not it seem a fair system to you that the master pays so many darners and then if anybody turns out very bad work indeed they should pay an extra amount for darning?—That darning that the master pays for is not the result of bad work as a rule. It is the darning that he rather recognises as inevitable. I mean, generally in pieces that have to be carefully finished, highly priced cloth, that wants to be very carefully woven, the darning is part of the process really.

2874. There is a darners' department, and all the goods that are woven have to go through that department. Then if there is any bad work indeed extra darning has to be done and the person that has done the bad work has to pay for the extra darning?—Yes.

2875. I want to know where does the injustice come in?—For one thing, it is not a matter of very bad work.

2876. The workers do not pay for the ordinary darning that is part of the factory work?—Yes, but that darning is not done because of bad work.

2877. What I want to get at is, where is the injustice?—There is a certain amount of inevitable risk, I think, in every kind of work. It is not that the Galashiels workers are careless.

2878. I understand that, but they get a certain wages for the woven piece. Then it has to go to another department, that is the darning department?—Yes.

2879. And if they do ordinary decent work they do not get anything deducted. There is no deduction whatever. They get paid up to the time that the piece parts from them; they have nothing to do with any after process; what I want to know is where the injustice comes in?—But what the deduction is for is——

2880. But they have not any deduction, those who do decent work?—They have no complaint. I am only speaking of those who have to pay the darners

2881. That is what I want to get at. I did not quite understand it before. The only people who complain are those that do bad work or have an excessive amount of darning to pay for?—Yes, those that have to pay the darning.

2882. It is not the ordinary darning department?—Yes.

2883. Therefore it comes to this, that it is only when you are incompetent that you have to pay for the darning?—No, I think that is not so.

2884. Is not there ample margin in the darners' department for that. Some do not want it at all?—Yes, but that has to do with a number of things. Something goes wrong with the loom; sometimes there is bad yarn; sometimes there is some other reason for it; it is not a thing that is confined to inexperienced workers or workers with a reputation for carelessness. One finds a worker who has done good work for six months and never required any extra darning, whose work has been, as far as work can be, perfect, and yet something happens; it may be through inadvertence or something of the kind, and she has to pay the darner, and she feels the injustice of that.

2885. She feels the injustice of having to pay for more darning than she is allowed for, because everybody is allowed money for darning?—Yes, but it is admittedly a rough estimate of the average time taken in darning.

2886. Then in the factory that allows the longest time for darning, or allows most wages for the darning department, the weavers have the least grievance?—On the whole, but the work that is being done varies. I have some notes here. In one firm which is doing rather a cheap class of work, they only allow one hour and a half for darning. Then the firm I have referred to already allows four hours for darning each piece. Another firm I have here allows six hours for darning.

2887. Then what is your suggestion?—I think that the darning might very well just form part of the manufacturing process.

2888. You mean the darning department should be part of the factory and not have any regulations about what amount of bad work goes out or not?—Yes.

By Mr. Delevingne.

2889. You said you had come across, both in Scotland and in Manchester, cases of workers being compelled to buy damaged goods. You mentioned one prosecution in Dunfermline. Have you had any prosecutions in Manchester ?—Not in Manchester, but in Blackburn.

2890. Successfully ?—Yes.

2891. The present Act, then, is sufficient to deal with that class of offence ?—It was in that case. There was a conviction and penalties, and no appeal was brought against it.

2892. You do not suggest that the present Act is insufficient to deal with that class of offence ?—No; it is not insufficient. A great deal, of course, depends on the magistrates, and the want of definition.

2893. You have mentioned cases where deductions are made from wages for damage to work that has arisen from causes beyond the workers' control. You mentioned, I think, cases of the workers complaining that it was not their negligence, but that the yarn was defective ?—Yes.

2894. Have you considered whether you could deal with that under section 2 of the Act of 1896 ? That only allows fines for bad or negligent work by the worker, and provides that the deduction must not exceed the loss caused to the employer by the act or omission of the workman. In these cases prima facie, there is no "act or omission" on the part of the worker ?—There is the difficulty of proof. By the time one could take any proceedings of that kind, the work has gone beyond one's recalling it to see it. For instance, in cotton weaving the damaged piece is away; it has left the factory; it cannot be traced. One has the worker's evidence, and probably the evidence of other workers, that there has been a great deal of bad yarn and that it has been very difficult to work at all because of the bad yarn, but that is the kind of case that is very difficult to sustain in court.

2895. Suppose Parliament put on the employer instead of upon you the onus of proving that there had been actual neglect or default on the part of the worker, would that help at all ?—That is the difficulty one is always in in a case of that kind, that one has to call the worker almost to directly controvert the word of her employer.

2896. That you have to do in any case now ?—Not always.

2897. Do you not always call the worker now in such a case ?—Yes, but if the burden of proof was put upon the employer it would alter the relationship a little; the worker would have to come into court and really controvert the employer's evidence much more than she has to do now. He would not necessarily be put against her at all now.

2898. Now take the case of waste in the toy balloon trade. Is that a system of deduction from the wages of the workers for the waste in the blowing, or are the wages of each class of worker proportioned to the number of successful balloons that are finished ?—Yes, the rubber is given out to be done at a certain price; where there is a hundredweight of rubber it will be paid so much; then it is weighed out at the end; it is weighed out at different periods, but it is weighed out at the end.

2899. Then there are no deductions from wages in that case. Each class of worker, I understand, is paid according to the number of successful balloons turned out at the finish of the whole process; but there is no deduction made from the wage of any class of worker for the number of balloons wasted ?—I must explain the work from the beginning. The worker who does the machine work of a thousand balloons knows that she has done that work; she might be paid only for 500 at the end of the operation because something has happened of which she has no knowledge at all.

2900. There is no actual deduction made ? she does not know what she is to be paid for, that is true, because she does not know how many will be successful, but she knows she will be paid for the number of successful balloons made. There is nothing deducted from her nominal wage ?—She has a piece rate for her own work, the beating machine work, say, and she does not get the piecework rate at the end for what she has done.

2901. If it is a deduction, have any proceedings been brought ?—No.

2902. Why not ?—There has been a good deal of difficulty about it just simply because it is involved in that way.

2903. I would rather suggest that this is really a mode of payment of wages ?—That of course, is the firm's view, and that is what puts the difficulty in the way of remedying it.

2904. Has the Particulars Section been extended to that trade ?—No.

2905. Would that meet the difficulty to any extent, do you think ?—I think the Particulars would help.

2906. Just one question on the bonus. I gathered that the bonus in some cases you mentioned was a bonus for extra work turned out beyond a certain minimum output ?—Yes.

2907. But that the bonus was liable to be taken away for some small thing like unpunctuality, and so on ?—Yes.

2908. In those cases the bonus is really actual wage earned for actual work done ?—Yes.

2909. And the withdrawal of the bonus in those cases would be a clear fine, would it not ?—That is not admitted by the firms who do it.

2910. You know of the Irish case brought by Miss Deane ?—Yes.

2911. That is rather different from a case of actual work done for actual wages ?—Yes.

2912. You have not tried any proceedings ?—No. I have been successful sometimes in getting a refund. I have gone on that line a good deal in Scotland because of the difficulty of getting cases through in Court owing to the difficulty of the informations.

2913. It seems to have been a different case from Miss Deane's case ?—Yes, I think so; I do not know the details altogether of Miss Deane's case.

2914. What generally do you think has been the effect of the Act of 1896 ?—I think in some cases it has systematised fines.

2915. You mentioned some cases in which you think it has introduced fines ?—Yes.

2916. But generally as regards the correction of abuses, what has been the effect of the Act of 1896 ?—I think it has left them pretty much where they were.

2917. You do not think any appreciable advance has been made under the Act of 1896 ?—I cannot think of much in my own experience.

2918. Have you any experience of the Shop Clubs Act ?—In connection with the Sick Clubs I have given attention to the Shop Clubs Act, but I have no experience of its working, I mean as a substitute for the sick clubs.

2919. You mentioned a case where deductions were made from the wages of the worker for the rent of somebody else ?—Yes.

2920. That is illegal, is it not ?—That is illegal.

2921. You have been able to put that right ?—Yes, I have been able to have it put right.

By the Chairman.

2922. We have the permission of Mr. Whitelegge, of your department, that you can disclose to us any names. Fortunately we have not had to ask you many names, but there are the names of two firms which perhaps you could give us which continue the system of fines and deductions in Dunfermline ?—The two firms that I have in my mind were Q. and R.

2923. With regard to what you said about raffles. Do the workers get the cost price out of the raffles; I suppose they are raffled at as much as they will bring ?—The worker is told what she will have to pay for the work.

2924. And then she tries to raffle for a little more if possible ?—Yes, she may.

By Mr. Cawley.

2925. Does she get it ?—Perhaps.

THIRTEENTH DAY.

Tuesday, 10th July, 1906.

PRESENT.

The Right Hon. Thomas Shaw, K.C., M.P., Lord Advocate for Scotland (Chairman)

Frederick Maddison, Esq., M.P.
J. Ramsay MacDonald, Esq., M.P.
Mrs. H. J. Tennant.
A. F. Yarrow, Esq.

T. E. Bettany, Esq. (Secretary).

Mr. J. OWNER, was called; and Examined.

Mr. J. Owner.

10 July 1906.

By the Chairman.

2926. Will you just state your position under the Home Office?—I am one of His Majesty's Junior Inspectors of Factories.

2927. Who is your superior officer?—Mr. Gerald Snape in the Bristol district.

2928. How long have you been in the service of the Home Office?—Since the 24th June, 1899.

2929. Your duties generally are the same as that of other inspectors?—Yes.

2930. You attend in particular to complaints with regard to any possible infringements under the Truck Act and under the Factory Acts?—Yes.

2931. What is the district that you have in charge?—I am attached to the Bristol district, which includes Gloucestershire, Somersetshire, and the northern part of Wiltshire, but my duties are largely reserved to Gloucestershire; I attend to Gloucestershire more particularly.

2932. What is the nature of the employment that you have to attend to?—They are very general. We have wholesale clothing, very large printing works, large brickworks, woollen weaving, cotton weaving, and general clothing of all kinds—boots, and ladies' clothing, and male garments.

2933. Have you, in the course of your perambulations, found that the Acts of Parliament are being, on the whole, very fairly observed?—I think so. I have of course had occasion to take proceedings in a considerable number of cases.

2934. What, generally speaking, is the kind of case that you have interposed in?—Are you speaking of the Factory Acts or the Truck Acts particularly?

2935. Both?—The Factory Acts have called for the larger number of proceedings.

2936. What is the general nature of what has gone wrong there?—A considerable number have been for unfenced machinery, a number have also been for employment of protected hands beyond the legal period of employment.

2937. The like of that is beyond the scope of our inquiry. Will you particularly tell us about the Truck Act?—With regard to the Truck Act the first cases I had were in the Stroud Valley. The first case was on the 26th March, 1903. That was a case with reference to deductions from weavers' wages at one of the mills there.

2938. Was it a woollen factory?—A woollen factory. In that case the weavers were paid a certain price which was given to them for weaving the cloth, and in the case which was taken before the court I found that about 3s. 1d. had been stopped from 20s. of wages without any notice to the employee at all, without any contract having been fixed or any particulars given.

2939. In respect to what was this deduction made?—It was in respect of an alleged repair which had to be made to the cloth, owing to some defect in the weaving.

2940. Did you find that these deductions caused dissatisfaction among the workers?—They did not actually complain to me, but they expressed appreciation when I took up the case for them and had the matter put in order.

2941. What was the result?—The firm were fined £1 and costs.

2942. Was that appealed against?—There was no appeal in that case.

2943. What was that name?—That was Marling & Co., of Ebley and Stanley Mills, Stroud.

2944. What was the result of that prosecution?—The result has been in the valley generally that the firm have altered the terms of charging for mending, and they have now put up notices with regard to mending, which only takes a certain number of hours, which is fixed by the firm, two, three, or four as the case may be in the various qualities of cloth, that the firm will do that mending free for the weaver, but that if the cloth is so bad as to require any extra time spent on it then the time so spent will be charged to the weaver; but in cases of bad cloths, where a long time is going to be taken, the general practice there now is to call the weaver to the place so that she may see the cloths for herself and see that there is actually some damages; the worker is now given the opportunity generally of examining the bad cloth.

2945. Is that, do you think, an improvement upon the former practice?—The amounts of deductions have been considerably reduced.

2946. Have the wages been reduced?—Not at all.

2947. The wages remain the same and the deduction is reduced. To that extent that gives satisfaction of course?—Yes.

2948. Do you think that the system, as now improved, is correct?—I do not think it is an admirable system by any means.

2949. What do you think are its defects?—That in weaving a weaver cannot weave a perfect piece of cloth. I think it is admitted by all manufacturers that it is impossible to weave a piece of cloth that does not require some mending. One of the employers in the valley takes that view; he says: "I realise that my weavers can with skill attain to a certain standard, and I expect them to reach that standard; if they do not do so I caution them; then the second caution I suspend them." As the result this man has not any fines in his mill; he does not charge for mending; he says that he finds by paying a slightly reduced price, but paying that price without deductions, he can get the work done effectually.

2950. Is that a well managed mill?—Exceedingly well managed.

2951. Is the supervision in that mill good?—I think it is.

2952. On the whole superior to that where fines are resorted to?—Undoubtedly.

2953. Is there dissatisfaction on the part of the owner at his having abolished fines?—None whatever; he thinks it is the proper thing.

2954. And of course the workers do too?—The workers there I would say are the most satisfied set of workers that I have visited in that neighbourhood.

2955. This is highly to the credit of the firm, and you are quite free to give us the name ?—The firm is U. 10

2956. What is their line of business ?—West of England cloth makers.

2957. That is a product that requires great care, is it not? —It is.

2958. And very considerable skill ?—Yes.

2959. Has that example become in any respect contagious ?—I am sorry to say it has not extended yet.

2960. When was that introduced ?—I first became aware of it some two years ago—two and a half years ago probably.

2961. Do you see any objection in principle or in practice to making that system general ?—No, I cannot see any objection to it.

2962. Do you think it would carry with it considerable advantages ?—I think so.

2963. Will you just describe these advantages, please ? —I think that the pressure which would be put on the worker to attain a certain standard of work would be not only to the worker's benefit, but would benefit employers as well.

2964. Has this come before you ; that under a system where there are no fines obtaining there are capricious dismissals from employment ?—I have never heard of such a thing in that mill.

2965. Has it come within the range of your experience that the abolition of fines not only promotes better supervision, but that it promotes greater attention to the rolling stock and the plant ?—Undoubtedly, that is my opinion.

2966. And to the raw material used ?—Yes.

2967. Then you had a case against Mr. S. R. Hooper on the 27th March, 1903 ?—Yes.

2968. That was at the Stroud Police Court ?—Yes.

2969. What was Hooper ?—He was a stick manufacturer employing about thirty employees, an equal number of males and females.

2970. What is it that he deals in ?—He would buy trees or branches of trees and convert them into walking sticks, or umbrella sticks, or parasol sticks.

2971. He was charged with paying wages other than in coin of the realm ?—He was.

2972. He received back, I understand, from each worker in his employ a sum of money equal to 2d. in the £1 on the wages paid to each worker ?—Yes.

2973. What was that for ?—The workers understood (there was no secrecy about it I think) that it was to pay the premium against accidents under the Workmen's Compensation Act.

2974. Had the workmen's consent been asked to this ? —No, it was a practice commenced, and the workers were expected to follow it.

2975. How did the evidence come out with regard to the amount of money received ?—The evidence showed that the defendant was paying as a premium against accidents the sum of £11 5s. on a wages bill estimated on £2,500 ; that was at the rate of 9s. per cent. He was receiving from the workers at the rate of 16s. 8d. per cent.

2976. Did you obtain a conviction in that case ?— No ; the Bench dismissed that information on the ground that we had failed to prove that he was paying wages other than in coin of the realm ; the point being that he had actually paid in money, but he had received back 2d., and it was urged that the man for the 2d. which he had paid back had received a promise of compensation.

2977. The man was entitled to compensation at law, as you are aware —Exactly.

2978. That was the view that was presented by you, I suppose ?—Yes, we urged that he was entitled to compensation.

2979. Whether he paid anything or nothing ?—Yes

2980. Was that case taken to appeal ?—It was.

2981. And you lost in the Appeal Court ?—Yes.

2982. That is reported in July, 1903 ; 19, Times Law Reports, page 601 ?—Yes.

2983. What do you say with regard to this ? Do you approve of this practice which has thus been ratified by the law ?—I think it is a very bad practice.

2984. In your view I gather you take it just to be a deduction from the wages which had been properly earned ?—Yes.

2985. A deduction for a thing which the workman had already by the law of the land, namely, a right to compensation ?—That is so.

2986. In Hooper's case it was 2d. a week. Now you are able to mention other cases. In the case of S., a Bristol firm, the deduction is 3½d. per week ; then the firm of T. deduct 2d. per week ; the firm of U. deduct 2d. per week ; the firm of V. deduct 2d. per week. So that this practice appears, at least in the Stroud and Bristol district, to be widely prevalent ?—It is somewhat prevalent. I should like to add that I have had two additional complaints with reference to this same practice which I have not been able to investigate yet.

2987. That of course is a deduction which you object to on the ground that they are deducting from the workman something which he is entitled to by law already ?—Yes.

2988. The next deduction is for meal room. You have had experience of that in your practice ?—Yes.

2989. There was a firm of W. of Bristol ; they used to deduct 3d. per week for the use of a meal room, and all the workers were charged for the same whether they used the room or not ?—That is so.

2990. And upon further inquiry it was found that the amount was really for use of kitchen, hot water, doctor and medicine ?—Yes.

2991. You are aware, are you not, that the charge for doctor and medicine is a legitimate charge ?—Yes.

2992. What do you say, therefore, with regard to the amount of 3d. a week ?—I thought it was unreasonable to make all the workers pay whether they used the accommodation or not.

2993. But did they all employ the doctor and get the right to the medicine ?—They had the right to him, undoubtedly. All the workers had the right to the doctor, but, in the case of the few workers I spoke to, none of them had availed themselves of either the doctor or the medicine, I took objection to the thing principally upon the ground that it was not fair to ask the workers to pay for something they did not have, and it was manifestly unfair to ask them to pay for something which was not stated upon the contract.

2994. Was there no specification in the contract ?— The exact wording of the contract was, "A charge of 3d. per week will be made for kitchen," so that no contract had been entered into for the supply of doctor or medicine in any way. The firm intimated that a contract had been drafted in that way under the head of "kitchen" in order to escape the necessary registration and other requirements of the Shop Clubs Act. That was the explanation made to me.

2995. What was the nature of their business ?—They are corset makers, and they have some 620 workers at this one factory.

2996. Had you any opportunity of testing that on the question whether it was a "fair and reasonable" charge in amount ?—No. I laid the matter somewhat strongly before the firm ; I pointed out the offence that they had committed, and they very promptly drafted a fresh contract, and now the doctor and medicine have been put upon a proper footing ; there is a signed contract with each of the workers ; there is an audit of the doctor's accounts, and the price for the kitchen has been reduced to 1d.

2997. What is the charge for the doctor and medicine ? —I believe they are charged 2d. at present.

2998. So that it comes to where it was ?—It comes to where it was, but we have had it made explicit what the charge is actually for.

2999. Coming back to the charge for the kitchen, do you approve of such charges ?—I do not.

10 July 1906.

3000. Why?—Principally because I think the occupier should provide them.

3001. That is part of the general on-cost of the firm, you think?—I think so.

3002. And it would be far better just to have the net wage with the privileges all thrown in?—I think so. I think they should treat meal rooms as they do other conveniences that they have to provide for the workers.

3003. Do you find that the majority of firms do not make any charge?—That is so.

3004. And they are quite as well conducted?—Very much better I should say.

3005. Then other firms who also deduct for meal rooms are X. who charge 1d. per week; Y. who charge ½d. per week; and Z. who charge 1d. per week?—Yes.

3006. You think that that system should be abolished?—I do.

3007. Come now to the question of fines. You have had one experience in Bristol in particular, I believe?—Yes.

3008. Was that a case that went into court?—Yes, the case of W. 10.

3009. About what date was that?—The first hearing was on the 10th June, 1903, and the judgment was given on the 30th June.

3010. What had happened in that case?—In that case a pieceworker, a weaver, during a part of the week in which Easter was included, had earned 5s. 7½d.; she was actualy paid 1s. 5½d.

3011. What was the deduction for?—Eightpence was deducted for a quarter of a day lost; 2d. for being late, and half a crown for being absent the whole day.

3012. Did you ascertain about these deductions?—They came out in court.

3013. Will you explain them to us. Was the worker charged half a day's absence in respect of less than half a day?—No. The rule at the firm is that if they are not in by a certain time they have to lose a quarter in the morning, and she lost two quarters; that amounted to half a day. She was a married woman, and she alleged in court that she was detained by domestic reasons. She knew she would be twenty minutes late, and therefore she knew that she could not get in until after breakfast time. As to the absence for the day, she explained that it being the day after Bank Holiday she overslept herself; she then could not have got in until about 7.20, and she said that on a previous occasion when she had been late after Bank Holiday, the firm had put another weaver in her place. She gave that as the reason for not sending a deputy and not attending at the mill.

3014. That was the reason for the deduction, but with regard to the rate of reduction, I understand it was half a crown for one day's absence?—Yes.

3015. Was she a piece-worker?—She was.

3016. Could she have earned wages anything like 2s. 6d. a day?—She would have earned about 2s. 6d. if she had been there.

3017. Do you mean that she lost her earnings of 2s. 6d.?—She did.

3018. And then was fined half a crown off her earnings for the other days?—Yes.

3019. So that practically she had 5s. knocked off?—She was rather worse off than that in this particular case, because she would have earned a bonus of half a crown if she had got in on the Tuesday morning, so that she really lost 7s. 6d., but I could not charge for that, because the bonus was a matter not connected quite with her wages.

3020. What happened to that case?—That case was taken into court. There were five informations laid against them, and they were fined £3 and costs.

3021. Then there was another information for weft carrying and piece carrying?—Yes. After the first proceedings they were fully instructed as to the law upon truck. At the next visit they were found to be making other deductions than they had placed upon their contract in respect of work which they did for the weavers. They have boys who carry up the bobbins with cotton on, and they charge the weavers for those boys' services. They were summoned for that, and they were fined £1 in each case.

3022. Then about the medical fund?—I visited them with reference to the medical fund, and I found that there was a medical fund at the firm. I visited on the 31st July, 1905, and I found that for the six months ending the 8th July there had been received from the workers by way of deductions £154 13s. 9d.

3023. Was that for medicine alone?—Doctor and medicine; this added to the balance of the last year's account of £51 10s. 8½d. showed the credit side of the account to stand at £206 4s. 5½d. The disbursements were shown to be £80 to the medical man in the half-year, £10 to the certifying surgeon, and other entries called "sur dries," £51 15s. 1d.; that is £141 15s. 1d. So that in six months the firm had made an additional profit of £12 18s. 8d., and the credit side of the account at that time stood at £54 9s. 4½d.

3024. Was there an audit of the account?—None, and no contract with the worker.

3025. The certifying surgeon is part of the employer's on-cost, is it not?—Clearly, I should think.

3026. But in this case they entered it as against these contributions by the workers?—That is so.

3027. Did you prosecute in that case?—No. I was instructed to explain the law again to them; I explained the law, and about this time a union was formed among the workers, and the trade union have taken the matter up, they have insisted upon having their own doctor as against the firm's doctor, and they are seeing that they will have an audit of the accounts.

3028. The fines you were now explaining are for absence, for weft carrying and so on, and you have also explained the Marling case of fines for bad work?—Yes.

3029. Now in reference to fines for bad work, you have experience of firms at Kingswood?—Yes.

3030. What county is that in?—In Gloucestershire. It is immediately adjoining the borough of Bristol.

3031. They charge for alleged damage to boots?—They do. I have had several cases to investigate where men have made boots in their own homes, they have taken them to the firm, the boots have been examined by the firm's passer of work, they have been passed into stock, they have been sold to the retail dealer, and the retail dealer has sold them to the buyer, and the buyer has put the boots to use; and in two cases at least the boots have been brought back to the firm, and the firm were able to trace the maker of the boot owing to a particular stamp in the leather of the upper, and in each case the worker was charged the full wholesale cost of the boot—for damage which he had no means of checking—boots which were done so well that the firm's own checker passed them, and that the buyer received them as apparently in a good condition. Unfortunately the men who had given me particulars were not able to give dates; unfortunately they only come to us after they have possibly been dismissed from the service; so that in those cases at least I have been unable to prosecute.

3032. Was there dissatisfaction with that class of deduction?—Great dissatisfaction.

3033. What is the average wage earned by these boot workers?—It varies very considerably. In the busy season, when they work from early in the morning till late at night, they can earn 30s. a week; in the summer it falls off to 5s. or 6s.; it is purely a seasonal trade there, from August to December.

3034. What is the amount of the wholesale value of the boot?—In some cases it is priced as much as 8s. 6d.

3035. The boot of course could not be delivered over in respect of that deduction?—No.

3036. So that they lost the article and suffered a deduction?—Yes, and the worker would probably get 6d. for making the boot in the first place.

3037. As much as 8s. 6d. was the deduction?—That is the last complaint I had.

3038. And you authenticated it?—I authenticated it so far as the circumstances were concerned, but the dates were so vague that one could not take actual proceedings upon it. I did trace a case subsequently.

3039. You had a case of that kind recently before the Lawford Gate Police Court Is that near Bristol ?—It is within the borough of Bristol, but the jurisdiction covers Kingswood.

3040. There a firm called Jay Bros. had deducted 2s. from a boy's wages of 11s. for careless work in making up boots ?—Yes.

3041. What happened in that case ?—The firm were fined in that case.

3042. Then there are fines or deductions, are there not, in respect of materials; you have mentioned the charge for labour, the charge of carrying weft and pieces, in the W. 10 case, but is there not a charge also for gold bobbins ?—Yes.

3043. What is that ?—In certain classes of work, goods which are made for India, the firm had to inset into the ends of the cloths threads of gold cord. They keep these bobbins with about fifty yards of gold thread on them in the office. Then when they take an order for this particular cloth they supply the gold bobbins to the worker, and charge the worker a certain price for the bobbin, and then they estimate as nearly as they can what the cost is, and they add that on to the weaving price. The weavers' complaint is that very often the bobbin does not contain sufficient material to enable them to recover the price which the firm charge for it; that the firm have estimated the price to be paid at so much per pick, the pick being a certain length, and if the bobbin does not pay out its fifty yards, or whatever the estimated length is, the weaver is necessarily that much short in wages.

3044. This is the same firm which you referred to in the earlier part of your evidence as fining for absence and as making a profit out of its medical fund and so on ?—Yes.

3045. In that firm with its ramified system of fines, do you find that its organisation is superior to other firms ?—No, I should say it is a very badly organised place indeed.

3046. Do you think that it would be better that even a firm like that should rely on superior organisation ?—Well, I am afraid in this case the workers are of such a low standard and the discipline there is of such a poor nature that it is an exceedingly difficult thing to know what to advise in a factory of this kind. I mean, the factory has been going on for forty years and apparently the discipline is getting worse instead of better. I should say the management of this factory is the poorest specimen of the management of 2,000 workers that I have ever come across. The number of prosecutions that we have had to take against them is conclusive proof, I think, that the system must be wrong there.

3047. But still this system of fines and deductions seems in this case to be continuous and to be extremely complex ?—It is.

3048. Have you any reason to doubt that, if this system as a whole was abolished, it would be followed by very great efforts in the direction of better discipline ?—Well, I am afraid in this case they would have to improve the discipline first, before they could deal with these fines for materials. I can hardly describe the condition of the workers in this particular factory, or the management either. The whole thing is quite hopeless.

3049. What I want to get at is this. This hopeless case, in point of management and discipline, is a case in which there is fining and deductions, so to speak, to the mast head ?—True.

3050. More so apparently than in any other item in your experience ?—That is so.

3051. It is, in short, a case where there are the most fines and most deductions, and least discipline and least organisation ?—That is so.

3052. Does that suggest to you that if this system, which has gone on so long with such poor results, were abolished by law, you might reasonably anticipate that the firm would then be compelled to take other means of discipline ?—I quite agree.

3053. Suppose they took the ordinary means of discipline in a well conducted firm; have you any reason to doubt, even with that class of workers, and their bad training, that there would be an improvement set in ?—There would be an undoubted improvement, if the discipline and management were better.

3054. Then you refer to a place called Kingswood, and to some boot firms there. Are there any charges made against outworkers by these boot firms ?—Yes.

3055. What are these charges ?—The firms there charge the men for nails which are used for making up into the firm's boots, both iron and brass nails.

3056. Being outworkers, you are unable to prosecute ?—That is so, unless we can prove that they have a contract of personal service.

3057. Have you spoken to these firms about these charges ?—I have, many times.

3058. What is their explanation ?—The first reason they give is that they wish their work kept up to their standard of work, and therefore they supply the materials to go into the boots. The second reason is that unless they charge for the grindery, as it is called, being an easily portable article, it would be purloined—it would be stolen.

3059. Do all the firms do that ?—Almost invariably. There are very few exceptions in the district.

3060. Is there a profit made by the firm in the transaction ?—In my opinion there is, because the firms in that district, whenever I approach them, say: "Well, we know we ought to sell at net price; we sell it at the same price that these men could buy it in a shop outside."

3061. That means that they sell it at a little over what they themselves purchase at ?—I think so. I have suggested that the shop has to make a profit in order to keep its doors open, and they say: "Well, if we have the expense of buying these in ton lots, and putting them up into half pound packets, we think we are entitled to take the same profit as the shop would get."

3062. Then cotton and thread ?—Cotton and thread is almost entirely supplied to the piece workers indoors. That again is alleged to be necessary owing to the standard of work and to the fact that the workers would waste the cotton unless they were charged for it.

3063. But about the price ?—On cotton there is a recognised trade discount of 10 per cent. and a cash discount of 4 per cent., and the workers are not getting the benefit of that trade discount. I have taken proceedings in respect of that against one firm of Saunders & Co. In that case they were charging 5d. a reel of thread for which they were payed 58s. 6d. per gross subject to 10 per cent. discount. In that case the defendant, the principal partner in the works, was cross-examined as to getting 10 per cent. discount; he denied it, and the case was dismissed; but the next day his solicitor sent me a letter, of which I have a copy here, in which he says that his client unfortunately made a mistake in the box.

3064. The case was over by that time ?—The case was over and dismissed. The actual figures worked out that the net cost to the firm of this material was £2 10s. 7d. per gross, or about 4¼d. each; they were charging 5d., and making ¾d. profit on each reel.

3065. After the solicitor's letter, do you know what has happened to that firm Saunders & Co. in their practice; have they reduced the price to the workers ?—I was there about three months ago, and they told me they had ceased selling materials to the workers, but I have since had a complaint from a reliable authority in which I am told that this practice is still being carried on, but under different circumstances, which will make it somewhat difficult of investigation.

3066. Do you know of any cases where they have ceased charging for materials, or where they have never adopted the principle of charging for materials, or is it the universal practice ?—There are some firms that do not charge for materials. In the case of day-workers in factories, they are seldom charged for materials. In fact it is almost an invariable practice not to charge for materials in the case of day-workers.

3067. I want to get at your opinion about that. On the whole, do you favour this being made illegal ?—I do.

3068. Do you think there would be a consequent wastefulness or theft ?—No, because the employer knows from his business abilities the amount of material required to make up a certain quantity of goods, and therefore he would be able to check wastage almost entirely.

10 July 1906

By Mrs. Tennant.

3069. I want to ask you first your opinion about suspension as an alternative to fining; you referred to that practice in one mill, and I think you also referred to there being some system of a slightly reduced wage?—In the woollen industry U. 10 pay approximately 6d. per piece (I am speaking of similar pieces) less than other firms in the neighbourhood would pay for the same work; but the other firms would probably be charging 9d. or 1s. for the mending of a piece; so that U. 10's wages would be 3d. to 6d. above the other people's wages.

3070. But in a sense, even though wages do work out at more, they are repaying themselves for the damage done; the firm are taking into account the fact that damage will be done?—Certainly.

3071. Is it concurrently with that system that they also have a system of suspension?—Yes; but it is exceptional for that system to be put into operation. I think the proprietor told me that he had suspended one in six months, he finds that moral suasion has the desired effect.

3072. That caution is enough?—Yes.

3073. In that one case do you happen to know during what term the suspension lasted?—I cannot say that.

3074. That is a system of which one need hardly take account, as it is so seldom put into force?—Quite so.

3075. Have you found any other firm in which it is put into force?—No, except a large collar makers at Gloucester, employing some 400 hands. I asked the employer there how he managed with the fines, and he said, "If my workers do not do as I tell them, I give them half a day's holiday occasionally, and I find I have not to give a girl half a day's holiday twice." So that I think suspension is quite a small matter; the fact that a worker is going to be suspended is almost sufficient deterrent, at least it is in the cases I have investigated.

3076. I want to ask you about the alteration in practice in the case of the firm W. You say they now charge 1d. for kitchen and 2d. for the doctor and medicine, instead of 3d. to cover the whole thing. Do you think the fact that the workers pay their 2d. separately for the doctor has produced any greater readiness on their part to employ that doctor?—I could not say.

3077. You do not know how far they are really satisfied with the change?—No, the thing has only been under my view for about six months. I have not visited the factory just recently.

3078. Do you think it is a good principle to have medical attendance supplied by the firm, and charged for by the firm?—I do not think it is a good principle when the firm have the control of the doctor. I think it is a very good plan for the workers to have a sick fund upon which they may fall back in case of sickness.

3079. Would you distinguish between a sick fund out of which they would get payments in the case of illness, and having a doctor to whom they would apply for attendance in the case of illness?—Yes, I think a medical fund in which they would get the benefits in the case of sickness is a better arrangement, rather than paying for a mere doctor only.

3080. You have given us your experience in one case; have you any experience of other cases in which the workers pay for medical attendance to the firm and prefer a doctor of their own?—I know another large works where they pay; that is a tinplate works at Lydney. There they pay for medical attendance, I believe, and the workers there, to the best of my knowledge, appoint their own doctor; a committee of the men appoint the doctor, I believe.

3081. In the case of W. 10 you said the trade union had insisted upon its own doctor being employed by the firm?—Yes.

3082. Are they now satisfied?—I have had no complaints lately.

3083. You said there was one prosecution in the case of the W. 10, I think for the weft carrying and piece carrying, and that was successful?—Yes.

3084. You also referred to a case in which there might have been a prosecution but there was not, for what I suppose one may call the abuse of the sick fund. Did you discover that offence after the firm had been prosecuted for the first offence?—Yes.

3085. Were there any special circumstances in that case on account of which you did not prosecute?—None, so far as I know, except that I reported to headquarters and was given instructions in reply.

3086. Do you happen to remember what interval elapsed between the prosecution for the first offence and the discovery of the second?—There have been three prosecutions against W. 10 for truck. The first summons was in June, 1903; that was for various offences against the Truck Act. Then on the 18th December of the same year they were prosecuted for selling bobbins to a worker, and they were fined on that occasion £1. On the 2nd October, 1905, they were again proceeded against; that was for weft and piece carrying, and on that occasion they were fined £10 and costs.

3087. Then they are somewhat persistent offenders?—Very persistent. The investigation with reference to the medical fund was made on the 31st July, so that it was really between the second and third offence.

3088. The first two cases I might describe as instances of profit making, either out of the offence, or upon the goods sold?—Yes.

3089. Do you think there was any doubt as to what the result of a prosecution would have been in the case of the medical fund?—Personally, I do not think so.

3090. You yourself had no doubt?—None whatever.

3091. And you do not know what consideration it was that influenced the Home Office?—I thought it was a perfectly clear case.

3092. And a very bad one?—A very bad one.

By Mr. Ramsay Macdonald.

3093. In the first case before us, that of S. R. Hooper, which led to a prosecution, was there no contract for the reduction of the 2d. in the £?—None whatever.

3094. And the court dismissed your application, and the appeal court upheld that, although the workers were protected by statute; I am referring to the 2d. reduction for compensation?—They were only getting what they were entitled to under the Workmen's Compensation Act.

3095. They were entitled to that without payment?—Yes.

3096. And the firm were asking them to pay 2d. in the £ for that to which they were entitled without payment?—That is so.

3097. And, although there was no contract and really no benefit received, the court dismissed the case?—That is so.

3098. Why?—Because the court held that, under the information as laid, there had been no payment other than in the coin of the realm.

3099. But was not this made a condition of employment?—I suppose it was, but it was only made a condition of employment after he had worked there a week; the first he knew of it would be at the end of the week—or rather at the end of the fortnight; they pay fortnightly there.

3100. If he refused to pay at the end of the fortnight?—I think one of the witnesses told the court that he would expect the sack; those were the words he used at the hearing.

3101. Then with reference to the second firm W., where deductions are made in respect of meal rooms; were those payments made a condition of employment?—Yes, I should say they were.

3102. All the workpeople engaged were subject to the deductions?—That is so.

3103. And I think you said in respect of that you did know firms that provided the same facilities as this firm W., but which made no deductions for them from the workers' wages?—I know several such cases.

3104. Do you think that an injustice is done to the workers by asking them to pay those deductions?—Well, hardly an injustice, when the conditions are known to the worker before entering the employ; but my view was that it was accommodation which the firm should provide for the worker free of expense.

3105. Do you think it was a fair and reasonable charge in respect of the facilities provided, which were not compulsory?—No, I do not think it was a fair and reasonable charge.

3106. Do you think that everything the firm W., provided could have been provided for a less charge?—I think so.

3107. Leaving out of account your idea of what the capitalist ought morally to provide?—I think it could have been provided for less.

3108. On a business footing?—Yes, having regard to the number of workers in the factory.

3109. With reference to those nominally voluntary, but practically compulsory, shop clubs and sick clubs, have the friendly societies taken up any attitude?—None, so far as I know.

3110. I suppose a good many of those people would naturally belong to friendly societies?—Yes.

3111. Part of whose duty it was to provide doctors under their constitution, and in respect of the payments that they levied?—That is so.

3112. And yet, although a woman or a workman belonged to a friendly society, these deductions would still be made by the employers?—Yes.

3113. Have you come across any case where membership of a friendly society exempted a workman from making such payments?—I have not.

3114. You have come across no cases where exceptions have been made?—None whatever.

3115. With reference to W. 10's sick club I think you gave us to understand that the appearance of a union practically cleared the matter up?—That is so.

3116. What is the position of the fund now under the union; you have told us that the doctor is appointed by the workmen; who administers the fund?—I am afraid I am not able to give definite evidence.

3117. The fund still exists?—The fund still exists, and there has been a committee of workmen appointed to deal with the fund, and there have been auditors appointed.

3118. You think that a workmen's committee now administers the fund and that the accounts are audited?—Yes.

3119. That being so, have you still any objection to the fund?—At the present I have not thought of any objection to it.

3120. In your experience as an inspector, does a fund administered in that way present the possiblities of injustice to the workpeople so that we ought to make it the subject of legislation?—I think it would be better if there were no such deductions from wages, but I cannot point to any case of absolute injustice.

3121. You would still object, I suppose, to making a subscription to such a fund a condition of employment?—I certainly would do that.

3122. You think, I suppose, that if such subscriptions are asked they should be made the subject of separate contracts altogether? I might put it in this way; that the wages should be paid to the workmen and any subscription that they pay from their wages should be a separate act on their part?—It would be very much better, I think.

3123. And that the subscriptions should be removed from the act of paying the wages?—Yes.

3124. You think that that might give a substantial protection?—I think the worker would be freer.

3125. With respect to cases like darning of goods, you have mentioned Marling & Co. In any case has any allowance been made by the employers for the poor material that has often been supplied to the worker?—I have never heard of such an allowance.

3126. I notice that you suggested something of thta character when you said that certain firms allowed a certain time for darning, which varied according to the character of the work that the workman was engaged upon?—The character varies in accordance with the fineness or coarseness of the cloths and according to the difficulty experienced in the weaving. Some cloths are difficult to work, and it is in the cloths where the difficulty is experienced that the firm make an allowance, and the time that they have fixed has been a reasonable time for mending.

Mr. J. Owner. 10 July 1906.

3127. I understand that a very large part of the objection to the weavers paying for those things is that the material often makes it impossible for them to do good weaving?—That is so.

3128. And that the supply of good material is part of the business of the manufacturer; and, if shoddy material——?—I am glad to say that we have no shoddy factories in the West of England.

3129. You have no experience of shoddy factories?—No.

3130. Where bad material is supplied I suppose your opinion is that the workers should not be penalised for the bad results of weaving that material?—Certainly not.

3131. It is part of the firm's chances in carrying on a certain trade?—Exactly.

3132. Now you refer to W. 10, and the bad discipline and bad management and frequent resort to fines in that case. What I should like to get your opinon upon is this: Supposing we tried by legislation to make certain of these objectionable things which you have been telling us about impossible, do you anticipate any difficulty of an administrative character, suppose that we abolish fines?—I do not see any difficulty.

3133. There would be no difficulty in checking, say, an unfair resort to suspension?—I do not think there would be very much difficulty in tracking it.

3134. Have you had any experience of railway inspection?—No.

3135. You do not know the practice of some railway companies?—I have heard of the practice, but it is not within my own knowledge.

3136. But so far as your experience has gone, you do not think that that is a serious objection?—I do not think so.

3137. You mentioned bonuses in connection with W. 10. Is the system of payment of bonus prevalent?—No.

3138. Is that the only company that does it?—In one or two other companies in Bristol—the larger companies—they give prizes for regular attendance; very small prizes, amounting to about 10s., I think for the best attendance throughout the year.

3139. Is that only given to one person for the best, or is it given to anybody who comes up to a certain standard?—10s. would be given to each of the workers who attained a certain standard.

3140. And that sum would not be subject to any deduction whatever?—In one or two cases they are subject to deductions. If a worker is late more than a certain number of times, he fails to get a certain bonus; the bonus is reduced in amount.

3141. They fail to get their bonus and they fail to get their wages?—No; they get their wages, but if they are late a number of times the bonus at the end of the year is reduced.

3142-3. Are these piece-workers or time-workers?—Time-workers.

3144. They pay their full week's wages, but at the end of the year their bonus is reduced?—Yes; that may be for being five minutes late; they give them five minute's grace; after that they would lose their time wages and the bonus.

3145. You have had no experience of bonuses being paid for the purpose of enabling employers to make unfair and unreasonable deductions upon the bonuses?—Yes, I have. Immediately after the Marlings' case arose I was visiting other mills, and one of them in answer to my question said that they did not make any charge for weaving. I asked them the method of payment, and they put it in this way; that they priced a cloth on the worker's ticket at 18s. 6d.; they would expect to pay that worker, if she weaved a good cloth, 20s.; but if there was mending beyond the first two hours they would deduct the mending from the 1s. 6d. bonus and not from the agreed wage to the worker. I reported that matter to the Home Office and I was instructed to inform the firm that that was illegal, and the firm promptly ceased it. That is the only case that has come under my notice, and in that case the firm gave way quite promptly.

3146. So that now you do not think you have any cases under your jurisdiction of payment by bonus being used as a method of evading obligation?—I think not.

3147. Now I will first put this general question. Do I gather that you are in favour of the complete abolition of disciplinary fines?—Well I know one or two cases in which I could not go so far as that at present.

3148. As for instance?—W. 10.

3149. Would you favour the abolition of deductions for destroyed materials?—Do you mean wilfully destroyed or accidentally?

3150. I mean destroyed in the ordinary course of business?—Accidentally destroyed?

3151. Yes. I mean, if there is culpable damage, if a workman rips up a piece with a knife that is another matter altogether; but material destroyed in the ordinary operation of trade by an ordinary careful workman having made a mistake?—I term that accidental damage—damage which the workman could not prevent by due skill and intelligence.

3152. You are in favour of abolishing deductions for that?—Yes, completely.

3153. Is there any other form of deduction at all that you think ought to remain?—I do not call one to mind.

By Mr. Cawley.

3154. I should like to ask you what changes in the law you would really recommend; I understand you have been able to prosecute under the Truck Act in most of the cases that you found very wrong, but in some instances you think there have been hardships upon the employees, where you have been unable to touch the employer by law. What are these cases?—In the case of supply of material one is almost prevented from getting actual proof as to the cost of the material to the employer.

3155. Part of the employer's bargain is that he should find the material, but how would you suggest that the employer should get a quid pro quo if the material is damaged?—He would get the price of the material in the manufactured article.

3156. But what I understand is that the employer charges the worker with the material that is used?—With some of the material used.

3157. Then if he gave the worker the material without charging for it, he would have to get the work done at less cost?—That is so.

3158. There would in that case have to be some reduction of wages?—Some adjustment of the wages paid at present.

3159. Is that the only kind of case where you think there is real hardship? And can you say that in any of these cases the employer is trying to get his work done for less money; or is it his principal aim to have the work done better?—In the cases of damages I have investigated, it has seemed to me that the employer was charging the unfortunate worker with the whole cost of the damage, whether that damage was due to bad work or to bad material.

3160. Do you think the employer is trying to get his work done at a lower rate?—No, I would not say that; he is trying to recoup himself at the expense of the worker for some damage done by some person.

3161. You do not think he is trying to get the work at less cost?—I do not think it is done with that end in view.

3162. Then is it not done in order to try and get better work?—No, I would not go so far as that.

3163. But it must be done for one object or the other, and the same thing appears to apply to the question of a bonus, which is given to encourage good work, but which is not paid when the work is not good?—That is what we are told.

3164. Do you think the employer is hard, and is trying to screw the workman down?—I would not go so far as that.

3165. What would you suggest in the case of cloth that is damaged in the making and has to be mended; would you suggest that the employer should not make a deduction for mending, or that he should really reduce the wages—No.

3166. In the cases you put before us, a bad worker necessarily does not draw so much money as a good worker, having practically to pay for the time occupied in mending?—Yes.

3167. If the employer is to do away with that system, would he not necessarily have to recoup himself. Would you suggest that he should reduce wages and do away altogether with the system of deductions for mending?—He cannot do away with the mending; he must carry that on. But it seems to me he might take some means to bring bad work definitely before the notice of the employees, and the employees, in the majority of cases, have sufficient skill, as well as sufficient interest in the work, to do it better if the necessity for an improvement is brought to their notice. The old practice was to fine a workman for bad work without giving him any chance of seeing how bad it is.

3168. If the old system was abandoned, would the wages not have to be lower?—In the case of U. 10, they have done away with the system, and the wages are slightly higher.

3169. I thought you told us in the case of U. 10 that the employer is paying rather less in wages, but that you thought the change worked out rather better in the long run for the worker?—Yes.

3170. The only difference that I can see is this, is it not that some employers think it better to deal with the matter in one way, whereas U. 10 think it better to do the other way, and you think that by the latter the workers get a little advantage?—Yes, not only in money, but in opportunities of improving their work through defects being brought to their knowledge.

3171. Many other employers are not of that opinion?—They have not been converted yet.

3172. With regard to fines for being late; is it really a case of fines versus suspension or dismissal?—Not even suspension in many cases.

3173. How are the employers to deal with people who continually come late, like the lady you mentioned who came so late after the Bank Holiday?—I am afraid that is one of the drawbacks of employing married women.

3174. Do not you think the case is one of fines versus suspensions or dismissal?—Or better management.

3175. How can you get better management without some way for either encouraging or penalising a worker?—I can only say that in the case of one collar factory known to me, they have actually attained a very high standard of attendance and good time-keeping without the imposition of fines, and the employer tells me he has done it by giving the matter his personal attention and inducing the girls to come punctually to work. He has no doubt had to threaten some of them, but the number of suspensions has been infinitesimal in the period of four years about which I speak.

3176. Has he had to suspend some of them?—He has had to threaten to suspend.

3177. He has to exercise personal influence?—Yes.

3178. And he suspends very little?—Yes.

3179. Do you think the workers in these factories, taken as a whole, object to fines for late attendance, and would prefer the penalty of suspension or dismissal?—They strongly object to the fines, and I think they would much prefer to take the risk of probable dismissal.

3180. That is rather what I wanted to get at. With regard to the payment for doctors, is there any benefit to the employers in any case that you know of through these sick clubs, and through having to pay so much for medical attendance ?—In one case it looks as if the firm were having the benefit of £50 in their banking account, and they also had the distribution of some £51 15s. 1d., for which there were no vouchers.

3181. That comes under the Truck Act ?—This was a medical fund.

3182. Is not that an indictable offence ; if the firm were taking and using money which they should not have taken ?—You asked me whether the firm were making anything out of it. I replied that the firm had £50 at the bank, and that in addition they had the distribution of £51 15s. in a period of six months, for which no entries were made in the cash book, except the items called sundries.

3183. Was not that a clear case of making money out of the workers ?—Yes, it would seem so.

3184. Unfairly, and, one might almost say, fraudulently ?—It looked like it.

3186. But there are others not in any club at all ? Looking at the matter broadly, do you think the workers object to these clubs, even where the employer gets no benefit from them ?—In my opinion the workers do object to them.

3187. As a whole ?—Yes.

3188. Would you tell us the different things you would like to see altered by law that are not touched by the Truck Act ?—I would like to see deductions from wages prevented, or rather, that the wages to be paid to the worker should be clearly set out, and that the amount should be paid to him free from deduction.

3189. That embodies almost everything you would suggest ?—Yes, it practically embodies everything.

By Mr. Maddison.

3190. With regard to the deductions for mending, do you consider the piece-work rate for a piece of cloth to include mending ? Is the worker supposed to be paid for a perfect piece of cloth ?—It is a somewhat difficult subject. When I first made inquiry in one of the cases I have mentioned, I was told that the deduction was of long standing, and took the form of a penny in the shilling all round. When pressing the matter further, I pointed out that a deduction rate of a penny in the shilling did not amount to 2s. 6d. in 20s., and the reply was that the usual thing was to charge 2s. 6d. in such cases.

3191. My question is really this: is there any really accurate assessment of the time occupied in mending a piece of cloth ? Is there any scale ? Because mending cannot take always the same time ; it may take twice as long in one case as in another. Are the workmen charged differently for it according to the time taken ?—I got two of the firms to separate the mending, and the deduction is now left over until the piece has been mended, when the number of hours taken in the mending is reckoned up and the number of hours which the firm agree to give is deducted, the worker being asked to pay the difference.

3192. Do you regard that as an improvement on the old system ?—Yes.

3193. Then there is something like an equitable assessment of the imperfections in a piece of cloth ?—Now there is.

3194. But in spite of that, you think there should be no deductions at all ?—I think it can be worked without deductions.

3195. I understood from you that in Evans's case, in order to do that, they slightly reduced the price in order to recoup themselves ?—Yes.

3196. Are any of these weavers on day rates ?—All piece-work.

3197. Do you know of any similar cases where men upon day rates are fined for bad work ?—No, we have no day rates.

3198. Not in any similar trade ?—Perhaps among the Kingswood boot people.

3199. Are they upon day work ?—Yes.

10 July 1906.

3200. What is the practice if a boot is not up to the mark ?—The classer estimates the damage, and very often for a trivial damage it is decided that the worker is not to get any "making" money at all.

3201. What do you think of that ?—I think it unfair.

3202. I suppose you think that competent workmen should be employed, and that if a man systematically does bad work you would caution him and finally get rid of him if necessary ?—Yes.

3203. You prefer that to fining ?—Certainly.

3204. With regard to sick clubs, I understood you to say that on the whole you thought them good if they were properly conducted ?—Yes.

3205. In making that remark, did you have in your mind clubs where the firms contribute something, or clubs entirely supported by the workpeople ?—I was thinking of the latter class ; the clubs supported entirely by the workers.

3206. Have you any clubs partly supported by the employing firms ?—Yes, we have.

3207. But your remark applies to those to which the firms do not contribute ?—Yes.

3208. Did I understand you to say you thought that if payments to these clubs were separated from wages, it would be better than a deduction from wages on that account ?—Yes.

3209. In the case of Hooper, was not that what happened ?—When I said separate payments, I meant payments to the officers of the club, appointed by the workers themselves, as distinct from payments to a man's own employers. A separate sick club I understand to be one in which the officials would be appointed by the workpeople, and the payments would be made to one of the recognised officers of the club, whereas in Hooper's case the payments on behalf of the club were made to the employer.

3210. Your suggestion would, of course, involve self-government of the sick funds ?—Yes.

3211. Such a club might have no connection whatever with the employers ?—Exactly so.

3212. You would raise no objection to such a club ?—Certainly not.

3213. Indeed you think it would be good ?—So long as it was not made a condition of employment.

3214. Among the girls in the corset factories, and such places, would you say that such a club, unless there was a strong union behind it, would be likely to be a really self-governing club ?—I should not like to say that it would.

3215. Would you have great doubts about it ?—I should.

3216. I take it that unless such clubs partake of the nature you have referred to, governed by the workers themselves, with all payments made to their appointed officials, you would think that it is not well to have such clubs connected with employment ?—That is so.

3217. Your faith in the abolition of fines does not go quite so far as W. 10's case, where fines absolutely did nothing at all ?—I gave my answer in view of the present management.

3219. From your knowledge of working girls and women, do you still think that suspension would not be open to a similar abuse to fines ?—I don't think it would be open to quite the same abuse.

3220. It would, at all events, be open to the Home Office to inquire as to the fairness of suspension ?—Yes, I think it would be fairly easy to get particulars.

3221. Do you not fear that on the abolition of fines suspensions might be rapidly carried to the further stage of discharge ?—I do not think so.

3222. In any case, you think it would act as a deterrent to faults on the part of girls with regard to their work ?—Yes. I think the fact that there were other girls ready to do the work would act as a deterrent.

Mr. J. Owner.
10 July 1906.

3223. I think it was at W. 10's place where the advent of a union made such a difference so far as the sick fund was concerned? Has it been your experience that where a well-recognised union exists or has been formed it helps to the promotion of general fairness?—Yes. One does not find the same advantage taken of workers where there is a union.

3224. Is the discipline of factories interfered with prejudicially by a union?—I think not.

By Mr. Delevingne.

3225. With reference to the medical fund in W. 10's place, what was the nature of it—was it in the nature of a club?—It was only in the nature of a deduction.

3226. But I mean what was the nature of the fund?—Did the men pay weekly into it?—It was stopped from their wages.

3227. The employer is supposed to pay these deductions into the fund, is he not?—It is impossible to say what becomes of them.

3228. Was there any system or organisation about it at all? Had it even a name?—None whatever.

3229. Was it managed entirely by the employer?—Quite.

3230. You say there was no contract between the employers and the workmen, and no audit of the accounts?—None.

3231. What has happened to that fund now? Did you say that the trades union had compelled the firm to employ their own doctor?—The question of the doctor turned upon a question of fines for absence from work. The trades union representatives took the view that they could not leave their members in the hands of the firm's doctor, and they had a small strike which settled the point, and it was decided that the appointment of the doctor should be in the hands of the trades union. The firm now have fixed notice of contract, notifying what the deductions will be, and the workers have appointed a committee to manage the fund, and have appointed auditors.

3232. Is the fund now in the nature of a sick club?—Yes.

3233. Before the trades union was formed it was nothing of that sort, but was entirely in the hands of the employer, who paid the doctor?—Yes.

3234. With reference to the case of Hooper, the reason why it was dismissed by the High Court was that the Court held that either the wages had been paid in cash or had not been paid at all?—Yes.

3235. In reality, if it was anything at all, it was a non-payment of wages?—Yes. That there was no payment other than in current coin of the realm.

3236. And that if the worker had not been paid his wages in full he had the civil remedy?—Yes.

3237. Had any of them attempted to recover?—No.

3238. Were they so much in fear of employers that they accepted the deduction without question?—That is so.

3239. Was that case not decided solely upon Section 3 of the Truck Act of 1831?—Yes.

3240. Is it not the case that Section 3 of the Truck Act of 1896 was not referred to in the information, although it appeared from the proceedings that a different result might have been arrived at if that reference had been made?—Yes. I did not think it was a matter which came under section of the Act of 1896 at all. I rather took the view that it was the making of a contract under, I think, Section 2 of the Truck Act, 1831, whereby an employee was bound to spend part of his money in a certain way with the employer—that part of the wages was to be laid out.

3241. The High Court did not accept the Home Office view, that it came under the Act of 1831?—That is so.

3242. Even if the practice was made illegal the employer could effect his object by reducing the wages by the amount of the weekly payment?—Yes.

3243. That is practically what he did, for, although he handed over so much, so much was handed back to him?—The head of the firm told me that he did not consider that he had been deducting twopence; he thought the wage was 29s. 10d. The men understood that the twopence was deducted for compensation fund.

3244. Practically the effect was that when the Workmen's Compensation Act was passed the employer reduced the wages by the amount of the weekly payment?—Yes.

3245. Can you suggest any way of preventing that?—If a contract was made at the time that the men were to accept reduced wages, and the men were willing, then I do not see any means of stopping that.

3246. With regard to the medical funds, is it common amongst workers to avail themselves of the right of audit of the accounts?—I am afraid that often they do not know of it.

3247. Have you found cases where, after knowing of it, and after using it for a time, they have dropped it?—No.

3249. Is any loss or inconvenience caused to the employers by the workers arriving late?—In this case there would be practically no inconvenience at all, because each worker is engaged upon his own material, and there is no subsequent process depending upon that worker. Of course, there are cases where the absence of a leading worker might result in inconvenience and delay to others.

3250. In this case the fine exceeded the loss occasioned to the employers?—Yes. I instructed the occupier to amend the contract in that respect, and he has promised to do so.

3251. Apart from fines for being late, have you had any cases of unreasonable disciplinary fines?—No prosecutions.

3252. Have any cases been brought to your notice?—I think not.

3253. Is it common to have disciplinary fines?—They are very common.

3254. Then I understand you to say that on the whole, although common, they are not unreasonable?—I have not had complaints of their unreasonableness in the Bristol district, except in one case, where the workers were charged 2d. for three minutes' absence. The occupier has, in that instance, promised to amend.

3255. As a matter of experience, are the fines often imposed?—Yes, in some factories.

3256. Where there is a long list of fines, and they are frequently put into operation, what would you say as to these factories. Are they badly managed?—Yes; where there is a long list of fines, and they are frequently imposed, the management is invariably poor.

3257. Are the fines imposed by the foremen and forewomen or by the proprietors?—By the foremen or forewomen.

3258. At their discretion?—Yes.

3259. Does your experience chiefly lie in the weaving trade or similar industries?—It is principally in the wearing apparel trades, where there is the long list of fines.

3260. Do you mean the dressmakers and tailors?—Yes; clothiers and corset makers and underclothing makers.

3261. With regard to the question of damaged work, I gather that your evidence chiefly has reference to the weaving trade and the boot trade?—Yes.

3262. Apart from these trades, have you come across many instances of deductions for damaged work?—I have had one case of damage to a tool which was lent to a worker by his employer. The workman had an accident and he was charged the full new value of the tool, although it had been in use for four or five years. In that case the employer was proceeded against and fined. In another case a similar set of circumstances took place.

3263. How did you come to know of these cases?—From information received. One was found out upon a visit and one from complaints.

3264. That was a question of damage to the property of the employer. What about damage to the work done. Are such deductions, on the whole, fair?—I don't think they are.

3265. What action have you taken?—I have warned the occupier of the premises, who has undertaken to moderate the charges. The difficulty is to say whether the damage to goods is accidental or intentional. The workers invariably take the view that it is accidental, whereas the employers often think it is intentional.

3266. What the Act refers to is neglect or carelessness or bad workmanship, and no deduction can be made for accidental damage?—Quite so, but in some boot firms the men are charged for damage irrespective of the condition of the materials used.

3267. Have you been able at all to go into that and to test whether the men's contention is a true one that the damage is due to the material?—It is exceedingly difficult to get sufficient evidence to warrant us in taking up a case.

3268. Why?—Because the worker often refrains altogether from giving us evidence. One may see the boots and make enquiry of the foreman, but the very worker concerned very often fails to give us material and essential evidence.

3269. Does he break down in the witness-box?—No, before we get to that stage. In taking his declaration or proof he will often turn round in order to avoid giving evidence against his employer.

3270. Afraid of being dismissed?—Yes, or afraid of not having other work given to him.

3271. With regard to meal rooms, I understand you were in favour of prohibiting any deduction at all for the use of them?—Yes.

3272. You are, of course, aware that there is no provision in the Factory Act to compel employers to provide meal rooms?—Yes.

3273. Would it not be rather an inconvenience to the workers in many cases if the meal room, which is now provided for their use, was shut up?—Yes, I think it would.

3274. When an employer voluntarily provides conveniences of that sort for his workpeople, it may be generous of him to provide such accommodation for nothing, but if he chooses to make a small charge to cover the outlay or the upkeep, is that unreasonable?—The difficulty I would have is to determine what is a fair charge, and what the original outlay has been.

3275. Is not the usual charge 1d. per week?—One finds such a varying quality of attendance provided for that.

3276. You could not charge much less?—I don't think so.

3277. Does 1d. strike you as unreasonable for the use of the room, hot water, etc?—It may be so in case of small workers who earn only about 3s. or 4s. a week.

3278. Of course the worker is not bound to use these conveniences?—No, but the workers are usually charged for them in any case.

3279. The instruction given by the Home Office to inspectors is not to allow such deductions as against those who have not used the conveniences?—Yes. But cases arise where the charge has been made.

3280. The idea is that those who do not use the mess room should not be bound to pay for it. That view has been laid before certain firms, who have promised to exempt those who do not use the meal room.

3281. I do not quite appreciate your objection to any deduction under that head?—I think a meal room is part of the convenience that one might fairly expect an employer to provide for his workers.

3282. But you know he is not compelled to do it at present?—No.

Mr. J. Owner.

3283. If he chooses to do it voluntarily for the benefit of his workers, would you deprive them of the convenience by refusing to let the employer make a moderate charge for it?—The difficulty is to say what is a fair charge.

10 July 1906.

3284. Have you had any experience of the working of the Shop Clubs Act?—No.

3285. You have not come across it?—No.

3286. Do you know its provisions?—Quite well.

3287. Have you had any complaints on the subject?—No.

3288. Do you know who carries it out in your district?—No one, so far as I know.

3289. With regard to the Kingswood Boot firms, you said the employers sell the nails to the men at the same price at which the men could buy these nails in a shop outside?—Yes.

3290. And I suppose if they make a profit in the shop on the sale, the masters are overcharging the men?—One expects the shop to make a profit. But one cannot say whether these particular nails may be a leading line sold cheaply to attract custom for other goods.

3291. Have you been able to make any enquiries about that?—I have made enquiries, but have not been able to trace the actual price which any particular man is paying.

3292. Is there any difficulty about finding out the ordinary outside price of a thing of this sort?—I think not.

3293. Have you not been able to find out the ordinary outside price?—I tried it in the case of one man, but the local men held that the charge was reasonable.

3294. The point is that the charge to their workmen must not exceed the cost to the employer?—It is difficult to find out what an individual employer is paying for a particular brand of goods.

3295. Primâ facie, if he is charging the same as a shop, he must be overcharging, for he no doubt buys wholesale and at a lower price than the retail price?—Yes; but he says he has to go to considerable expense in booking and weighing and packing, etc.

3296. He takes establishment charges into account?—Yes, and says he is only just recouping himself by charging what the shop charges.

3297. Does he supply a better article than the shop?—About the same.

3298. Is it a convenience to the men to get the nails at their employers?—Yes; it may be a slight convenience, inasmuch as they do not have to pay for them until the end of the week.

3299. Have you not taken any action with regard to the supply of nails?—No. prosecution.

3300. In one case you said that an employer, with reference to cotton, denied that he was allowed a trade discount, but afterwards admitted a mistake in that respect, and you said you thought the system still went on under different circumstances, which it is often difficult to investigate. Will you kindly explain that?—I have been to the factory since, and have found no deduction of any kind from the workers' wages. They are put upon day work rates and no deduction, but I have had some information from a reliable source which points to the fact that he is still making some deduction although apparently giving them a clean book.

3301. How?—I have not had time to investigate it.

3302. That might come under the Truck Act?—Yes.

By Mr. Yarrow.

3303. I think you referred to some ideal and well-managed firm who have done away with fines?—Yes.

3304. If one firm can manage so well without fines, have you ever suggested to other firms in the same business that they should abandon fines?—Yes.

3305. And what do they say?—That they cannot do without them.

3306. Do they not give any specific reason?—They simply say we cannot do without fines.

Mr. J. Owner.
10 July 1906.

3307. If fines were made illegal, do you think there would be great opposition from the employers ?—Yes; from a certain class of employers.

3308. In your reply to a question by Mr. Macdonald about the Hooper case—that of deducting 2d. as payment for insurance under the Workmen's Compensation Act, you said the workers did not know they would have to pay that until the end of the week came. Do not you think it would be a good thing for everybody before entering the employment to know exactly what the conditions are ?—I do.

3309. But in particular cases you think it is very likely that many of them do not know ?—There were no means of informing them until the first pay day arrived.

3310. You think, however, it would be a good thing in every case for the worker who seeks employment to be made distinctly aware of the conditions as to fines, etc. ?—Certainly.

3311. Do you think it would be feasible to have the conditions posted up in some conspicuous place outside the factory, so that there would be no excuse if applicants for work do not read them, or they might be printed on a slip and a copy given to every worker taken on. Would there be any harm in such an expedient ?—I think not. We have it done under the Truck Act. The employees are entitled to a copy of the contract.

3312. Do the employers in your experience subscribe liberally to the sick clubs, or are such clubs usually dependent upon the subscriptions of the working members ?—Generally the firms subscribe.

3313. Then it is surely a good thing to have such clubs in connection with works and factories, so far at least as the subscriptions of the employers are concerned, for if these clubs were abandoned that benefit would be lost ?—True.

3314. If it were not compulsory to subscribe to a doctor do you think the average workers would be thrifty enough to subscribe to any such funds ?—Yes, I think the majority belong to some friendly society.

3315. Still, that society would be in no way financed by the employer, as it would lose his help ?—The amount of subscriptions from the firms I have come across is very small per worker.

By the Chairman.

3316. With reference to your replies to Mr. Delevingne about the meal rooms, I suppose it is almost a necessary part of that system that all the workers have to pay a small contribution for the meal rooms, whether they take advantage of them or not ?—That is so.

3317. If a worker who makes separate arrangements were to take action against that charge on the ground that she does not want the use of a meal room and object to the deduction, might not that cause a situation in which the employer would reply that he does not want such a troublesome worker ?—I think that is exceedingly likely.

3318. Is that one of the elements in your mind in thinking that so trifling a convenience should be open to all without charge or deduction ?—Yes.

3319. You do not think the upshot would be harmful to the employer ?—I do not think so.

3320–3321. You mentioned that you had a long list of fines. Do you feel free to show that to this Committee ?—I have not got one of the long lists with me.

3322. We will take precautions with regard to names, and unless there has been a prosecution the firm can be denoted by a letter ?—Quite so.

FOURTEENTH DAY.

Thursday, 12th July, 1906.

PRESENT.

The Right Hon. Thomas Shaw, K.C., M.P., Lord Advocate of Scotland (Chairman).

E. A. Brotherton, Esq., M.P.
Frederick Cawley, Esq., M.P.
Malcolm Delevingne, Esq.
Mrs. H. J. Tennant.

T. E. Bettany, Esq. (Secretary).

Mr. ARCHIBALD NEWLANDS, was called; and Examined.

Mr. A. Newlands.
12 July 1906.

By the Chairman.

3323. You are a district inspector of factories ?—Yes.

3324. You are stationed at Edinburgh ?—Yes.

3325. We are anxious to have any experience and knowledge that you have with regard to the practice of truck in the Orkneys and Shetland and the Hebrides and the West of Scotland. Would you tell me what has been your experience in the Home Office since joining the Department ?—I joined the Department in 1894; I was in Manchester over a year, then at Glasgow for several years.

3326. In what capacity ?—As junior inspector. Then I was appointed to the North of Scotland. I was district inspector in 1899. Then in May of this year I was appointed in charge of the Edinburgh division.

3327. In succession to whom ?—Captain Kindersley, retired.

3328. The period of your actual experience in the north is from 1899 to 1906 ?—Yes.

3329. You know the object of this Committee; you know that we are to enquire into the practice of truck, and fines and deductions from wages. Would you tell me about your visits to the outlying portions of Scotland. You visited Shetland in May, 1901 ?—Yes.

3330. What is the class of workers that you visited there ?—I visited a large number of cotters—fifty who were employed making shawls and other hosiery, and about eighteen to twenty merchants.

3331. Were these in various parts of Shetland ?—Yes, all over.

3332. In the various islands ?—In the islands and on the mainland.

3333. Do you think that you have obtained a general experience of the working of the system in Shetland ?—Yes, I think I have.

3334. Over what period did your visits extend ?—I first spent about a week in 1900; then I spent about three weeks in 1901 and about fourteen days in 1902.

3335. Engaged in the same enquiry ?—Yes.

3336. Did you find a system existing of payment to hosiery workers in goods ?—Yes.

3337. To a large extent ?—Almost universal.

3338. Now, will you describe to me the class of people who do that work. You call them cotters. What is their kind of dwelling ?—Simply a small cottage—the ordinary thatched cottage you meet with in Scotland, with a small croft attached.

3339. A small patch of land ?—Yes.

3340. And the inmates—the family?—Often you find the men attending to the croft—two or three acres of ground ; sometimes they are engaged in local fishing, and the wife does a little shawl work ; occasionally you find that the shawl industry is the sole means of support for the family.

3341. Is that on account of the age of the husband ?—Sometimes on account of the age, or it may be, of course, through his death ; there are a number of widows among this fishing population.

3342. Then there is a family of children, I suppose ?—Yes, generally.

3343. Is it stone and lime house ?—Stone and lime walls.

3344. What about the cattle—the beasts; where are they kept ?—In Shetland we have no cattle housing ; that is all outside.

3345. Does that small class of tenant farm ponies at all ?—The pony trade is dying down.

3346. How is the raw material supplied to these people ?—In Shetland the sheep are not shorn in the usual way ; they drop their wool and it is caught by the heather and brambles ; the fleece would drop naturally ; the people gather the wool that is left on the thorns and the heather, etc. It may be "collected" in the usual form from the sheep direct—or occasionally purchased from merchants.

3347. At certain seasons, of course, there will be a great deal of that ?—Yes.

3348. So that you may say it is their own wool ?—That is so.

3349. Having thus got the raw material, they proceed to what is known as the Shetland knitting ?—Yes, carding and spinning.

3350. Do they do that in their own dwellings too ?—Yes, entirely.

3351. In fact it comes from the sheep's back to the man's back, you may say ?—That is so.

3352. Besides Shetland shawls, are there other kinds of goods ?—Yes, all kinds of work is done.

3353. Can you tell me anything about patterns ; do they work to any particular pattern or is it a native design ?—a purely native design ; in fact it is said that the woman does not know what her shawl will be like when she starts.

3355. Does the knowledge descend from generation to generation ?—Yes.

3356. Then having made the shawl or article of apparel they proceed with it to where ?—To the nearest merchant, or possibly to Lerwick or Scalloway and sell it.

3357. Were those the class of merchants whose establishments you inspected ?—Yes.

3358. What is the system adopted by these merchants ?—The woman brings the hosiery in ; it is valued ; then she is asked what she wants for it.

3359. What would be the size of shawl ?—It varies from one to seven yards.

3360. Take the ordinary size of shawl, not a very large size—say one yard square. She has wrought it and she has supplied the raw material and then she sells it ?—Yes.

3361. What is that valued at ?—There are so many differences in Shetland shawls that it is almost impossible to say off-hand what the value of a shawl one yard square would be. The finer knitted shawl, what is known as the Shetland lace shawl, is a very expensive shawl ; it may run, for a yard square, up to £1 ; but the ordinary rough soft wool, what is known in the trade as a "hap" is a very cheap commodity ; for a yard square the value would be possibly 1s. 6d.

3362. That is larger in the stitch than the lace shawl ?—Yes, and the wool, of course, is very much finer for the lace shawls—very very fine indeed. That is the difficulty with making a shawl ; the difficulty is not so much in knitting the shawls as in carding the native wool so finely.

3363. All that seems to suggest, at least when you come to the finer qualities, that there is a very great deal of not only skill but experience and attention required ?—Yes.

3364. Then having taken the article, whether fine or not, to the merchant, you say it is valued ?—Yes.

3365. Then she is asked what she will have ?—Yes ; she is asked what she will take.

3366. Then she has the selection of the goods ?—Yes.

3367. Are these goods always at ordinary shop prices ?—Unfortunately no, they are not.

3368. Will you explain how that is ?—There are two prices for all articles in some of the shops. What is known as the two-price system is practised. A cash buyer can buy for considerably less than a knitter can get in truck transactions. That varies as much as 10 to 25 per cent. on the price of the goods.

3369. I am sorry that I do not quite follow you. You say there are two prices ?—Two prices. If a woman brings in a shawl and she takes a pound of sugar and a pound of tea as part payment for the shawl, she will be charged 3¼d. or 3½d. a pound for the sugar, and 2s. 6d. a pound for the tea. If I came in to buy the same goods I could get the sugar at 2¾d. and the tea at 2s. a pound. With regard to drapery goods usually there is 1d. a yard difference in the price, and in flannel 2d. a yard.

3370. Dearer to the worker ?—Dearer to the worker.

3371. Will you tell me, are those workers free to take the money at which the goods are valued ?—No. There is 20 per cent. taken off the price of hosiery if cash is taken, and they can only get cash occasionally, that is to say, they cannot make a practice of taking cash in every transaction.

3372. Tell me the districts in which this practice prevails. Your enquiries covered the islands of South Ronaldshay—— ?—That is the Orkney group. In Orkney they work no shawls.

3373. What parts of Shetland did you visit ?—The islands of Unst, Whalsay, and Bressay. Then on the mainland we visited from Hillswick to Dunrosness.

3374. The practice that you have described is found throughout ?—Yes.

3375. In those remote islands is there a little merchant in each of them ?—Yes, there are merchants scattered all over the place ; they have very small places. Of course that two-price system is not universal ; it is met with, but it is not universal in Shetland.

3376. Now the price at which it is valued represents goods nominally to that value, but really to about 10 to 20 per cent. less ?—That is so.

3377. And if it is cash, instead of that nominal price they get 20 per cent. less ?—20 per cent. off, yes.

3378. Is that what you call the twoprice system ?—No ; that I would hold as a certain commission or exchange. The two-price system lies in commodities being priced differently in the shop between the outside buyer and the knitter ; for instance, in the case of tea and sugar that I exemplified.

3379. It is two prices for what is given as the wage ?—Yes.

3380. Does that system suggest to you any means of remedy ?—Yes, absolute cash transactions for everything.

3381. Suppose it was cash transactions for everything, the cash would just be so much less, would it not ?—It is questionable. Arising from those visits paid, I took some action to stop truck in Shetland, and we were fairly successful to a certain extent. Every merchant in the islands was written to and a copy of the

Mr. A. Newland.

Home Office memorandum on the Truck Acts sent and correspondence invited should they meet with difficulty. The next year when we visited we found a decided diminution of truck; no hardship was spoken of; the price was at its normal level, that is to say, take a spencer; that was at 1s. 9d. and 1s. 10d. level still; the folks were now getting 1s. 9d. and 1s. 10d. in cash for the spencers, whereas in former years they were getting 1s. 9d. and 1s. 10d. in goods for the spencers. The experience we have is that insisting on cash payment did not injure the trade in the way of altering prices.

3382. Had you to take prosecutions in such cases?—In 1902, I think, I investigated and brought before the notice of the Procurator Fiscal a certain case of continued truck.

3383. And did a prosecution result?—Yes, and the man pleaded guilty, and was fined.

3384. Tell me under what category the prosecution could be had there?—I really do not know what section the Procurator Fiscal took his action under.

3385. Was it the Procurator Fiscal in Lerwick?—Yes.

3386. That was in the year 1902?—In July or August, 1902. It was the case of William Pole.

3387. Of course, these proceedings will be extant; the Fiscal of Lerwick will be able to supply us with information as to that?—I imagine so 3388 Then you say the result was immediate improvement?—Yes.

3389. Does the faulty system exist yet, or have you eradicated it?—There was a considerable improvement in 1903 or 1904, but I believe, from later unofficial reports received, things are going back again.

3390. What I want to get at is this. Apparently you were able by prosecution to hit the system?—Yes.

3391. There seems to be no impediment to the Home Office proceeding in that way again?—Yes, I think there is; there is a double difficulty to the Home Office proceeding. First, the hosiery workers are not outworkers, nor can we hold the shopkeepers as contractors. We have no remedy. Our powers are limited by Section 14 of the Act of 1896 to outworkers and contractors.

3392. That was the reason for my question to you to begin with as to how you were able to hit them in the previous proceedings?—By reporting to the Procurator Fiscal and leaving him a free hand. He has the powers under Section 10 of the Act of 1887.

3393. The point I want you to inform us about is, why you could not operate your remedy in the same way now; Section 10 is still operative?—That is so; that is to say, all we could do then is to report the matter to the local authority. The places are really not within our jurisdiction; the knitters are not outworkers.

By Mr. Delevingne.

3394. What you mean is that the factory inspector has no power under the Act to inspect and make enquiries?—Exactly.

By the Chairman.

3395. That is to say they could have turned you out if you had gone in?—Probably, yes.

3396. This transaction in 1902 was a casual thing which had come to your knowledge?—Mr. Cooke Taylor, the superintendent, and myself visited Pole's shop to make enquiries as to what action had been taken to stop truck. They did not attend to us at the time; we stood in the shop for an hour before we were attended to, and during that time we were witnesses to a number of truck transactions. We took action with regard to this one.

3397. Do you think that the system which you succeeded at the time in partially putting down was a bad system for the workers?—Oh, yes.

3399. By force do you mean under the penalty of 20 per cent. off?—Yes.

3400. She may not want the goods to the full value?—That is so. And the consequence is that on more than one occasion we found that where the money was really wanted and the woman could not afford the deduction of 20 per cent. she accepted goods to the full value of a shawl in packets of tea, and hawked that tea round the country so as to make up the value of the shawl by the sale of the tea to cottars.

3401. That came within your own experience, did it?—Yes.

3402. Then I think you found a system of merchants issuing cheques or tickets which entitled the bearer on demand to receive the face value of the goods at any time?—That is so.

3403. Then did you find bartering in these tickets going on?—Yes, we found that the tickets were bartered quite frequently; especially is this the case in the island of Unst.

3404. You knew, I think, of one knitter who had a cheque for 12s. 6d. and sold it for 11s. 9d.?—She sold it for 11s., and then it was sold again to another for 11s. 9d.

3405. Do you think it would be any advantage if instructions were issued to the authorities in Shetland to keep an eye on those practices?—Yes.

3406. In your judgment has there been any laxity of administration?—I know of no administation exercised by the local authorities in Shetland.

3407. And by the local authorities you include the others?—Yes, they profess that they are desirous of stopping it, and in an interview I had with the Procurator Fiscal he put forward this. I have an extract of the interview that I had with him, if you would care for me to read it.

3408. We should be glad to hear it?—"There has been no prosecution for at least ten years." This examination was taken by me in 1901: "There has been no prosecution for at least ten years in Shetland for violation of the Truck Acts. This is not in any way due to the diminution of activity on the part of the officials, nor to the want of desire to put an end to the practice, but to the difficulty in proving a case. Proof cannot be obtained. He is quite aware that the system is prevalent; in fact, that scarcely any other exists. He quite recognises the evil, and expresses himself as delighted to have the co-operation of other officials in putting a stop to the evil. He fears that the violations are far too numerous and widespread, and, having the sympathy of the people, would be very difficult, if not impossible, to put down entirely."

3409. That refers to having the sympathy of the people. Do the people understand this hardship?—Some do, some do not. They have known no other style of business. In the small country districts they never get cash, always goods. There is no question of price at all in the smaller country districts. They do not realise the hardship, because the shawl is simply knitted to get so many petticoats or so much tea and sugar and so on.

3410. Do you think that that substantially results in the impoverishment of the people?—It tends to it.

3411. It tends substantially to the impoverishment of the people?—Yes.

3412. I now ask you this. The law, if enforced, in your judgment, could hit transactions of that kind?—Yes.

3413. But it fails to be enforced by the General Criminal Authority of the country?—Yes. There is evidence here from one who was long connected with the trade. I do not know whether you would desire me to read it.

3414. Yes, we would be glad?—"Does nothing in hosiery now, knows many hosiery workers take goods they do not require, but must take them, as merchants do not care to give cash."

3415. We must ask you for the name of that person?—The name is [Al.] "The stoppage of truck will not injure the trade; only a rearrangement between the manufacturers and consumers is required. Knew truck system when everything in the whole island was truck, and considered it very bad indeed. The hosiery trade is under-paid and carried on under worst conditions; hosiery working yields about 1d. an hour to the knitter, and is generally only a supplementary wage. There is no doubt goods are much higher in price in truck shops; tea, one pound, bought at 1s. 6d. sold cash for 1s. 8d. to 1s. 10d. is sold by hosiery under truck at 2s. 6d. The girls get bedizened" (that is a local expression) "with dress because as a rule they have to take drapery."

3416. Is that man alive ?—Yes.

3417. Up to this point then we may take it that the Shetland case is a case for better administration even of the law as it stands ?—Yes.

3418. Now take the Orkney case. Where did you visit in Orkney ?—The islands of South Ronaldshay and Burray and Hoy, the mainland of Orkney from St. Mary's in the south-east to Bursay in the north-west: the inlad of Shapinsay, Stronsay, Sanday, Eday, and Westray.

3419. What is the system prevailing there ?—The Orkneys are almost entirely clear from truck; there is no shawl-making or tweed making or any home industry that might tend to give rise to truck; it is purely barter of dairy produce, with two exceptions, in Westray. That is an island separated about seven hours' sail due north of Kirkwall; it is certainly in the condition described by Sheriff Guthrie when he visited it in 1892; the whole place is truck; there is very little currency in the place.

3420. What are the trades that they work there ?—Everything. A joiner may be hired to build a byre or repair a byre by a farmer; he is paid by so many potatoes or boles of meal. If he makes boxes or anything of that kind for a merchant, he is paid in so much tea and sugar. The whole system is the same. Then in the fishing we meet the same thing. Of course, in neither of these cases is that within our scope of action.

3421. Now, did you visit the Fiscal in connection with that ?—Yes.

3422. As well as in conection with Shetland ?—Yes; it was a different Fiscal. of course. This is Mr. Howman, the Procurator-Fiscal at Kirkwall.

3423. What was the result of your interview with him ?—He said he would act. I was at Westray last year, in May, 1905, and I found that the action I had taken regarding the fish curing, had had a certain result; it had certainly lessened truck, and the other minor details of truck I found had stopped in Westray; but for the local tradesmen, they were still being paid in kind.

3424. With regard to the local tradesmen and the fish curing, that is a case where there is a direct relation of employer and workman ?—I hardly think so.

3425. Will you just explain that to us ?—The merchant is the employer if possible, if the employment comes in at all. The merchant employs this small tradesman who works alone to make a certain egg-box, and in that sense he is the employer for the time being, but he is only the employer so long as that egg-box is being made.

3426. The wages for making that egg-box are paid in kind instead of in coin ?—The man being in business for himself, it is hardly a question of wages so much as a certain amount of money due.

3427. There again it is not exactly a case where you, as an Home Office official, have jurisdiction ?—No, we cannot touch it.

3428. That seems to have been your trouble all through ?—That is the entire trouble.

3429. Suppose all this had been completely within your jurisdiction as an inspector under the Home Office, do you think you could have extirpated this system by this time ?—Well, it would certainly be very much improved. I could not guarantee for the extermination of the system, but the systematic visiting that we had during two years certainly gave us the impression that we could have exterminated it.

3430. Can you give me with regard to the class of population in Shetland who work in soft goods what their weekly earnings would be, or weekly profits, if they were steadily occupied ?—This note that I have here may possibly give an index. B1, a worker at Roadside, Baltasound. Her evidence is: "Her sister and she work together; they spin their own wool; shawls and haps made; used to work for her late Majesty, Queen Victoria; except to private customers all hosiery is disposed of by truck; she knows that a quarter of the value is deducted when cash is paid; her husband has been an invalid, and in order to get him proper medicine, she has been forced to take cash of late where she could get it, and has had to send shawls to Lerwick and North Sound. A certain merchant in North Sound has a shawl for three months back for sale from her and for which she hopes to get 25s.; a shawl of this value would take six weeks constant knitting; her sister doing the housework in the meantime."

3431. The result would be about 4s. or 5s. a week earnings ?—Yes. That is fine work. B1 is one of the known good makers of shawls. The fine work cannot be worked at constantly. The coarse work will be better paid because you can work at it constantly; that is to say, per week it would be better paid.

3432. Would the wages run up to about 8s. ?—I expect that would be about the maximum.

3433. So that from 4s. to 8s. is what could be earned by prolonged industry ?—Yes.

3434. Could you give us any idea how we could get at the system prevalent at present. I wish to ask you quite plainly. Do not you think it expedient that we should cite the Procurator Fiscals of Shetland and Orkney, and ask an explanation of the local position and of the inaction of the criminal authorities ?—Well, so far as Mr. Howman, the Procurator Fiscal of Orkney, is concerned, there is so very little, except in Westray itself, of truck going on in Orkney; but as to Mr. Galloway (I think the name is), the Procurator Fiscal in Lerwick, he must know, and does know, of the violations that are occurring. I should say that in his evidence that I took, at the same time, he made no hiding that he knew all about it.

3435. He is still alive, is he ?—I think so; Mr. Kirkland Galloway.

3436. It is no part of your province to suggest, and you do not suggest, any failure in proper administration; all that you do is, that you call our attention to the subject in order that we may make inquiries ?—That is so. I have nothing to do with the local authorities.

3437. You wish your evidence to be read in that way—that you would be glad of the co-operation of the Fiscals in these districts, if they could see their way to give it to you ?—That is so.

3438. But that, so far as making any suggestion that the matter is not properly looked after, that is not at all within your province or your wish ?—That is so.

3439. Now the result of these transactions in or about the year 1902 was this, you casually obtained this information, and you thought it your duty to communicate with the Procurator Fiscal; one prosecution was instituted, and finally you met the various merchants and obtained promises that a change would be made ?—That is so.

3440. Do you know whether any additional step was taken by the Procurator Fiscal in communicating with these merchants ?—Nothing that I know of.

3441. Did you find your difficulties added to by the Irish decision in the year 1903 in regard to out-workers ?—That is so; that did not help matters.

3442. Then under the recent decision in Squire v. The Midland Lace Co., the Truck Acts are found to be powerless to meet the case of out-workers ?—That is so.

3443. Have you any opinion with regard to that. Do you think that the law ought to be rectified in that particular, so as to bring outworkers under the protection of the Truck Acts ?—I think it should.

3444. Now come forward a year or two. In May, 1905, you were in Orkney, were you not ?—Yes.

3445. And you found that the truck practices which you have referred to had lessened, but had not stopped ?—That is so.

3446. Then as to Shetland, the prosecution did good for a time, but you fear that it has relapsed to the old condition ?—Yes, it is much the same as the old conditions, at least it is tending that way.

3447. Almost as bad as in 1900 ?—Yes, it is tending that way.

3448. Before we leave Shetland, let me ask you this. Is there any co-operative movement or trade or worker union or organisation ?—None that I know of. There is no organisation among the workers.

Mr. A. Newlands.

12 July 1906.

3449. Do you think that if that could be taken in hand, whether officially or by way of kindness, by people of good standing in the country, that might have some advantage for the workers ?—Well, I would not like to express an opinion on that.

3450. Are you aware of the services of the Duchess of Sutherland in connection with some of these industries —I am aware of that.

3451. There has been nothing of the kind in Shetland ? —Yes, lately. She sometimes buys shawls.

3452. Is that done through those merchants ?—Yes, according to my information.

3453. So that it really does not touch the actual worker and his or her condition ?—Not in Shetland.

3454. Now the next part of your evidence is with regard to the Hebrides. In 1901 and 1902 you made an inquiry in the Hebrides with regard to the Harris tweed trade ?—That is so.

3455. And you made inquiries with reference to payments in goods to the native workers of Harris tweed in the Hebrides ?—That is so.

3456. The manufacture, I believe, has undergone some alteration ?—Yes.

3457. Formerly native wool was collected, and the whole process, including the carding, dyeing, spinning, weaving and shrinking, was carried on in the homes of the workers ?—That is so.

3458. Did that practice prevail in your time ?—No.

3459. It has ceased ?—Yes.

3460. Owing to the demand for the fabric and the decrease in the number of native sheep, you find that the native wool forms only a very small proportion of what is used ?—That is so.

3461. This native wool used to be carded in mills erected for the purpose ?—Yes; two being in Harris and one in Stornoway.

3462. But the wool carded even in these mills was not exclusively native, a very large proportion of it being Cheviot and other wools ?—Cheviot and Blackface and other wools bought in the open market.

3463. Then in addition many merchants in the townships and in the country were buying wool that had been carded, dyed, and spun in Bradford, and so distributed by these merchants to the natives to be woven ?—Yes.

3464. So that it was Harris tweed only in the sense that it was tweed woven in Harris and Lewes ?—That is so. Especially so where the yarn has been bought from merchants.

3465. In connection, however, with the industry as carried on, there was the introduction of the outworking system ?—Scarcely. It is difficult exactly to define whether they are out-workers or not. I will describe the system of the trade, and you will possibly follow it from that. Take A, a merchant; B, the spinner, may come and buy a certain amount of wool from him; that is a transaction pure and simple, though not cash; it is debited to B in A's books; B takes this wool home; he will pick it, clean it, and dye it, and then send it to a mill and have it carded.

3466. B being a worker ?—No; the carding is done in the mill, for which B pays a certain amount of money for, say so many stones of wool being carded; then after he has his wool delivered to him, he spins it into yarn, and may take it to a weaver and that weaver weaves for B—we will call the weaver C—C weaves for B. When it is woven at the full breadth, 34 inches, it is sent back to B, who shrinks it—"waulks" it, as it is called—and finishes and takes it to the merchant A. Now, there is no possibility of holding B as an out-worker to A, because B is not bound to return the finished cloth to A; it is purely a cash transaction; B is not at all employed by A. C, on the other hand, is employed by B. There we have the trace of out-working.

3467. It is a sort of sub-contract ?—Just so.

3468. And, of course, that would be a case where you would have jurisdiction if you had not had Squire v. Midland Lace Co. and cases like that ?—There are other things besides that. The difficulty is great with Harris tweed. Section 10 of the Act of 1887 limits the value to things under £5. Now, a web of cloth would be 48 to 60 yards long; they get from 1s. 10d. to 2s. 2d. a yard for it; that makes it over £5. The article therefore is over £5 in value, and the Truck Act does not apply.

3469. Have you any opinion with regard to the expediency of abolishing that limit ?—I have no personal knowledge myself of the reason for this limit in those districts; I do not see why there should be a limit.

3470. But do you think that the prosecution if it had not been obstructed by the Statute would have done good to these people ?—I think it would.

3471. Now that out-worker is paid in what way ?—C is paid by cash by B.

3472. Then I do not see where your prosecution would come in ?—From our Department no; from other public authorities, yes.

3473. Why, if it is paid in cash ?—But the prosecution against A for his dealings with B would come in—against the merchant for his dealings with the seller of the wool —under Section 10.

3474. Because A did not pay to B in cash ?—No, he pays a part in cash. It is a most peculiar system. When B returns his web it is examined to see that the dyes are uniform and the cloth is fairly well woven; a price is named, and should he agree to accept that price he will get from 6d. to 1s. (varying according to the stuff) per Highland yard—the Highland yard is 8 feet; he will get from 6d. to 1s. per Highland yard in cash, that being looked upon as the amount of money B requires to pay to C; all the other value is taken in goods.

3476. The same as in Shetland ?—Yes.

3477. What class of population is B ?—Very often cotters, and C is very often a squatter.

3478. Still the cotter B is able apparently to manage a pretty complicated commercial transaction ?—Yes.

3479. He must be a person of at least average intelligence ?—Well, they manage to muddle through, although their intelligence does not strike one.

3480. If the law could get at a transaction of that kind, do you think it would be advisable that it should ? —Yes, I think so; at least in the Harris tweed trade, I think, it should be stopped.

3481. The net wage payable to B is the goods that B gets from A ?—Yes.

3483. It would be presumably rather over the wage of the Shetland worker ?—Oh yes, decidedly. If a weaver works all the time, he can make 18s. a week, roughly speaking—at least that is my information from workers themselves.

3484. Then is that the nominal value of the goods ?— How do you mean ?

3485. I am still on B; is 18s. the nominal value of the goods that he gets from A ?—No; that is the wage of the weaver.

3486. But what would B make in a week ?—I would hardly like to estimate that.

3487. At all events, it is the same principle of paying, shall we say, 20 per cent. off the cash ?—15 per cent. to 20 per cent., as in Shetland.

3488. Then did you interview the merchants about this system ?—I did.

3489. What was their attitude ?—They all acknowledge truck. They say that they cannot see how they are to exist if we abolish it. That is the same attitude as was taken by the Shetland merchants. It was found, of course, by experience that they could exist perfectly well.

3490. They did in 1902 and onwards do very well?—Yes.

3491. I forgot to ask you this. In 1902 and immediately following that, when your intervention secured the alteration of the system, did you find that that lowered the net wage paid?—There was some difficulty for the first two or three months I understand; but when I returned next year to make an investigation myself, I found that the prices were normal, and that the payments were in cash instead of as formerly in goods.

3492. So that your intervention substantially resulted in raising the wages of the workers?—That is so.

3493. Making the nominal sum a real sum instead of under a deduction of 20 per cent?—That is so.

3494. Does the two price system prevail in the Lewis?—Yes—at least frequently found.

3495. More than in Shetland?—Yes. Perhaps I may read you some evidence that I have on the two price system. This is with regard to the case of C1. "Wife spins incidentally; sells in Stornaway; truck to be met with; merchandise cheaper if bought by cash; 1d. per pound sometimes on sugar; other things in like proportion." That holds all over; it is the same thing. I made during that year 128 visits to workers in this district. I should say that in 75 per cent. of the cases I visited there was truck.

3496. Then I believe to such an extent was that system of truck prevalent in the Hebrides that you found the largest wholesale dealers in Harris tweed were tea merchants in Edinburgh and Glasgow?—That is so.

3497. They got Harris tweed; they sent the tea to these people in the islands?—Yes.

3499. At the beginning of the transaction what do the agents give out; do they give out anything?—Tea.

3500. That is in payment, but I mean what do they give out before the contract?—Nothing.

3501. So that they are just buying goods for goods?—That is so.

3502. These people have nothing to do with the conditions under which the goods are manufactured?—Nothing.

3503. Who is the person responsible for that?—Except in the case of outworkers—and even then—they come under the local authority. I should say the local authority are responsible for the conditions, both the sanitary and the truck conditions.

3504. And by that you include the police, who should report under Section 10?—That is so.

3505. Did your visit succeed in suppressing this in any way?—No.

3506. Do you think that still up to the present time about 75 per cent. of the whole trade in the Hebrides is done in truck?—The superintendent of police estimated this year that he thought at least 60 per cent. of the tweed was bought by truck; I think that is very much of an under-estimate.

3507. Now I want to put this general question to you. In those remote districts, whether in the Hebrides with Harris tweed trade, or in Shetland with the shawl trade, have these people any option except to deal with these shops?—In Shetland there is one shop that runs on a pure cash basis. That is the shop of D 1. I have this note. "Purchases hosiery for cash only; one of the evils of the truck system is the charging of very high profits in exchange; saw material in Glasgow recently sold at 3½d. per yard, that is material such as flannel; the same was sold in Shetland at 1s.; sometimes supplies worsted for knitters, especially those who cannot spin owing to illness. In this case she pays in cash for the labour done; often pleased to accept, and does accept goods when she has no cash to pay for them; worker has to be out of cash sometimes for weeks; they are willing to do this rather than go to the truck shops when cash is wanted; often ladies visiting poor people give orders to them for shawls more than can be supplied; the cotters then go to the truck merchant and make up their order, generally giving a small commission."

3508. Did you say that in some cases the flannel was valued over to these people at 1s. a yard when the material was sold for 3½d. per yard?—That is D1's evidence to me. I have here a sample of the accounts of some of the merchants, and certainly flannel is quoted fairly high.

3509. Where did you get that sample of accounts?—The merchants offered it.

3510. Could you give one of these accounts?—Certainly.

3511. You have authenticated this account as being a real account?—Yes. (Witness handed in the following samples.)

3512. What are the items that you call attention to in the account?—The frequency of purchases of tea would almost lead one to suspect the hawking of tea according to several of these accounts. Let me refer to one account that I have here. There is something like 24s. 6d. made up as follows; tea, 1st February; tea, 16th February; flannel, 1st March; tea, 1st March; tea, 12th March; tea, 20th March; tea in May, and a petticoat. Taking it generally, on examining these accounts we were struck with the amount of tea that was supplied, far in excess of what we would expect in even Shetlanders.

By Mrs. Tennant.

3513. It seems to me that in all circumstances the worker is heavily penalised. If she is inconvenient enough to want money she has to lose to the extent of about 20 per cent. off the nominal value?—15 to 20 per cent.

3514. And if, on the other hand, she is convenient enough to want or to be ready to accept goods, she seems to me to be penalised even to a higher extent?—That is so in certain cases, but not universally.

3515. From 20 per cent. to 33 per cent.?—Yes, up to 33 per cent. in the case of one of the merchants.

3516. She receives tea which really only has the value of 1s. 8d. a pound. It is sold at 2s. 6d.?—Yes.

3517. That amounts to about 33 per cent.?—Yes, pretty nearly.

3518. Now I find it hard to reconcile the statement you read out from the procurator fiscal that there would possibly be some difficulty in enforcing the law because of the sympathy of the workers with the system, with the fact that they have shown preference for a shop that does not indulge in that system; even though that shop is not able to pay ready money?—That is so. The sympathy I think Mr. Galloway refers to is more in the outlying country districts. I have some sympathy with the feeling myself, when you consider that those merchants year in and year out have assisted them considerably. In the case of a bad harvest or a bad fishing, or illness, or anything of that sort, the merchant you usually find has given unlimited credit during the illness; they do not look at the business side of the thing, and see that he is very well paid for it, but they say to themselves: "He is a very decent man, he has been very kind to us," and they do not see any hardship in their paying under those circumstances 3½d. instead of 2¾d. They allow their sentimental regard for the man to overlook the mere business nature of his transactions.

3519. Then it is not among the people in the outlying districts that this preference is found for the particular shop which does not engage in the truck system?—I found it in the case of D1, and in places to the north in other islands, Yell, and Unst, and North Sound, and also in Burraywood—all in the north seem to go to D 1's place; I have not found many transactions going on with the folks in the south, say about Dunrosness. But then the amount that is bought by D1 is a very, very small quantity indeed compared with the output.

3520. But still there are many people who are anxious to sell to them ?—Yes.

3521. You mentioned that the Duchess of Sutherland buys some work from these people. Could you give the comparative extent of her trade ?—It is very small. They may have opened a depot since; they had no depot in Shetland. There are depots in Harris and Lewis, but they have no depot to my knowledge in Shetland; I am informed they buy it from a Lerwick merchant.

3522. You said that you informed the merchants of the breaches of the law, and you left a memorandum of the Truck Acts with them ?—Yes.

3523. Do you know if any steps were taken to inform the Duchess of Sutherland of the fact that the merchants with whom she was dealing were breaking the law ?—I do not know; I think not in Shetland.

3524. Has she been communicated with at all on the subject, do you know ?—Do you mean with regard to Shetland ?

3525. I do not know if she gives out work in any other place ?—In Harris I believe she was communicated with, but I could not make a definite statement to that effect. I understand she was communicated with regarding the purchases by her association in Harris and Lewes.

3526. Officially or by a voluntary organisation; do you know from whom the communication was received ?—I know she was communicated with.

3527. By the Home Office ?—No, it was not by the Home Office.

3528. You do not know who made the communication ?—No, I said I did not want to know. I considered my drawing the attention of the Duchess of Sutherland to that would be outside the scope of my business; I instructed the local managers of this association, but I believe she was communicated with, and there has been no depreciation in the purchase of Harris tweed by truck by her association. They could not help knowing about it. They know perfectly well that almost the entire—to be charitable I will say 50 per cent.—of their tweed is bought by truck. They acknowledge it.

3529. Of course I see that it is outside the province of the Home Office, but equally it is outside the province of the Home Office, is it not, to communicate with the merchants ?—Not quite. Until we had made up our minds and thoroughly investigated the whole system of both trades we could not see whether we could hold them as out-workers or not, or whether they were domestic workshops. We had to get information with regard to the trade before we could come to the decision that has been come to.

3530. Perhaps I understood wrongly, but I understood that some of the advice, shall I say, which was left with the merchants was left after you had decided that they were outside your jurisdiction ?—No; it was immediately after my 1901 visit. Here is a letter dated 9th July, 1901. It was after that—it was next year—that we fully made up our minds with regard to the position, and then the Irish case came on, which prevented us even going into the question again.

3531. My questions were rather guided by a statement that a similar organisation in Ireland has, on seeing the report of Miss Squire's evidence, communicated to the people with whom it deals its intention not to be responsible for this practice in any way. I wondered whether, if the attention of the Duchess of Sutherland had been similarly called publicly to those matters there might not have been a similar result ?—I do not know who wrote, but I believe the Duchess of Sutherland was written to unofficially, and the gentleman who wrote stated that possibly she was not aware that Harris tweed was being purchased exclusively by truck in her Scottish Home Industries Association; the letter went on to deal with other matters which were replied to, but the reference to truck was not lifted at all. I am afraid after all that she was aware of it; I cannot conceive otherwise.

Mr. A. Newlands.

12 July 1906.

Here is a piece of evidence that I had from a gentleman, an ex-provost of Stornoway; he is senior member of the committee who direct and govern the work of the Congested Districts Board's weaving instructor. His committee was appointed by the Duchess of Sutherland, and it is under her instructions that they act. The committee has absolutely no official standing; it is purely a committee to act for the association, whose directors are in London. My note is, "Refuses to give any information re customs of trade or any other information."

By the Chairman.

3532. Who refuses ?—This provost.

3533. Is this in Stornoway ?—Yes. "In doing so he is acting under instructions received specially from London; also refuses to allow the weaving instructor to supply in any way list of addresses; refuses to permit him to give any other information."

3534. Who instructs you to that effect ?—That is an interview I had with this gentleman, the ex-provost of Stornoway.

3535. What is his name ?—F 1. I may say that after he took that position I said, "Very well, I am afraid you must leave the Home Office to draw their own conclusions." I do not know whether he wired or not, but he sent word to the instructor to give me every information after that; two or three days afterwards he sent him to give me every information and to say that I could get every information in the shops.

3536. Is this instructor in the service of the Congested Districts Board ?—Yes. Then, the evidence that I have from the manager of both branches shows that truck was prevalent; they acknowledged it, of course that was three years ago.

By Mrs. Tennant.

3537. What I wanted your help to get at is this: whether the exact and peculiarly disagreeable nature of these truck transactions has been brought to the notice of the Scottish Industries Association. There is an impression that the truck system, unabused, might be of value to the workers. I have heard it argued that, we will say, in Shetland, it is more convenient for the workers to receive the goods than the money; that is an opinion from which I profoundly dissent, but still I do not think that that opinion would be put forward when it is known that they receive only 77 per cent. of the value of their work ?—Exactly, and that is exactly my position with the Scottish Industries Association; they also reduce on giving cash, or did at the time of my visit; I cannot say what is done now; they certainly did make a deduction or a charge for exchange or commission, whichever you like to call it. I cannot conceive of the firm not realising the difference it must be to the workers; there must at least be the difference of the value of their exchange.

By Mr. Brotherton.

3538. How often do you visit the places we have been speaking of in Orkney and Shetland ?—Once a year.

3539. You were there last year ?—No, I was not in Shetland last year.

3540. Have you gone specially to see with regard to these questions of truck ?—Yes.

3541. You have had the question of truck brought prominently to your notice, and you have been requested to inquire into it ?—Yes.

3542. When you have gone over you have told the people, both the traders and the workers, what your object was ?—Yes.

3543. And some of them have given you information ?—I had only one case of refusal of information, the case I have referred to.

3544. And even there the information is now available ?—Yes.

3545. So that you were well received by both the traders and the workers, and they placed their whole position before you ?—Yes.

3546. You do not find that the workers have any grievances; they do not complain to you personally of any hardships or wrongs ?—Oh yes; they all complain—at least, except in the cases I was referring to where there was sympathy or sentiment expressed with a merchant who had befriended them so long; but, generally speaking, they do complain bitterly of truck.

Mr. A. Newlands.

12 July 1906.

3547. They consider (and you confirm it) that with truck they have to pay higher than if they had cash?—That is so.

3548. But if they spend the results of their labour they cannot have the cash; in that sense they are complaining because they are poor people?—No, I would hardly say that. They are complaining that they are forced to buy in a shop where they realise that the prices are higher than in other shops.

3549. They have a very limited market, and the other shops requiring cash cannot take their goods in exchange?—Yes. I may just mention this. Opposite two of the largest truck shops in Lerwick there is a cash shop; the folks cannot help comparing the prices that they are getting for their goods in the truck shops when they have to pass on the other side of the street and see this other shop where everything is marked cheaper.

3550. It would seem to me that much of the trouble arises from the financial restrictions of the island; that is, they had not cash to trade with, and therefore they have a very limited market indeed, both in selling and in buying. Now, if we were to do away with truck altogether, it is not at all clear in my mind that their position would be better financially. Would they, for instance, have more buyers?—The market would be constant, whether the articles had been bought by truck or not. I think we may accept that.

3551. I cannot see that. It would depend to a great extent upon what inducement the traders had to deal in their goods and find customers for them. These goods all come south, I take it?—Yes.

3552. Do you suppose that the traders among themselves compete, or do they seem to have a trade margin which they mutually respect?—I think there is competition; I think you might safely accept that there is competition for the goods.

3553. Even among the truck shops?—Even among the truck shops; at least there is decidedly competition for the finer class of shawls.

3554. I suppose the shopkeepers are the islanders themselves; they are Shetland and Orkney men, they are not strangers?—Quite so. In one or two cases we have large establishments in Lerwick, with branch shops in the various small towns; otherwise they are all natives of the village in which the shop is.

3555. When the workers bring their goods and shawls and so on, they supply usually the whole of the wool, I think; they do not purchase the wool from the shopkeepers?—Very seldom.

3556. So that, rather than a worker dealing with an employer, it is almost entirely a matter of one trader dealing with another?—That is so.

3557. Then where does the law step in between two traders to prevent what is called truck?—Section 10 of the Act of 1887 almost gives that feeling; in fact it seems to me to be entirely drawn up to meet this case. The words are, "Where articles are made by a person at his own home, or otherwise, without the employment of any person under him except a member of his own family, the principal Act and this Act shall apply as if he were a workman, and the shopkeeper, dealer, trader, or other person buying the articles in the way of trade were his employer, and the provisions of this Act with respect to the payment of wages shall apply as if the price of an article were wages earned during the seven days next preceding the date at which any article is received from the workman by the employer."

3558. We may take it then as a general principle that where cash is paid for goods, in your opinion the person who produces the goods is put on a better footing?—Yes.

3559. But you cannot of course compel the shop people, the purchasers, to give cash?—I cannot.

3560. I mean the law cannot; or do you take it that the law can?—I think by this section the law can.

3561. You have only this alternative; the shopkeeper may simply refuse to take the goods?—He may.

3562. Or, if he gives cash, he may give what amount of cash he likes?—That is so. Naturally then you become on a fairer basis for comparision.

3563. You mean, it is better for the man who produces the goods to have cash to dispose of as he thinks right?—Yes.

3564. Then do you recommend any action with regard to legislation?—No. I only say that, as I find it, I do not think our Department could take any action; I believe action could be taken by other authorities; but that is outside my province.

3565. You say this, in effect, then; that the producer by not having cash is put into a more difficult position than if he had money?—Certainly.

3566. And if it could be made compulsory for cash to be paid for the produce of his labour, you would recommend that, as far as your experience goes?—Yes; if it is found necessary to make any alteration in the existing statute, I think that might be done.

By. Mr. Cawley.

3567. Do I understand that there is a shop in Lerwick where they could go to?—There is one cash shop.

3568. And they really prefer not to go to it?—They go to it, but the people who carry on the shop have only limited capital, and cannot supply everybody.

3569. Does it come to this; that if a shop were established with money, which would compete with the other truck shops, the people would go to that shop?—I have every reason to believe so. I mean, there is that sentimental regard for a merchant who has befriended them for years, and I think they do double or treble owing to that.

3570. Really it comes to this, that if there were a shop in these places where they paid hard cash much of this truck would be done away with without legislation?—That would be the tendency.

By Mr. Delevingne.

3571. On the question of the enforcement of Section 10. As you said, it apparently does not rest with the Home Office, but with the local authorities?—Yes.

3572. For the suppression of such a system as prevails now in Shetland and the Hebrides, which authority do you think is the best for administering Section 10, the Home Office inspectors, who at best can only visit occasionally or the local authorities, who are always on the spot.—The local authorities, I should say.

3574. Would you suggest, as an improvement on the present system, that, without placing the administration of Section 10 under the Home Office inspectors, power might be given them to enforce Section 10, and in that way to supplement and supervise the action of the local authorities?—Yes.

3575. In much the same way as you supervise the action of the local authorities in workshops?—Exactly.

3576. You think that that might be an improvement?—Yes.

3577. You could do some useful work in your visits?—Yes. In any case where it was found that truck existed notices could be sent to the local authority and my department would only act in default of the local officials.

3578. There is one point I should like to mention about the application of Section 10 to tweed weaving in the Hebrides. I see the difficulty about making it applicable to the case you described, because the woven cloth passes through more than one hand possibly; it goes to the cottar, who passes it on to the weaver, and receives it back from the weaver?—That is so.

3579. Section 10 would not apply to a case like that ?—I think not.

3580. Can you suggest in what way the Section can be amended to meet that class of case ? If you alter Section 10 by including goods manufactured by a series of persons you rather get into a region of larger contract or different kinds of contract ?—That is so. You could only do it by the use of the word "contractor" or "person employed by him to do part of the work."

3581. It seems to me that if you open out the Section to include the employment of other persons you get into difficulties, and especially if you abolish the £5 limit in money value ?—I believe if you throw it open to contractors, the money value must be retained. If contractors were admitted into the Section I think it would be unwise to take away entirely the £5 limit, otherwise you would open up large fields of more considerable contracts.

3582. Have you had any experience of the same system in regard to articles which are not included at present in Section 10 ? For it applies only to a limited number of articles ?—No. As a matter of fact I have met with very little truck in the North of Scotland. When I met with it in the Hebrides and Shetland, I expected to find it in factories and workshops elsewhere, but in only one case did I find it, and that was at a workshop in Westray. Throughout most of the North of Scotland I found nothing in the way of truck.

3583. Does your experience suggest the desirableness of extending the list of articles mentioned in Section 10 ?—Not my experience.

3584. In the Harris tweed weaving would "B," who buys the wool, pay the weaver "C" always in cash ?—Yes, always in cash.

3585. Why is that ?—It is the custom of the trade.

3586. Is C in the position to impose his own terms ?—Well, the price of the weaving of cloth is pretty well settled. It is always known to range from 7d. to 9d., according to the regular recognised and conventional patterns which are worked upon it. The price is well-known to the weaver, who is always paid in cash.

3587. It is rather curious that the weaver should be always paid in cash and the other workers in kind ?—That is so. The custom goes further than that, because A, the merchant, in squaring up his account with B, always gives sufficient cash to him for C's work.

3588. Is a possible cause to be found in the fact that the weavers are a limited number, and that there is therefore some competition for their services ?—There might be something in that.

3589. Does B ever do the weaving himself ?—Or, in other words, does the weaver ever take out the wool direct from the merchant ?—Occasionally you find that the man weaves and the girls pick and clean card and spins, etc.

3590. Would he get paid in cash by the merchant ?—No.

3591. When he does the weaving himself he is paid in goods ?—Yes.

3592. Is the Scottish Home Industries Association a private association ?—Yes, I believe so.

3593. A limited company ?—I think it is.

3594. Can you tell us what is the professed object of the association ?—I believe it is charity.

3595. Do you know what are the Articles of the Association ?—I believe, roughly speaking, that after the expense of working is deducted and after paying a dividend on the money lent or on the shares held, the surplus goes in some way to benefit the worker; and the Association is benefiting the workers in many ways, but not in the way of truck—at least, that is my information.

3596. It does declare a dividend ?—Yes, I am informed a dividend of 3 per cent. or 4 per cent. has been paid.

3597. Do they publish a balance sheet ?—I do not know.

3598. What is the nature of their operations ?—Do they simply buy Harris tweeds from the workers direct ?—Yes, they are ordinary merchants. They also have the A, B, and C system at work.

3599. Do they give out the wool ?—Yes. They give out large quantities in Lewes every year.

Mr. A. Newlands.

12 July 1906.

3600. Where from ?—From Galashiels; there is some Australian, but not much; and, of course, a little native wool. A man gets so many stones—there are 24 lbs. to the stone—and he picks and dyes it. The association, like any other merchant, debits the man with a quantity; he picks it, cleans it, and dyes it, and then sends it to the nearest convenient mill to be carded, after which he spins, has it woven, and then usually takes it back to the association. But the association has a right to refuse it, and he has a right to refuse to take it to the association.

3601. They pay for that in goods if it is taken back to them ?—Yes.

3602. Does the association keep a large shop ?—Yes with two hands, I think.

3603. Is it open to any customer to go there ?—A visitor can go and buy Harris tweeds there.

3604. But the goods are mainly kept for the payment of the workers ?—That is the statement of the manager.

3605. Have you ever tried to buy anything there ?—I have not.

3606. Are the articles of a good quality with which they pay the workers for the tweeds ?—I believe of the ordinary quality used by people of that class.

3607. Do you think the worker gets full value for his tweed in these goods ? Or is he charged a higher price than an ordinary customer would be who went to buy them ?—The two-priced system is not universal. It is still to be met with. Where it does exist it may happen as you say. Under ordinary circumstances you can go in and buy your goods at the price marked, but there is a discount allowed to a cash customer, perhaps 10 per cent.

3608. Does the two-price system prevail at the depot of the association ?—I do not think so.

3609. On the other hand, if the worker does not take his payment in goods he gets a less cash payment ?—That was the case in 1902 when I went there. It may be altered now, but certainly the truck system is going on. I asked the superintendent of police in May of last year if he could not take some action, as surely he had seen enough of the evils of the system. He replied, "Where am I to start ? They all do it." I suggested he should take the biggest, and that is the Scottish Home Industries Association. When I found that I had no locus standi I did not repeat my visit, but I made indirect inquiries.

3610. Did this official say he could not touch the association ?—He said his difficulty was that the system was universal; and, moreover, the chairman of the committee was his provost, and three of the council were on the committee.

3611. You say the association does a great deal of good for the worker—in what respect ?—They have improved the sanitary conditions; there is no doubt of that.

3612. In what way ?—The style of milling is better, and, moreover, in certain places, if the sanitary condition is not good, they refuse to buy tweeds from that district. The association does good in many ways.

3613. Have you reported the association to the superintending inspector ?—Yes, the superintending inspector was with me.

3614. Did he report to the chief inspector ?—I do not know.

By the Chairman.

3615. With regard to these workers who deal in truck in that way and are paid by truck, are they indebted often to the merchant ?—Yes, sometimes.

3616. Have they a running account ?—Yes, I find in the invoices "to balance due, 8s." "to balance due, 2s. 9d." etc. "Balance brought forward £4 12s. 2d.

3617. Could you conveniently give me any comparative list of articles at the ordinary price as compared with articles at the truck price ? You did tell us something about sugar ?—Sugar and tea are the articles which lend themselves most easily for comparison.

Mr. A. Newlands.

12 July 1906.

3618. The shop price of sugar is 2¾d. ?—That is in the two-price shops. The truck price is about 3¼d. to 3½d.

3619. May we assume that the shop price of tea to the ordinary buyer is 2s ?—Yes.

3620. And how much is the truck price ?—2s. 6d.

3621. I thought you cited one case where the truck price of tea was 2s. 6d., and the actual price in the shop was 1s. 8d. ?—Yes. Prices vary in different localities, and according to the quality.

3622. And now as to flannel ?—G 1, a merchant, buys about £150 worth of hosiery per annum, which he barters with merchants in exchange for tea. His principal buyer is H 1. He writes: "We give cash if wanted, but generally goods (that is when dealing with the knitter); 20 per cent. taken off price of hosiery if cash is wanted. Have two prices, at least ½d. per lb. difference in sugar, and tea at 2s. when given in part exchange for hosiery is charged at 2s. 6d. Draperies 1d. per yard, that is ribbons, etc., Flannels 2d. per yard." The writer adds: "I must offer more than the hosiery is worth in order to get it; and consequently I have to put something on the price of these goods."

3623. That is his explanation ?—Yes. But it was hardly borne out by my inquiry. I found that the man did a big business in spencer work. Spencers could be bought from 1s. 8d. to 2s. each, but I have here an invoice of so many dozen spencers at 30s. a dozen. It is contended that they make nothing of their Shetland hosiery. The merchant says: "We take the hosiery in and give the full price for it, and that is why we have to make such deductions if they want cash." But I never heard of spencers sold at anything like 30s. a dozen.

3624. What would they be sold at ?—From 1s. 8d. to 2s. each.

3625. Under Section 10 of the Act of 1887 there is power to the King or Queen in Council to suspend the operation of the Section in any particular county or place. Has an Order in Council of that kind ever been applied for ?—After my first inquiry and conference with the merchant, it was suggested that they might apply to be relieved of the Truck Act.

3626. Under the Section to which I have been alluding ?—They first quoted Section 9 of the 1896 Act, but I pointed out that that would not relieve them of the previous Acts, but I do not believe anything was ever done in the matter.

3627. In these districts, as throughout Scotland, I suppose the prosecutor is the Procurator Fiscal ?—Yes, the Public Prosecutor.

3628. Do you work all the prosecutions with regard to the Factory Act through his department ?—No, we take them ourselves.

3629. But under truck ?—We would conduct them.

3630. What would you say if your jurisdiction could be extended to these cases without the intervention of the Fiscal, although I appreciate the inconveniences on account of distance ?—If that power were extended to us on the lines of supervision of the sanitary arrangements of workshops we would only take proceedings in default of the local authority.

3631. There would be no necessity for that if the local authority gave full effect to the statutory provision ?—That is so.

FIFTEENTH DAY.

Monday, 16th July, 1906.

PRESENT.

The Right Hon. THOMAS SHAW, K.C., M.P., Lord Advocate for Scotland (Chairman).

MALCOLM DELEVINGNE, Esq.

FREDERICK MADDISON, Esq., M.P.
Mrs. H. J. TENNANT.

T. E. BETTANY, Esq. (Secretary).

Mr. HENRY HALL, I.S.O., H.M. Inspector of Mines for the Lancashire and North Wales District, was called; and Examined.

Mr. H. Hall, I.S.O.

16 July 1906.

By the Chairman.

3632. Will you tell us your position ? You are in the service of the Home Office ?—Yes, I am inspector of Mines for Lancashire and North Wales—quarries and metalliferous mines and coal mines.

3633. How long have you been in the service of the Home Office ?—I joined the Home Office in 1873 as Assistant Inspector of Mines in South Wales.

3634. And you had that post for how long ?—About eighteen months.

3635. And thereafter ?—I was made principal inspector in Lancashire after eighteen months.

3636. And you have held since that time your appointment as principal inspector ?—Yes.

3637. I understand that you have some evidence that you are willing to tender with regard to your experience of the working of the Truck Act ?—Yes, I can tell you how it works.

3638. Just gives us your evidence generally to begin with ?—I have sent in to the Committee a list of fines (if we deal with fines first) which have been inflicted in one particular firm (I 1) in one year.

3639. Is that a limited concern ?—Yes, it is.

3640. Where are they established ?—Near St. Helens, in Lancashire.

3641. You have framed the list of which we have a copy. This list will be Exhibit No. 1 of Appendix V. ?—Yes.

3642. Will you tell me what this list means ? It is headed "List of fines, year ending 31st December, 1904." Were these fines actually imposed, or were they the fines prescribed ?—Those are fines actually imposed.

3643. What number of workmen have these employers ?—They have over 5,000—about 5,200 or 5,300.

3644. And the fines are generally less than 5s., but a fine of 10s. appears now and again ?—I think only about twice in the list.

3645. I want to ask you one or two questions about these fines. In the first place do you think them fair and reasonable in amount ?—Yes, I do.

3646. So that they would answer the Statutory requisite under the Truck Act of 1896 ?—Yes.

3647. What is done with the amount of fines ?—In that particular case it is handed over to the men's Sick Club. I may say that that is generally the rule—not always I think, quite, but very generally.

3648. Are those fines made the subject of written contract ?—No; the amounts are not specified beforehand, but it is done in this way; when a man has to be fined on a particular day he is handed a form. They are not all exactly alike at the different places, but I will hand in one form (see Appendix V., Exhibit No. 2).

3649. This is entered before the man signs. "I agree to pay a fine of so much for the undermentioned act or omission," and then certain acts or omissions are specified; then "I hereby authorise you to deduct the same from my wages." Now, this transaction takes place after the offence for which the fine imposed has been committed ?—Yes

3650. Is that considered a compliance with the Act of Parliament ?—Under the words, "or the contract is in writing signed by the workman" they claim that they can do it in that way; that is Section 1, Sub-section 1 (a).

3651. And you have accepted that view of the law ?—I think they are right as the words are in the section.

3652. And is this practice a general one ?—Yes, it is in Lancashire.

3653. Has it occurred to the department to construe that as an antecedent contract at the time of making the employment ?—Attention has not been drawn to it until quite recently, since this enquiry was announced.

3654. What is the exact section you refer to ?—Section 1, Sub-section 1 (a): "Or the contract is in writing signed by the workman." It hinges on the word "or," I think.

3655. I suggest to you that it might hinge on the antecedent words which point to the making of the contract with the workman originally. At all events it is sufficient for our purpose that you say that that has not been considered by the department to be an infringement of the words of the section ?—Not so far as I know. It arose in this way. When the Truck Act of 1896 was passed, Mr. Ellis, who was the legal adviser for the coal trade, was asked to see how best it would be to conform with the Act, and that was one of the things he suggested.

3656. Who was Mr. Ellis ?—He is the legal adviser to the Coal Trades Association.

3657. Is he a solicitor ?—Yes.

3658. I point out to you that the result of that would be that the workman would have to assent, after a certain event which is construed as an offence, not only to the amount, but to the category of offence ?—Yes, he would, and of course he is in the position almost of compulsion; they generally give him the option of agreeing to be fined, or being prosecuted, or being dismissed.

3659. Then let me ask you this. When the man fills up this slip (Exhibit No. 2) does "the under-mentioned act or omission" already appear in a category of acts or omissions ?—The particular act or omission is mentioned to him.

3660. But is there a category of those acts or omissions published in the colliery ?—No, there is not, except so far as many of the fines are for breaches of special rules. The special rules of course are published, but there are many omissions which are fined for, which are not published in any way.

3661. And the amounts are not published ?—No.

3662. Now the situation of the workman in such a case appears to be that unless he signs an agreement to the effect of paying a sum which the employers stipulate, for an act or omission which the employers mention, he may lose his situation ?—Yes he would, I think.

3663. He having not had any definite information with regard to that act or omission as a finable subject before he entered the employment, apart from the exception as to special rules ?—That is so.

3664. What is the view of the workman with regard to that arrangement, or do you happen to know it ?—Well, I do not know it. They have never drawn my attention to it in any shape or form. There are not very many fines in that particular case; among 5,000 men I think the fines add up to about seventy-eight cases in a year; so that it is not a very serious matter 3665. Is there any agitation among the workmen on the subject of fines ?—I do not think so.

3666. Are they satisfied with this system ?—I think they are; I think they would have complained either to me or to their delegates if they had not been.

3667. This fining system is substantially the alternative to dismissal ?—Dismissal or prosecution. A great many owners do not like to prosecute their men; they would rather fine them; they think it is easier for the men. Besides, there would be great objections, I think, to constant prosecutions; it would take up so much time and be so costly. Every prosecution that is taken to a police court costs £3 or £4, I have no doubt, and it takes away the men's time attending there as witnesses.

3668. This firm that you are mentioning seems to conduct its business with absolute propriety ?—Yes, I think they are a very good example.

3669. Have you other examples in which a similar system is adopted with hardships to the men ?—Yes, I think there is one that I sent up to the Home Office. That was a quarry (K 1), where the fines seemed to be rather unreasonable. Here is the list (Exhibit No. 3., in Appendix V.)

3670. What is your observation with regard to this instance; "absence from work without permission except under doctor's certificate, three days' pay ?"—That is one that I think is very unreasonable: in fact, personally I think it is very objectionable to fine men for not attending to their work. These are men who are on by piece, and men whom the employer stops without any notice when the colliery or the quarry cannot work for want of trade and so on 3671. Still, this case is a case where the list is put up ?—Yes, it is published.

3672. Bad as it is, it is distinguished from the last case that you mentioned by the fact that the workman knows what the fines will be when he enters into the employment ?—He does.

3673. Can you illustrate some of these other things in this notice. For instance, "dressing knives, each 4s. 3d." what does that mean ?—That will be a knife for dressing the slates I presume. I think you will find as a rule that the prices for tools that they supply are something like fair prices.

3674. This list, of course, comprises authorised deductions as well as fines ?—Yes, it combines the two.

3675. Then "stopping before the horn blows, 1s."; that, of course, is a fine ?—Yes; that is for discipline.

3676. Then as to the charges for powder, rope, and so on; are these fair and reasonable ?—I think they are. I have looked through several lists that have come under my notice, and I find that the prices approach each other very nearly.

3677. What do you say to this, "defacing this list, 2s. 6d."; that is clearly a disciplinary fine, is it not ?—Yes; I think it is all right. A man has no business to deface the list.

3678. May I take it that with regard to this you approve of the system of fines ?—I think you could not dispense with fines; it is quite impossible.

3679. Why ?—Because you would have so many prosecutions. For instance, take the large colliery I have mentioned; you have seventy-eight fined there besides prosecutions; you might find another colliery where there might be 120 or 200 fines with the same number of men. If those cases were all taken into the police court the manager would be at the police court all his time instead of minding his business.

3680. You are referring to the things which are under the category of statutory offences—breach of special rules and so on ?—Well, it really includes almost everything; because there is a special rule which says that they must obey "instructions" and that they must not do anything to endanger life or do damage, and so on; so that really you can get hold of most of the offences under the special rules.

3681. I just want to see that I am right about this. Do I understand your evidence to be that you approve of the system of buying off prosecutions by imposing fines, if those fines are ultimately devoted to the benefit of the men ?—So long as the fines are paid over to some club belonging to the men I think the system has very little objection to it. Of course there are objections, no doubt, but I do not think that you could impose a better system. I think prosecutions alone are quite out of the question.

16 July 1906.

3682. You mean on account of their number ?—And that they would be harder on the men, too, I think.

3683. Have you any views with regard to the effectiveness of ordinary discipline; that is to say, supposing a man offended more than once, and was known to be a chronic offender, he would be penalised by simply being dismissed the service ?—At the collieries they generally do it in this way. Suppose a man has done something wrong underground, he is told by an official that he must not start work to-morrow until he has seen the manager; the man has to interview the manager in the office; probably if it is the first time that he has been before the manager the manager will let him off altogether; if it is the second time he will fine him probably; and if he has been there three or four times the manager will probably prosecute him. That is the way it is done.

3684. Do they never attempt dismissal ?—They would dismiss in a bad case. The man would probably say, "Well, I will leave"; he would probably dismiss himself.

3685. Does it occur to you that a system which permits the imposition of pecuniary fines privately is a safe substitute for the statutory precaution of prosecution ?—Well, I think it is the only practicable one; I mean in such a trade as coal-mining, where the offences are so very various. If you will look through the list you will see that they vary very much. You will see all kinds of things that you could not meet particularly by rule, I think; otherwise the rules would be interminable. It is very difficult to carry on a large works without having a tight hold of the men in some way or other so as to keep up the discipline.

3686. We have had evidence from a variety of other sources, applicable to other employments, to the effect that fines have been abolished with great success and reliance has been placed solely upon discipline, and the result according to the evidence we have had before us has been that the work has been effective and the output has been as good as before ?—You mean discipline enforced by prosecutions.

3687. Enforced by fines ?—By fines in the police court ?

3688. No, by fines as they are here imposed ?—You mean that those have been abolished; but what has taken the place of that to enforce discipline ?

3689. What has taken its place has been that the employers have relied on ordinary discipline; that is to say, they supervise the work well; that they take a chronic offender and dismiss that chronic offender. Do you think that that could be introduced with safety into coal mining ?—No, I do not think it could. In coal mining a lot of offences—a very great many of them have reference to danger either to the workers themselves or to others; that makes it rather different from a factory or anything of that kind.

3690. Then, this list (Exhibit No. 1) is a list of fines which have been actually imposed without any contract antecedent to the offence ?—That is so.

3691. They have been imposed by the operation of this contract form (Exhibit No. 2) ?—Yes.

3693. Then there is a fine of 5s. for "being asleep during working hours" ?—That would be when he was in a position where he might endanger either himself or someone else.

3694. Then there are some closely affecting the safety of the workmen; as for instance "taking matches down a pit, 10s." and "having a pipe in his possession down a pit, 5s." ?—Yes. As a rule for those kind of things they prosecute. The colliery people as a rule prosecute for serious offences of that kind.

3695. But I point out to you that they did not. What they did was this. They kept the man in their employment, they did not prosecute him according to law, but they carried on their business with the man still in their employ, having extracted 10s. from him as a fine. Do you approve of that ?—If he committed the offence I think I do. The fine of 10s. is very like what he would have been fined if they had taken him to the police court. I have watched these cases, and according to my experience he would have been fined probably 10s. and costs; the costs would have been probably 5s. or 6s. and he would have lost a day.

3696. I understand your view to be that there would be a good deal of trouble about prosecutions—that the manager would often have to attend ?—Yes; even now the manager often has to attend.

3697. Take the case of taking matches down the pit, or being asleep at the works. Do not you think that the deterrent effect of a prosecution would be much more valuable to the mine than the private extraction of 10s. from the man ?—They meet that in this way. If it is a bad case they put a notice up on the pit head saying that John so-and-so has been fined 10s. for taking matches down the pit. That is the way that they try to make it effective. They do not do that in every case, but in very serious cases they do.

3698. You see yourself that that is not the policy of the statute ?—No, it is not. I see that there are objections. The difficulty is how you could better it.

3699. I suggest to you that the way to better it is by obeying the law. I suppose your answer to that again is that it would be a great deal of trouble ?—You mean to make the man obey the law by supervision ?

3700. No—to take the statute and just to give effect to the statute which provides for prosecutions in the case of offences ?—You refer to the statute which contains the special rules.

3701. Yes ?—That is done in regard to what the manager considers a bad case. He gives the man no option; he says, "You will be prosecuted;" but in the other cases in the man's interest the manager must take some notice of any omission that the man has made or any commission that he has made, and he thinks it better for the man and that it will meet the case that he should fine him 2s. 6d. or 5s. That is the position that the manager takes up. He does not wish to fine.

3702. But I put it to you whether you think it a safe thing to allow a public system of this kind to be conducted under which, at the will or the caprice of the manager, he may—probably in the interests of the workman if he so thinks it—avoid the execution of the law. On the whole do you approve of that ?—On the whole I approve of the system that they pursue. I agree with you that probably a prosecution in the police court is much more effective on the men as regards discipline, but whether it would prove so if you were constantly prosecuting them instead of fining them I am dubious. It would become a kind of matter of course, and it would not have the same salutary effect I should think.

3703. I will put to you this case; that the law were so changed as to make it impossible to buy off prosecutions; that would be done of course by the abolition of fines; then the result would be that a prosecution would follow, and if it was a bad case the employers would dismiss the offender; if it was a case involving, for instance, danger to the life of fellow workmen, the employers would dismiss the man ?—In that case I should recommend prosecution and not dismissal, because the man would only go elsewhere.

3704. The publicity of the prosecution would be effective without the masters incurring odium for having prosecuted ?—Yes.

3705. At present the masters are blamed for prosecuting, they having by Statute the option not to prosecute. Do you think that that is a safe position ?—I know what you are thinking about, of course. If you did away with fines altogether and relied on prosecutions, you would have to extend very much the rules so as to cover all these various offences, which would be a very difficult matter, I think.

3706. You will not misunderstand our position. We have had strong evidence given to us in favour of the abolition of fines, and we are bound to put the points to you so as to elicit your view. I take it from you that in addition to what would be an offence under the Coal Mines Regulation Act and under the special rules, fines are imposed for other things ?—That is so.

3707. Then as to these other things there is no list of them in the pit ?—No.

3708. And the workman therefore is fined, after some delinquency, a sum which is fixed by the employer, for an act which is specified by the employer ?—Or not specified.

3709. An act or omission ?—An act or omission that is not specified. There are so many things that a man might do that you could not specify them beforehand. You could not know that a man would do so and so, yet he does it, and it is on the face of it a wrong act; so he is fined for doing it. I think you must have something generally of that kind. I suppose it could be included in some kind of general clause—" misconduct " or something of that kind.

3710. That is on the assumption that you were permitting fines ?—No. If you were relying altogether on prosecutions, you would have to extend your special rules or bye-laws so as to include all these other things which we see appear among the fines, and which do not appear in the special rules.

3711. Naturally the alternative to fining is prosecution, and that is what you have in your mind, under the Coal Mines Regulation Act. May I ask you to look at it from our point of view, which may possibly be this; that the alternative to fining is to consider whether the man would be dismissed ?—Well, as I said before, I am not a believer in dismissing a man; he will only go elsewhere and probably do the same thing over again, if he receives no punishment other than dismissal. If you keep him on, you fine him or prosecute him; he has had a lesson, and he ought to be a better man after that; that is my view of the matter.

3712. Is that method that you have just described to us, the one almost universally adopted at the collieries ?—Yes, only in Lancashire; I am only speaking for Lancashire; I do not know how they do elsewhere.

3713. Of course there is, you see for yourself, a good deal of compulsion in the matter ?—Oh yes, there is.

3714. In short, if the man does not suffer his deduction, whatever it is, off he goes ?—Yes; there is a good deal of compulsion.

3715. Still you do not feel yourself in a position to condemn the system ?—No. The man is the offender; you must not look upon him as an innocent party.

3716. And you do not think that the publication of the list of fines beforehand would be an advantage ?—Well, I think it would be, possibly; but that again would have to be inclusive somehow of things that you could not very well foresee; the list would have to be a very long one; unless you could say that for breach of a special rule where a prosecution was not instituted, the fine should be so much or so much.

3717. Will you tell me about the pay tickets in the cases you have mentioned. Take this one (Exhibit No. 4 of Appendix V.), issued by the firm L 1. In that ticket the gross wages are given, and then a list of fines, ending up with " (12) Fines see back," and at the back there is a list of "acts or omissions." That is filled up, I understand, the deductions are made, and then the net wage is paid to the workman ?—Yes.

3718. So far as his Saturday night's account or his fortnight's account is concerned, he knows everything that is deducted from him ?—Yes. That particular form is very complete, as a rule, at all the collieries, and it is very general; but I have one here (Exhibit No. 5 of Appendix V.), which is not so satisfactory; this is from a lead-mining company, where they do not give the quantities; that is rather exceptional.

3719. Have you any idea as to what should be done with those fines. In the cases you have mentioned they are devoted to some purposes of the men—sick benefit clubs or something of that sort ?—I would make it compulsory that all fines should be paid over to a society that the men might select themselves.

3720. But apart from that, you think it impracticable to dispense with fines ?—I do at present.

3721. Now you call our attention to a phrase that occurs in section 1 (1)a, 2 (1)a, and 3 (1)a of the Truck Act of 1896, viz: " The terms of the contract to be contained in a notice kept constantly affixed at such place or places open to workmen, and in such a position that it may be easily seen by them." To meet that requirement there is a book—you call it a signing-on book ?—Yes. You mean that we are now dealing with deductions from wages.

3722. Yes ?—Yes. There is a signing on book which is kept in the manager's office or the under-manager's office. When a man comes and applies for work he is called on to sign this book, and on each page of the book there are certain clauses of the Truck Act inserted; on each page there are certain clauses of the Truck Act for a form of contract. That is not very satisfactory, because when a man comes and asks for work, he does not like to pry into things; he would never think of asking to look at those clauses to see what they were; he would sign without any question. I put in one of these forms (Exhibit No. 6 of Appendix V.), issued by the firm I. 1. I have been in a position to go into these matters very closely, and I may say I have seen many a man come and ask for work—he would not like to ask what it was he was signing for, and having signed it, so long as it is kept in the office, he has no further opportunity of seeing it or knowing anything about it 3723. Then I take it you favour some sort of more general publicity ?—The terms ought to be published somewhere so that the workman can refer to the terms of the document if he has any reason to believe that he is being unfairly treated; I mean it is not enough for him to simply go into the office and sign; it is not quite fair to him.

3724. In Section 2 (1)c of the Act there is the phrase " reasonable having regard to all the circumstances of the case." Do you think it is easy or difficult for the inspector to get to know what the various articles have cost ?—I find it is very difficult.

3725. Or to find out what expense is incurred in making purchases and dispensing to the workmen ?—Yes, that is the difficulty. They are allowed under the old 1831 Act to add to the price of things any reasonable expense that they have been put to in purchasing and storing and dispensing again, and so on.

3727. Do you remember the agitation in North Wales in 1897 ?—Yes. That was specially about explosives.

3728. It was about the price that was charged to the workers ?—Yes.

3729. What was the result of the agitation ?—The miners' delegates took it in hand, and they asked me to see to it, and I made myself acquainted with all the facts. Then I had a meeting with I think the owners' representatives separately from the men's representatives; then I had a meeting of the men's representatives; eventually prices were agreed upon, as I think, fairly liberal to the owners and fair enough to the men. I find the men are never very hard on the owners when a price has to be settled for anything.

3730. Are the men that you refer to organised labour ?—Yes.

3731. Do you find that organisation is an advantage to all parties ?—Yes, I think so.

3732. It gives the men's wants, as it were, a voice ?—Yes.

3733. And the verdict of any committee of the men in conjunction with the employers is usually accepted by the men ?—Yes, certainly; I think organisation is good for both sides.

3734. As for the prices charged for materials, and so on, if there was anything unreasonable about that, these organisations would at once take the matter up ?—I think they would.

3735. Then you have a certain view as to an official abstract of the requirements of the Act being published ?—I find that this Truck Act seems to be very little known among the men, and I think the reason of that is that there seems to be no clause in the Act requiring it to be published. I think myself it would be much better if we published an abstract of the Truck Act, in the same way that we publish an abstract of the Collieries Act and the Quarries Act and the Metalliferous Mines Act. It is not often that the men want to refer to it, but occasionally when a difficulty arises it is better for them to have the opportunity of referring to the Act; their action may be due to a misunderstanding on their part, and if they had an opportunity of looking at the Act they could put themselves right, or if there was no misunderstanding on their part they could prove by the Act that they were right.

3736. You give us a reference to the Act of 1831, Section 23, as to contracts for the supply of fuel ?—So far as I understand the Truck Acts, you could not legally deduct for coal supplied for domestic purposes, I mean for household fuel; it has to be something used in the man's avocation or for certain things which are enumerated.

3737. You call attention to the collocation of the words " Any fuel, or any materials, tools, or implements to be by such artificer employed in his trade or occupation ? " —Yes.

3738. You think that household fuel should be made legal ?—I think so, because it is generally deducted. Of course, there is really no difference between supplying a man with coal, in a way, and supplying him with bread except that in the case of the fuel it is often an advantage to the man to have it supplied.

3739. In that case do you think that a list of all the prices of materials supplied to the man should be posted up ?—Such as the quarry list you mean.

3740. All materials such as fuel ?—I do not think I should go so far as to say that the price of the fuel should be posted up, but tools and powder and all those things.

3741. In all cases even with regard to fuel, I suppose, you would leave the man free to go for his fuel where he liked ?—Yes, there should be no compulsion; it would be well, if the published list of prices contained a note to the effect that no man is compelled to buy tools or fuel from his employers.

3742. Have you any experience in other industries than quarries and coal mines as an inspector ?—Only quarrying and gold mining and metal mining. I may point out that so far as quarries and metal mines are concerned fines are not nearly so frequently imposed as seems to be the case in collieries. I take it that that is due to the difference in the calling—that in the collieries there are so many things that you may have to guard yourself against that the man may do which would either do you damage or cause danger; I think that is the reason; but it is the fact that you might have a colliery employing 1,000 men and a quarry employing 1,000 men; and you might find in the case of the quarry that twenty of those 1,000 have been fined in a year, and in the case of the colliery one hundred or a couple of hundred have been fined during the year.

3743. Does Nottinghamshire come within your district ?—No.

3744. Then would you see any objection to abolishing fines in a quarry and leaving that to the effect of discipline ?—My assistant, who has been longer connected with the quarries than I have, and who is a very able man, is in favour of that. He wishes that everything should be done by prosecution, more especially for breach of the special rules. He expresses the opinion that you have expressed; he is in favour of the special rules being enforced by prosecution; but there is not the same difficulty—the special rules in quarries are a simple matter as compared with the special rules in collieries.

By Mrs. Tennant.

3745. I gather from your replies to the Chairman that you are of opinion that the law is satisfied by the contract which you have put in ?—Yes.

3746. As well as studying Section 1, Sub-section 1 (a), have you directed your attention to Section 1, Sub-section 2 (b) ?—Yes.

3747. Do you think the legislature means exactly the same thing in both cases ?—The acts or omissions are pointed out to the workman when he signs the form. I think (b) is complied with.

3748. Have you been informed that in the Factory Department prosecutions have been successfully conducted in twelve cases for what that Department has considered breaches of Section 1, Sub-section 1 (a), that is a failure to publish the contract showing what fines may be imposed on the workman—not what fines have been imposed, but what fines may be imposed ?—You mean for omitting to publish what the fines will be imposed for.

3749. Yes. There have been twelve successful prosecutions under that subsection, there has been one for not giving true particulars of the fine; and there have been five for providing for unfair and unreasonable fines—for stating that the firms were going to fine for certain matters which the Factory Department considered were not fair and reasonable matters or reasonable sums ?—I quite understand, but, as I said, this is the view that has been held by the coal trade, that they could comply with " or the contract is in writing signed by the workmen " by that particular form; and I think it does comply with Section 1, Sub-section 2 (b).

3750. I think it does, but as the Chairman pointed out, I do not think it can be said to apply to Section 1, Sub-section 1 (a). I will read the section: " An employer shall not make any contract with any workman for any deduction from the sum contracted to be paid by the employer to the workman, or for any payment to the employer by the workman, for or in respect of any fine, unless—(a) the terms of the contract are contained in a notice kept constantly affixed at such place or places open to the workmen and in such a position that it may be easily seen, read, and copied, by any person whom it affects; or the contract " (that is the same contract) " is in writing, signed by the workman; and (b) the contract specifies the acts or omissions in respect of which the fine may be imposed " (not " has been," but " may be ") " and the amount of the fine or the particulars from which that amount may be ascertained." That suggests the future, does it not ?—But (b) seems to refer to the first part of Sub-section 1, where, if you do publish, the contract that you publish must specify the acts or omissions ; but you need not publish at all; you might rely on " or the contract is in writing signed by the workman."

3751. Certainly you may make the contract in an alternative way, but you must make it; you may not rely upon the particulars required by subsection 2; unless you have made your contract you may make no deduction at all: the deduction is illegal; no doubt it was in those circumstances that these twelve cases were taken—because the first part had not been complied with ?—But had the second part been complied with ?

3752. It is immaterial, because the first part governs the second ?—Do you mean that it governs " or the contract is in writing signed by the workman." Surely they would have used the word " and " instead of the word " or."

3753. No; there is an alternative given; you may take it either way ?—Yes; then it is taken the second way.

3754. The contract may be made either way, but unless it is made, showing what fines may be imposed, it is no use when the fine has been imposed to show for what it has been imposed ?—It would not be, but it does not act quite in that way in its operation; because the man is told that he has committed a certain offence and that he is going to be fined. This is probably the day before pay-day when he is handed his pay ticket; he is told that there is a fine going to be inflicted upon him at the pay for a certain thing. That form is handed to him before he has his pay and he signs it before he has his pay. I think it is open to either view; it would have to be decided by some lawyer; I have no doubt it could be amended so as to avoid the difficulty.

3755. You expressed the opinion a minute ago that it would be a service to the workmen if the terms of the Act were made public ?—Yes.

3756. That would be in order to enable them to know that there was such an Act and that it was there for their protection ?—Yes.

3757. That being your opinion, did it not occur to you that it would be going some way towards that if you took a case into Court under Section 1, Sub-section 1 (a). I think it is quite clear that the workman should get two classes of information: the first, which informs him to what sort of fine he is liable, in respect of what sort of offence, and what the amount is to be; the second, after he has committed the offence, which gives him particulars of the offence and particulars of the amount. Your desire is to inform the workman of the fine to which he is liable; you think that if he saw the Truck Act and saw that he was liable to fines those fines could only be imposed under certain conditions. Would it in your opinion, be a gain to the workman if Section 1, Sub-section 1, were read as the Chairman suggests it should be read, and as the Factory Department has interpreted it; that is, as requiring information beforehand instead of after the commission of the offence ?—I quite agree that it would be an advantage to the workman if he could know exactly all the time he was employed what fines he was liable to, but he does know to this extent; he knows that he has to comply with the special rules, and that if he does not comply with the special rules he will either be fined (we could not tell him the amount) or he will be prosecuted; and he knows also himself that if he does certain things which are not in the special rules he will be fined. I do not think you can give the amounts. You might specify the class of thing that he would be fined for, but, two different men doing the same thing, one might deserve a much worse punishment than the other; suppose an official did a certain thing it would be quite a different matter to one of the workmen doing it.

3758. But if you do not state the amount how is any tribunal going to decide whether it is fair and reasonable or not? Prosecutions have been successfully conducted by the Factory Department for providing for an unfair and unreasonable deduction—not for imposing it but for providing for it ?—You think you can successfully prosecute people for putting up a notice such as the instance I gave.

3759. I not only think it, but I know it; it has been done successfully ?—Yes, I think you are quite right.

3760. The Factory Department have done it ?—Successfully ?

3761. Yes. You have never thought of taking a case under that section ?—No. Personally I think the method we adopted about fines is quite fair and is effective; it effects the object we have in view about keeping up discipline.

3762. I gather from Mr. Delevingne that the point has not been raised at the Home Office ?—It has not been raised officially, I think.

3763. You have never tried issue with the legal gentleman ?—No, for the reason that I think it is a fairly satisfactory method. Each individual is told what it is he has done, and what he is going to be fined.

3764. What he is going to be fined after the commission of the offence ?—After the commission of the offence. He can leave if he likes or he can be fined. The question is would the other way effect anything better than that.

3765. I gather you have no hope that any alternative would be more successful than this system of fining appears to be ?—Of course something might be suggested that might be better, but I think at present it is fair and satisfactory so long as they do not fine them too much, and that they hand the fines over to some society belonging to the men themselves, just to show that there is no spite or wish to inflict hardship upon them—that it is all in view of discipline and nothing else.

3766. You tell us that whenever a man has the choice of a fine or dismissal or prosecution he always chooses the fine ?—Not always.

3767. In what circumstances has he not chosen the fine ?—A man may turn round and say, "well, I will not be fined; I will leave on Saturday." If he were either cross or thought that he was being fined unjustly he would say, "Well, I will leave; I won't be fined."

3768. Would you say that in the majority of cases the man chooses to be fined ?—Oh, yes, in ninety-nine cases out of a hundred I should think; they all prefer the fine to being summonsed; they dislike being summonsed very much.

3769. They prefer the fines either to a summons or to dismissal, I presume, because they look upon it as the lesser punishment ?—The lesser evil.

3770. Do you think that the lesser punishment would be as great a deterrent as the greater punishment ?—Well, of course you must fine according to the offence. If you think it is rather a small thing that the man has done, and still you cannot actually look over it, you would fine him some trifling amount. Of course the bigger the fine the more deterrent it would be.

3771. The bigger the punishment. In human affairs I think we are generally more deterred by a greater punishment than by a lesser punishment; is not that so ?—I think so, if one always knows that one is going to suffer in that way.

3772. Of course, if we had this notice up which you would like to see up, there would be that information. But apart from that, you admit that the object of a fine is to deter the person from repeating the commission of the offence, is not that so ?—To deter him and others—to keep up discipline.

3773. Then if you impose heavier punishment—not by way of fine but by way of dismissal or prosecution—you are more likely to secure that end ?—In many cases the man would not mind dismissal so much as being fined; in other cases he would.

3774. You tell us that in the majority of cases apparently he does ?—Yes, he does. If he is satisfied with his employment he does; if it happened to occur at a time when he was dissatisfied he would probably say, "I will leave."

3775. In those cases I think you will admit that the firm would have had a better result if the greater punishment was before the man rather than the lesser ?—Do you mean imposing a larger fine ?

3776. Not imposing a larger fine, but dismissing. There are the three alternatives, fining, prosecution, or dismissal ?—Prosecution is the largest in his mind, I think as a rule.

3777. Even if he likes his employment and does not wish to change it ?—Yes; a collier would dislike being prosecuted almost more than being dismissed. It is difficult to say. There are cases of course where they would not. A respectable man does not like being hauled into the police court.

3778. Prosecution is the means of securing good discipline or good conduct which is put at the disposal of the colliery owner by the State ?—Yes.

3779. Now you said on one point that you think it is harder on the man that he should be either prosecuted or dismissed than that he should be fined. In saying that did you take into account the hardship upon his colleagues if his offence is one that endangers their lives ?—The manager would judge about that at the time that he determined either that the man should be fined or prosecuted. If he thought that it was a serious matter he would prosecute the man, no doubt, especially if it had been a second offence. It depends a good deal on the circumstances of the case and the man who is brought before the manager. Sometimes the manager can see that the man has committed the offence perhaps thoughtlessly, without any intention, and would be disposed to let him off easily. One must really judge of individual cases.

3780. But thoughtlessness may be a very dangerous matter in a mine ?—It might be, and then they would prosecute, no doubt; or, if they fined, they would do the other thing, which they dislike even more than prosecution—they would put a notice up saying that the man had been fined 10s. for endangering the lives of others, and so on.

3781. If that has been the course in the case of this firm whose list you have given us and whose list is put up, it does not seem to be very effective; I see that fines are repeated for insufficient spragging; that is a matter which might involve other people as well as the man himself in danger ?—Spragging usually involves only the man who has ommitted the spragging. The colliery I have mentioned has very good discipline. Among 5,000 or 6,000 men you will certainly have a certain number of cases of breach of the rules, and so on, but in the case of that particular firm they maintain discipline very well indeed. You will see that they have fined seventy-eight times ; in the last year they had not one prosecution, but they generally have about five or six prosecutions in the year and upwards of 100 fines ; that is what it amounts to.

16 July 1906.

3782. I notice that this particular offence of spragging is classed as of the same importance as that of stealing coal ; in each case the fine has been 2s. 6d. ?—Yes.

3783. But stealing coal (which could not have been, I should say, to a very large extent) could only have hurt the colliery owner in a small deg ee, whereas insufficient spragging might have caused loss of life ?—But insufficient spragging might mean two or three things ; if the man had only omitted spragging for a yard or two of his wall they would probably fine him 2s. 6d. ; if he omitted to sprag for nine or ten yards they would probably fine him 10s., or prosecute him ; it is all a question of degree ; you must rely on the man who is put in charge.

3784. Even admitting that we have got the extreme fine of 10s.—that means that it is only four times more important to endanger life than to steal a small quantity of coal ?—I think he got off very well if he was stealing coal ; probably if he had been prosecuted he would have been sent to prison.

3785. Do not you think that he got off too well if he was endangering life and was only fined 10s. ?—It depends on the degree of endangering life.

By Mr. Ramsay Macdonald.

3786. Have you had any prosecutions at all under the Truck Act ?—Not one.

3787. In your opinion the workpeople in Lancashire have not had to pay too much for raw material or tools or powder or for anything supplied to them ?—No, I do not think they have.

3788. I mean, of course, in mining ; all my questions relate to mining ?—Yes, as I have pointed out, the value that is put upon doing things for them is a pretty liberal one from the point of view of the owners. What I mean is, if they find them lamps, for instance—they generally supply the men with lamps and oil for their work—they charge them so much a week for the supply of oil.

3789. Have you ever inquired carefully and in detail whether what they charge them for their lamps and oil is anything like what it costs the masters to purchase the materials ?—When you add the keeping of the lamps and the magazines for the oil and all the accessories, which you are entitled to add under the old Truck Act of 1831, I have no doubt that in the larger collieries where there are such a lot of men to deal with there is what you might call a profit made on the part of the employer.

3790. My question was rather whether you had gone into the matter in detail ; whether you are able to say in respect of those larger collieries that the profit is such and such, naming the figure as the result of your investigation ? —On several occasions I have gone into the question of the price of coals and explosives and those things ; I do not know that I have ever gone into the question of the cost of the lamps, but on one or two occasions it struck me that the charge for lamps was rather higher than it ought to be, I mean perhaps higher in the case of one colliery than in the case of another ; but I do not think there is anything in Lancashire with respect to anything that they supply to the men which amounts to what you might call an imposition upon them.

3791. You admit that the expression " an imposition " is an expression which is exceedingly vague and doubtful, but anything that amounts to a breach of the Truck Act not merely in the spirit but in the letter would be wrong ? —That would be wrong, yes ; but, mind, the Truck Act gives them the privilege of charging for accessory work, as you may call it, in reference to anything that they do for the men, but it does not give them the power to take the profits of a trader from them.

3792. Take the case that you gave us as to the price of powder supplied to the workmen in North Wales. If I understood your evidence aright you assume that when the men agreed to the prices then that was all that was necessary ?—Yes, I did.

3793. But would you say that that was a compliance with the Truck Act ?—Well, I think practically it is, when you have put it into force.

3794. Surely if any Act is passed it is passed for the purpose of being actually put into force ?—Yes, but we discussed the whole question of what the men were being charged for their explosives, and we had the price before us that was charged by the explosive manufacturers to the colliery owners. The whole matter was before us, and we came to the conclusion that certain prices would be fair. It is quite impracticable to fix a detailed list of prices in a case of that kind. You have, as it were, to give and take. Some men are using a cheap explosive in the colliery ; others are using a dear one, and so on ; and you have to, as it were, fix up something that you think is fair to either party, and I think that is a compliance with the Truck Act as far as you can practically apply it.

3795. Have you had any similar experience to that of North Wales in adjudicating between masters and men as to the prices of materials supplied ?—On one or two occasions I have made a suggestion that certain prices seemed high—an informal suggestion—and they have said, " Oh, well, we will knock off so and so."

3797. You did not go into the question of discounts ? —You mean discounts allowed by the trader ?

3798. Yes ?—I know there are such things, and we try to get at the net prices as far as we can.

3799. You mean by net price the price where discount is given ?—The actual price to the owners is what we try to get into our minds.

3800. Is it the habit of the Home Office to try and unify the administration of the law so far as it is common to the mines and to the factories ?—I do not quite follow you.

3801. Take the Truck Acts. The Mines Department administers the Truck Acts in the same way, or at least administers the same Truck Acts, as the Factory Department administers them. Now we have in front of us a most elaborate table showing prosecutions under the Truck Acts instituted by the Factory Department between the nears 1888 and 1905. That table details a series of offences under the Truck Acts that have been the subject of prosecution ?—Yes. I can quite see that the Truck Act will be much more difficult to administer in the case of factories and places of that kind—cotton factories and so on—than it is with mines ; there are so many fines for bad work that come in in the case of factories ; people are fined for bad work ; it is a most intricate kind of thing.

3802. I do not want to go over the points that Mrs. Tennant has made, but under that section there have been prosecutions, as Mrs. Tennant said, successfully undertaken by the Factory Department, but I understand that no such prosecutions have been carried on under the auspices of the Mines Department ?—Under that particular section, no.

3803. Although apparently the conditions where the Factory Department have successfully prosecuted obtain in mines—lack of contract, for instance ?—Except that in the factories where they did not publish and where the factory inspectors were successful in getting conviction, I think they had not that particular form of contract that I have handed in. In the case of the factories I presume the people neither published nor did they make a man sign that he was willing to be fined.

3804. Am I right in assuming from what you said towards the end of your evidence in chief that until quite recently this case had not been reported to the Home Office ?—No ; why should it be reported if it is considered to be legal ? I agree with the legal adviser of the Coal Association that it is right, and I also think that it is a fair way to do it; so that there is no need at any rate for me to report it to the Home Office.

3805. You have used frequently the expression that such and such things were "fair" and "practicable" and so on. At the back of your mind you have also got the further justification, and I think the only justification that concerns us, that they are legal; that this system of fining which you have been presenting your evidence upon is not only fair in your judgment and not only practicable—the whole system that you have described to us to-day is not only fair and practicable in your judgment and not only satisfactory to the men, not only a thing that has been agreed to between the masters and the men, but that behind it all it is legal and in accordance with the provisions of the law?—So far as fines are concerned, I think it is legal, under the words in the latter part of the clause "or the contract is in writing." I do not see what else that can mean. What does it mean?

3806. My point is this; that you have been describing to us a certain condition of fines—a certain method of enforcing discipline—a certain way of making deductions with and without contracts, and I was struck with the way in which you used the expressions "fair" and "satisfactory." I also want to know if you are prepared to say that it is legal?—I think that so far as the section dealing with fines is concerned it is quite legal. Mind, I say I think so; I am only a layman, and I do not know that it is quite legal under those particular words. As to deductions from wages for materials, there is a contract; the men sign a book in which the contract is stated; so that my remarks are confined to the fining sections.

3807. But in addition to that you think that when they sign this contract for deductions the prices stated are fair and reasonable. It is not merely the question of contract there; the deduction has got to be a "fair and reasonable" deduction, and it has to meet certain other conditions?—Deductions for materials you mean.

3808. Materials, powder, sharpening of tools and so on?—Yes. Speaking generally, they are fairly reasonable.

3809. Now, I would like to put a question or two about the general effect of fines; you have no experience, have you, either of mines or of quarries where no fines are imposed at all?—Oh yes. I have asked at a good many quarries since this inquiry has been to the front, "How do you do about fining. What contract have you made as to fines." The answer has been "Oh, we never fine." That is especially the case in North Wales. Then I have asked, "What do you do if a man commits an offence"; and the answer is, "Oh, we dismiss him if it is a bad one; if it is not we let him off."

3810. Have you any reason to believe that the discipline in those quarries which are without fines is worse or better?—Worse.

3811. Worse than in quarries where fines are imposed?—I should fancy it would be, but I was comparing them more with collieries.

3812. Then in your experience the lack of fines does not indicate a superior discipline?—No, it does not. It rather indicates that the manager does not take so much notice of things as probably he ought to do. I have had under me a large number of men of various kinds, and my experience is that if you want to keep up discipline, you must be severe with them. If you are not, discipline will disappear.

3813. With regard to fines for breaches of statutory laws and of the special regulations, did not Parliament contemplate prosecution under such circumstances?—Yes, I should think that was so.

3814. You will probably agree that it was not the intention of Parliament in passing the Mines Regulations Act to give employers a further incentive to enforce fines of which they were themselves to be the judges, but rather that it was the intention of Parliament to bring breaches specified in the special regulations, into court so as to stop them altogether?—Yes, I think I agree with you there, but when you come to put it into practice you may find it impracticable, and may have to take the best other course.

3815. Perhaps Parliament made a mistake if that is so?—If a law was made to do away with fines, and to substitute prosecution you would have to simplify prosecution. Not only has the manager to prosecute his men, but after that, if the fine is not paid, the colliery manager has to send out a warrant and to collect the fines so that he might never be done with cases.

3816. In your experience do you find that fines as a matter of fact make certain breaches of these special rules, and breaches of discipline which do not come under these rules—a sort of habitual thing, I mean; if you fine a man 2s. 6d. does it not, as a matter of fact, diminish his sense of responsibility as part of the working organisation of the mine?—No, I think it is a deterrent.

3817. A deterrent?—Unquestionably.

3818. Would you say, as a result of your experience, that fines do stop faults?—Yes.

3819. And that if fines were removed, faults, serious faults, would increase?—I think so, unless you substituted some other means of dealing with them.

3820. That might mean substituting dismissal or prosecution in serious cases; but I am simply thinking of fines as fines, apart from anything that may be substituted. Are you really convinced that fines are a convenience and also an effective means of dealing with cases?—Yes, with the simpler cases.

3821. Who tries these cases? A man commits a mistake and is fined; but Parliament contemplated that mistakes should be made the subject of a judicial inquiry and that evidence for and against him should be submitted to somebody with legal experience. Now, in these cases, under the method of fining, who is it that decides?—The manager of the mine.

3822. Does he decide whether the fault has taken place, and what is its degree, and does he exercise his own judgment as to the fine that is to be imposed?—Yes.

3823. And does he sometimes decide how the fine is to be spent?—I think that should be left to the men; it would be a decided improvement if the money were handed over to some of the men's benefit clubs.

3824. We have had evidence, as the Chairman has indicated, to show that fines in factories have been ineffective for disciplinary purposes. Can you suggest any reason why the method, ineffective in factories, namely the method of fining, would be effective in coal mines?—No I could not explain that. I can only express the opinion that, so far as colliers are concerned, fining is effective. It may not be the very best method that could be adopted, but I cannot understand how you could imagine it to be otherwise than effective. A man does not like 2s. 6d. taken off his wage

3825. Nor does he like to kill his fellows?—No, but some of them do very foolish things sometimes 3826. With fines and without fines?—Yes, perhaps so.

3827. It has been suggested to us that fines and deductions should not exceed a certain percentage of the wages in any one week. Would that meet your case with reference to the list that you have put in front of us?—I imagine the suggestion of limiting the amount of a fine has more in view the case of factories where there is fining for damage. In collieries where there is so very small a proportion of fines, there is no fear of the amount reaching any large percentage of the individual wage.

3828. Supposing a man's wages were £1 per week, and it was settled that not more than 25 per cent. should be posed as fines in any one week, not more than 5s. in any one week, what would you think of that?—There would be no objection to that.

3829. But it would not meet your case where heavy fines of 10s. are imposed?—If the case was thought more serious than a 5s. fine would meet, the man might instead be prosecuted or dismissed, if it is thought there is good reason for a limitation.

3830. You are in favour of the giving of household fuel to colliers by their employers, or rather, you think that deductions for the supply of household fuel should be made legal?—Only for this reason. It is the general method in many mining districts to supply the men with fuel for their houses at a cheaper rate, and that is kept off their wages the same as rent which, under the Truck

16 July 1906.

Acts, is allowed to be deducted. The deduction is constantly made, and, of course, it is, in a sense an illegality as things stand, and it is better that it should be made legal if there is no objection to it.

3831. Would not the same thing hold good with regard to the working baker who receives bread from his employer ?—Yes, no doubt it is breaking the spirit of the Truck Acts in not confining deductions to things necessary for his avocation, which I take to mean things necessary to a man at his work.

3832. Perhaps you would not press that very much ?—No, I only thought that, in view of the practice, it should be settled one way or the other.

By Mr. Maddison.

3833. What is the opinion, so far as you know it, of the Union Leaders in Lancashire as to the present method of fining ?—I have frequently met them, and had long gossips with them, but I don't think they have ever mentioned that subject to me.

3834. Then you have no more definite information concerning their opinion than mere casual gossip ?—No, they may hold a strong opinion upon it for anything I know, but, if they had, I think it would have come out in conversation.

3835. Among the many collieries in Lancashire with an elaborate system of fining has nothing happened to bring the union into conflict with the employers on the subject of fines ? Do you know of any case of dispute over it ?—No, I cannot recall a case, but I have mentioned that there were only seventy-eight fines in a year among about 5,000 men.

3836. I am not thinking so much about the number of the fines, but, as a matter of fact, you don't really know the opinion of the men's leaders on this question of fining ?—I do not.

3837. You have said that the men regard prosecution as the major punishment—as the more excessive punishment in their opinion ?—Yes.

3838. What has been your experience of men who have been prosecuted, as to their subsequent conduct in the mines ?—I have no opportunity of following the conduct of particular men.

3839. Have you any general evidence as to that ?—No. I could only hold the general view that prosecution ought to have a salutary effect upon offenders

3840. But, as a matter of fact, you have no experience of the relative value of these different measures as deterrents, one as compared with the other ?—No, I could not say anything on that particular point.

3841. In assessing their value as deterrents can you only give us a mere opinion ?—Well, no. I find that in collieries where there is most strictness by fines and prosecution there are fewer breaches of the rules.

3842. Have they fewer breaches when they fine the most or when they prosecute the most ? That is what I want to get at ?—They always fine the most. Prosecutions are exceptional; but I think it goes without saying that where you are stricter either by fine or prosecution the discipline will be better.

3843. Which do you call the stricter ?—Prosecutions, I think.

3844. Therefore discipline is best with prosecutions ?—If it were practicable I should go for prosecution to take up all these cases, but that raises a difficulty.

3845. I understand you to say that discipline is maintained better by prosecutions but that prosecutions are not quite practicable ?—That is not quite what I meant. The manager has got to maintain discipline, how is he going to do it ? If he is going to rely altogether on prosecutions his underlooker or himself will have to spend far too much time in the police court, so he looks out for some other course and resorts to fines. My view is that the course resorted to in fining may be described as fairly satisfactory, but if the whole thing could be enforced by prosecution it would no doubt maintain discipline better. That, however, would entail a vast amount of trouble and would be much harder on the men.

3846. Seeing that many of these fines are imposed for offences against safety and against life itself would you not think that the convenience of the manager, which should not be altogether disregarded, ought to be subservient to the higher interests of the safety of the workmen ?—I agree with you to that extent, but you must consider this that the manager of a colliery is wanted at the colliery and should not be too much away in a police court. A mine is not like a factory, where there is no danger when a manager goes away. A colliery manager has to be nearly always on the spot.

3847. You make a broad distinction in many ways between a colliery and an ordinary factory ?—Yes.

3849. Take the offence of taking matches down a pit. Surely nothing can be more serious in its possibilities than that ?—It looks worse than it is. It is perhaps rather improper for an inspector to say so, but it may look worse to an outsider. The history of such a case probably is that the man has changed his jacket before he came to work, and did not know there were matches in it, and he may have taken them down the pit with no more intention of striking a match than you or I have. It may be simple forgetfulness, that is all. If a man takes the matches down with the intention of striking them in the pit that would be a very different thing.

3850. I follow that entirely, and no doubt the same act may be very different under different circumstances, but you must admit that there is a possibility of terrible consequences from taking matches down a pit, no matter what the cause or excuse ?—Yes. If you look through our list of prosecutions in the Inspector's Report you will find that they consist largely of prosecutions for that offence. We usually prosecute for that.

3851. Do you think that the tribunal of the manager is a better one than the police court, having regard to all the circumstances, for determining the intention of the offender ?—No, I do not think it is. I think the police court is best and it is fairest to the man if he likes to go there, for he will be defended against the other view. But it is really what most of the men like worst and it would be hardest on them. It is best from our point of view as regards discipline. But I maintain that in a large colliery employing 5,000 or 6,000 men there would have to be so many prosecutions that it would not only occupy much time but would make prosecutions less effective. The Factory Department are constantly prosecuting factories for such an offence as employing workers overtime, and the fines inflicted by the magistrate are about 2s. 6d. or 5s. What is the reason of that ? because prosecutions are so frequent that it is looked upon as a common offence, and it is treated as such. My principle is to have as few prosecutions as possible, but, when I have one, a man may be fined £10 or £20. If I were prosecuting every day the fines might go down to 5s.

3852. How is the evidence got by the manager as to offences ?—A man is reported by the under-official, perhaps the under-manager, as having committed such and such an offence. The manager sees the man and hears from the official what is the charge.

3853. Does he call any of the fellow workmen of the accused, for or against, and is there any thorough attempt at investigation ?—I am afraid it is rather a rough kind of justice. I am afraid there is not much attempt at thorough investigation. That is why I say a prosecution in a police court may prove to be fairer from a man's point of view. But in the end I think they get fair justice. At least there is no spite in the matter.

3854. You mean that the average cases are justly treated ?—Yes.

3855. Do not you think there may be individual cases of hardship from time to time ?—Yes; and people may get wrong in the police court too.

3856. At any rate the evidence would be heard there for and against ?—Yes.

3857. Don't you think, if this fining does go on, that there ought to be some means by which the check weighman or a committee of the men might have some power of examination of the amount of the fines ?—Yes, I think you might contrive something of the sort and have someone to represent the men.

3858. But you still think that, even in the serious offences against safety, the system of leaving it to the discretion of the manager is a good one, having regard to safety and all the higher interests of the men ?—Yes, I have no fault to find with it. The name of the offence may imply something more serious than the particular offence itself amounts to.

3859. I suppose there are offences which are mere breaches of discipline without necessarily being breaches of safety regulations ?—Yes, I think there will be some.

3860. For instance, I see in the list there is one case of stealing coal. That depends very much upon how much the man steals and upon all the circumstances ?—I asked about that particular case and was told that it meant filling up coal out of the shunts where it had been upset from the men's tubs. It is a case of men against men and not men against employers.

By Mr. Delevingne.

3861. On the question generally of the enforcement of these special rules and the modes by which they ought to be enforced, I should like it to be clear that there is no obligation placed upon the management to prosecute the men for breaches of special rules. The Act provides for a penalty for breaches of these special rules by the workmen, but does not place a duty upon the owner or employer to prosecute ?—No, it is left to his own option.

3862. His duty is quite a general one, namely, to see that the special rules are observed by the men ?—Yes

3863. And the owner, agent, or manager is liable to a penalty himself if the special rules are not observed ?—Yes.

3864. If an inspector came along, and found a breach of the special rules, the owner or manager would be liable to a fine unless he could show that the firm were enforcing a proper system of discipline among the men ?—Yes.

3865. About the system of prosecutions, what does it involve in most cases to the management ? Does it usually mean that one or more officials are taken away from their regular duty to go to the police court ?—Yes ; first they have to get the summons signed.

3866. What does that mean ?—Someone has to go, say, to Wigan or St. Helens, and get a magistrate to sign the summons.

3867. Would that be done by an official of the colliery ?—It might be done by a clerk. Then there is the hearing, and the colliery owner as a rule employs, on his side, a lawyer who has to prove the case. He may have to bring forward one or two officials, especially the one who found the man committing the offence, and perhaps also another official. Although the manager may not have been present when the offence was committed he may also be wanted at the police court, and as a rule he goes there. But the case may not come on until the afternoon and these people may be kept there waiting all day. After a fine of 20s., or whatever it may be, is inflicted, the defendant may plead that he cannot pay at once, and will ask to be allowed to pay by instalments. That being arranged the man goes away after paying one instalment and never appears any more.

3868. Do you mean that he leaves the mine ?—Not necessarily, he simply does not pay.

3870. Do the colliery people have to apply for the warrant ?—Yes.

3871. Who tells them to do that ?—I think that is a regulation of the police. Some of the cases cause endless trouble, but some are very simple.

3872. Are any of the miners themselves called as witnesses in such cases, or is the offence usually proved by the evidence of officials ?—A man may call his mate who works by his side to give evidence for him.

3873. What happens at the colliery during the absence of these officials who are, I suppose, usually the men in charge of a district ?—Another man, an intelligent collier, or any suitable person that can be got, is deputed to take the duty of the absentee on that particular day.

3874. Does a colliery keep any reserve stock of firemen to meet such emergencies ?—There are generally men who can be trusted for a short time.

3875. Special arrangements have to be made ?—Yes.

3876. Are the men usually defended in these prosecutions. I mean is the defendant represented by a lawyer ?—In many cases he is. I think the men's union sometimes employs a lawyer to defend the accused

3877. Is that a matter of course ?—Not invariably. He is left to pay his own fine, but the union sends someone often to see that he is fairly used, as I think they ought to do. If the case is a bad one they would leave a man to his own devices

3878. Do the unions exercise discrimination between different classes of cases ?—I think so. If they thought it quite evident that the man had committed a breach of the regulations they would probably leave him to fight it out for himself, but if they thought there was any hardship they might send someone to defend him.

3879. How do the facts come to the knowledge of the union ? Is it reported by the man himself ?—I do not know.

3880. Is it your opinion that a system of prosecution is much more effective than a system of fining ?—I think there is no doubt about that.

3881. Can you explain why some owners take so many prosecutions and some none at all ? Is it merely a question of trouble ?—No, a good many employers do not like to prosecute their workmen.

3882. Why ?—They think it is hard upon them. They would rather adopt the expedient of fines or some other means. If they do not prosecute it is often due more to sympathy with the men than to anything else

3883. Do you encourage owners of mines to prosecute for breaches of special rules?—Yes, if it is anything serious. If I find a man doing something he ought not to do, I may say to the employer, "You had better take him up to Wigan," and he is taken there.

3884. With regard to the list of fines you have handed in, showing seventy-eight in the course of a year, would that represent practically all the serious breaches of special rules in that particular colliery ?—There would be five or six prosecutions.

3885. And that would include all the serious breaches ?—Yes, all that came to the knowledge of the firm.

3886. In cases where owners take frequent prosecutions, do they also impose fines to any considerable extent ?—Yes.

3887. They have a mixed system of prosecution and fines ?—Yes. At any rate the larger colliery firms fine as well as prosecute. There may be some little collieries where they do neither the one nor the other.

3888. Is that where the discipline is worse ?—Yes.

3889. Do prosecutions lead to friction between the employers and the workmen ?—No, I don't think so.

3890. Coming now to that form of contract which you handed in and which you say the owners have been advised by Mr. Ellis is a legal form of contract, Mrs. Tennant asked you whether the fact that the contract was made after the offence had been committed did not invalidate it in view of the terms of Section I. of the Truck Act of 1896 which provides that a contract has to be made in respect to fines which may be imposed. I suppose Mr. Ellis would say to that that at the time the contract was made the fine had not been imposed ?—No, it is imposed the following day.

3891. The contract was for the payment of a sum of money subsequent to the contract ?—Yes. I have discussed the matter with Mr. Ellis, who seems to be quite satisfied that he is right, and I am rather disposed to agree with him.

Mr. H. Hall, I.S.O.

16 July 1906.

3892. I only wanted to know what his view was. Mrs. Tennant also asked you whether the fact that the fine was imposed and the contract made after the commission of the offence was not a hardship upon the men, and I understood you to say it was not a hardship ?—That would depend a good deal upon what the men were charged with doing. The men know the rules pretty well, and the things they ought not to do outside the rules, so they have a fair knowledge previous to the fining as to what they may be fined for.

3893. Is it their business to know the special rules ?—Yes.

3896. In a case of insufficient spragging it is the man himself who is in danger ?—Yes.

3897. It is the manager's business to see that the men observe the rules ?—Certainly.

3898. I think there was some little misunderstanding about your opinion on one point. I think you are of opinion that if there are to be fines there should be a general notice of them posted up at the pit head showing what are the acts and offences in respect of which fines may be imposed, and the amount ?—Yes, I think in fairness to all parties these particular offences ought to be published. You might not be able to include everything, but you could give a general idea.

3899. You are not upholding the system of individual contracts ?—Not at all.

3900. Do the men's unions interfere in the case of fines which they consider to be unreasonable. I mean, supposing a man is fined, as he thinks, unjustly, would he complain to his union, and would the union take the matter up ?—I should think they would, but I don't know of any particular cases.

3901. Have you had any complaints from the unions as to unfair fines ?—No

3902. Have you had any from individual workmen ?—No.

3903. I suppose the men do frequently communicate with you as to matters under the Mines Act ?—Oh yes.

3904. Is it reasonable to suppose that if there was any general feeling about the matter or frequent cases of what the men consider injustice you would have heard of them ?—I think I should.

3905. Are the fines mostly imposed upon the younger colliers ?—I have really no information upon that, but I should think fines would be mostly upon young hauliers and drawers.

3906. I have heard it said that it is the young colliers and the youths employed on the haulage roads who are most difficult to manage, and upon whom the fines are most frequently imposed ?—I should think it is so, but I could not say for certain.

3908. What sort of man was the manager there ?—I could hardly say. He seemed to be constantly at loggerheads with his men. I think he was hard on his men.

3909. Is he still there ?—No, he is not. He ran away in the end, and has not been heard of since and the notices are to be altered.

3910. You have settled that with the owners ?—Yes.

3911. What is your view as to what is the best system in the interests of general safety with regard to the supply of explosives to miners ? I understand there are two systems at present prevailing, one by which the men buy their own explosives anywhere they like, and the other by which they are not allowed to obtain explosives except from the owners ?—That is so.

3912. Which do you consider best in the interests of safety ?—That the men should get their explosives from the owners. That is universally the case in Lancashire, where the owner buys the explosive and sells it to his men at fixed prices.

3913. Why do you consider that the best system in the interests of safety ?—Because it enables one to know precisely what kind of explosive the men are using, otherwise explosives might get down a pit which should not be allowed to be taken down.

3914. Is that especially important in regard to the use of permitted explosives in fiery and dusty mines ?—Yes, I think it would be wrong to let men bring in what explosives they liked

3915. In a fiery and dusty mine where only explosives permitted by the Home Office are allowed to be used, is there greater danger if men are allowed to buy their own, because under the same name they may get an explosive of inferior quality or one which has deteriorated in keeping, and it is important that it should be of the quality and standard prescribed by the Home Office order ?—Yes. And you can only secure that by letting the owner purchase the explosive and sell it to his men.

3916. I think you said the price at which the explosives were retailed by the owner to the men, included a certain amount towards management charges ?—I think I called them accessory charges. I meant by that that assuming the owner finds the explosives, he has to buy them in the market and get them to his colliery, and unload them, find a magazine to put them in, a man to take charge of it and distribute them; there is a good deal of cost involved in this and other ways, and he is subject to all sort of penalties if everything is not properly done. All that amounts, I should think, to something like a 1d. per pound. I think that is what we arranged in North Wales might be charged, viz., 1d. more than the owners themselves paid for the explosive.

3917. What is the average price of explosives per pound ?—Permitted explosives, I should think, about 10d. per pound; some higher and some less.

3918. Then the extra charge would be about 10 per cent ?—Yes.

3919. Does the arrangement in North Wales include gunpowder ?—No, it did not apply to gunpowder, but only to the permitted explosives.

3920. What are the management charges with regard to lamps ?—I could not say for certain; indeed, the charges vary.

3921. What are the services rendered by the owners, in addition to the provision of the lamp and the oil, for which he makes a charge in fixing the price payable by the men ?—He finds the lamp and the oil, keeps the lamp in order, although I think the repairs are generally paid for by the men if the damage has arisen through carelessness. I think the charges run to about 1d. per working day for the lamp.

3922. Does that include the cost of the lamp ?—The lamp still belongs to the employer.

3923. And he makes a charge for the use of it ?—Yes.

3924. With regard to the supply of coal to the miners, is a charge always made for the coal given to him for his domestic use, or is it sometimes looked on by the owners as a present ?—The custom varies in different districts. In the north country the men get their coals given by the owners, perhaps with some slight charge for carting it, but in Lancashire the men have to buy it and perhaps have to pay as much as either you or I would do.

3925. In those cases it is not an advantage for a man to buy his coal from the colliery ?—It may be a little advantage but not much.

3926. In some parts of the country I suppose the colliers get their coal at practically cost price ?—Yes, in some districts, and in other districts for nothing, whereas in some they have to pay full value.

3927. If a man has to pay full value in Lancashire, he does not look on the supply of coal as a privilege ?—No, I don't see how he can.

3928. Is there any compulsion upon the men to get their coal from the colliery ?—No, it is voluntary. The owners might be just as well without their custom. They often do it more to oblige the men who can pay for it out of their wages, and not feel it so much.

3929. Have any cases under the old Truck Acts come under your notice in connection with the contract system of employment where men contract with the owners to get coal at a certain price and pay their own workmen quite independently of the owners ? Have you had any cases of such men paying in goods or of any abuse under the Truck Acts ?—No, I have not. In Lancashire we have none of what I call charter masters. There are some contracts in North Wales but we have not the Staffordshire system. I have never heard of any case of abuse.

Mr. H. Hall, I.S.O.

SIXTEENTH DAY.

Thursday, 19th July, 1906.

PRESENT.

The Right Hon. THOMAS SHAW, K.C., M.P., Lord Advocate for Scotland (Chairman).

E. A. BROTHERTON, Esq., M.P.
FREDERICK CAWLEY, Esq., M.P.
MALCOLM DELEVINGNE, Esq.
FREDERICK MADDISON, Esq., M.P.
J. RAMSAY MACDONALD, Esq., M.P.
Mrs. H. J. TENNANT.
A. F. YARROW, Esq.

T. E. BETTANY, Esq. (Secretary).

Mr. A. H. STOKES, H.M. Mines Inspector for the Midland District, was called; and Examined.

Mr. A. H. Stokes.

19 July 1906.

By the Chairman.

3930. You are in the service of the Home Office ?—Yes.

3931. What is your position ?—Inspector of mines.

3932. How long have you been in the service ?—This is my thirty-third year.

3933. You remember, therefore, the system quite well prior to the Act of 1896 ?—Yes.

3934. You have known it well since ?—Fairly well.

3935. You have certain notes on the Truck Act that you wish to bring before us ?—I have.

3936. If you have your précis of evidence there will you kindly use it ?—I must say my notes have been very hurriedly put together, because I had very little time in which to prepare them.

3937. In the first place, what I want to know with regard to the Truck Act is this: there is a contract, is not there, in the mining districts ?—Yes, there is at every colliery.

3938. What is your jurisdiction so to speak; what is the extent of your district ?—Do you mean for coal mines, or do you mean the extent of the whole of my district ?

3939. The whole of your district ?—The whole of my district consists of fourteen counties. For coal mines my district covers the four counties of Derbyshire, Leicestershire, Nottinghamshire and Warwickshire.

3940. That is for coal mines ?—That is for coal mines.

3941. What are the other mines ?—Metalliferous mines and quarries.

3942. Are those in the same district ?—Yes those are in the same district, but added to them are the counties of Oxford, Cambridge, Rutland, Berkshire, and so on from Derbyshire to Middlesex.

3943. In the first place, with regard to the contract, there is in these counties a system of written contract according to the Act of Parliament, is there not ?—In the coal mines, yes.

3944. The contract is generally a printed heading to the sheets of a bound book ?—That is so.

3945. The manager signs at the top and the workmen as they are engaged sign below ?—Yes.

3946. Then the workmen at the time of signing are given the mining rules ?—Yes.

3947. The contract rules and the club rules ?—Yes.

3948. Is there a price list of work supplied by the check-weigher ?—Yes.

3949. Does the workman get a copy of the signed contract ?—A copy of the signed contract is not given to the workman.

3950. Have you any reason to doubt that he knows quite well the nature of the contract ?—The signed contract I think he has no knowledge of—the majority of the workmen have no knowledge of it. The object of the workman is to get employment, and he goes and signs the contract and probably never reads what he is signing, but the printed contract rules which are given to him he takes home.

3951. Just let us see the distinction that you make between the signed contract and the printed contract ?—That is one.

3952. This will be Exhibit No. 1 in Appendix VI. ?—That is a copy of the contract signed by the workman upon entering into employment. That is signed there by the manager on behalf of the company; it is signed here by the workman, then there is the date, whether qualified to work alone under the general rules of the Mines Act; signature or mark and the name of the person employed; his age; residence, and so on.

3953. I point out to you that all that is agreed there is to serve the company on the terms and conditions set forth and appearing in the contract rules ?—There are the contract rules. (Handing document.)

3954. So far as this document (Exhibit No. 1) is concerned it is just a contract to serve the company according to the contract rules in force ?—That is it.

3955. So that there is really no use in the man having this if he knows he has signed it ?—Not in this case, but I have another case to bring before you.

3956. Very well. This document is Exhibit No. 1. There is no harm in the man having the signed contract. The contract rules will be Exhibit No. 2 of Appendix VI. That is a copy of the thing which he takes home with him ?—That is so.

3957. Will you give me another one in which you say there is some harm in him not seeing the signed contract ?

Mr. A. H. Stokes.

19 July 1906.

—You see I have dealt with that under the contravention of the Act. We will come to that under the contravention of the Act.

3958. Very well?—I have not given you this. The check-weighman supplies that. (Producing document Exhibit No. 3 of Appendix VI.) That is the list of prices.

3959. By prices you mean the rates at which the colliery agrees to pay the workman for the piece-work?—That is it.

3960. Can you tell me, before you pass on to that, whether you have any experience of contracts for deductions, or does that come later in your evidence?—That comes later; it comes under the heading of "Contravention of the Act."

3961. So that up to that point the contract seems to be entirely in the terms of the 1896 Act?—That is so up to that point.

3962. In your district is there a system of fines in force?—There are fines for breach of discipline which are more or less inflicted at all the collieries.

3963. Generally the person signs the paper, does he not, consenting to be fined?—Those are two forms. (Handing documents.) I would like the name to be cut out. You will see there is a very good reason for it. It might cause disturbance amongst the miners if that is not done.

By the Chairman.

3964. Yes; we have a rule on that subject. (The Committee resolved to adhere to its rule not to mention in the report the names of the firms or companies.)

3965. This document (Exhibit No. 4 of Appendix VI.) is with regard to the particular colliery mentioned in it, and it starts in this way: "Truck Act, 1896. To ( ). I agree to pay a fine for the under mentioned act or omission, and I authorise you to deduct." What I want to ask you is this: that agreement is an agreement, if it can be called so, entered into after the act or omission is past?—That is so.

3966. What would happen if the collier did not come under that agreement?—You mean if he refused to sign it?

3967. Yes?—A summons or dismissal.

3968. So that he is practically constrained to sign this agreement?—That is only one method of enforcing the fine. You will see there is another method, and that is that the pay-clerk pays him the whole of his wages over the pay-desk; then he would tell him: "The manager has fined you so much for certain things. You can pay the money at the next window or to the pay-clerk"; and the man hands the fine back.

3969. Then I show you Exhibit No. 5 of Appendix VI., which is the fine contract for another firm, and it reads in this way: "I ( ) hereby agree to allow a deduction of ( ) to be made from my wages next week"; and then follows this: "Rather than be summoned before the magistrates for violating" on a blank date, and then there are two lines left blank for what the violation would be?—That is it.

3970. As you say, that would mean prosecution if he declined?—It may.

3971. Or dismissal?—It may.

3972. These papers so signed are filed, are not they, and kept as a record of the fine?—That is so.

3973. The fines are recorded in a book, and then that constitutes the register of fines as is required by Section 6, Sub-section 3 of the Act of 1896?—Yes.

3974. You incline to the opinion that that is a contract in writing as required by Section 1 (1) (a) of the Act of 1896?—Yes.

3975. Do you really think so?—I have thought so; I have never doubted it.

3976. The matter has never been tested, has it?—It has never been tested to my knowledge.

3977. I point out to you that it is a contract in writing after the fact—namely, after the act or omission?—But is not that so with the ticket, that it is after the man has done something that he is fined, and then he signs the ticket?

3978. Of course you are only taking the rule that has been adopted by the Home Office, I understand, or rather that has never been called in question by the Home Office?—I have never called it in question with the Home Office. I have taken it to comply with Section 1 (1) (a) of the 1896 Act—"or the contract is in writing signed by the workman"—and you see the marginal note in the King's printer's copy of the Act is: "Deductions or payments in respect of fines."

3979. Yes. It is a legal matter, you know, but I just wanted to ask you whether you have ever addressed your mind to this consideration, that the substantive provision of the section is that the employer shall not make any contract for any deduction unless the terms of the contract are contained in a notice kept constantly affixed or the contract is in writing signed"?—"Or"—it is either one or the other.

3980. You take "the contract is in writing signed by the workman" as something the opposite of a constantly affixed notice?—Yes, I take it that he may either do the first part of that section or he may do the second part of that section—either will comply.

3981. I point out to you that these things may not be alternative at all in the ordinary sense, that is to say, both the contract in writing and the notice may have to be entered into at the time of the fundamental contract of workmanship?—Then it appears to me that the word "or" should be "and."

3982. No, it might be either the one or the other if they all hang on the initial words of the clause, "an employer shall not make any contract with any workman for any deduction from the sum contracted to be paid by the employer to the workman or for any payment to the employer by the workman." That is not the view that you have adopted?—Well, I am not a legal man.

3983. I point out to you that in the next subsection in addition to the contract being in writing for the deduction there is to be this over and above; "and the contract specified the act or omissions in respect of which the fine may be imposed, and the amount of fine?"—I think those papers would comply with that because they would probably write upon it what it was for—bad filling, for instance. Take a fine for bad filling—that means if the man has filled slack into the tub where he should have filled coal.

3984. I do not think you quite follow the point, because when that contract that you have handed us in, (Exhibit No. 4) is signed the fine has been imposed, whereas the Statute prescribes that the contract is not only to be in writing, but it is to specify the acts or omissions in respect of which the fine may be imposed?—If I have followed it correctly I scarcely see how that could be done. Let me give you an example. A manager, or an under manager, is in the mine, and he sees a man with what they call bad spragging, which is a breach of the Act, and he says to that man, "I shall fine you 5s. for that."

3985. The point I want to ask you is this: has there been any contract as to that fine before he has discovered that?—No, none whatever.

3986. It is a legal question, but you see for yourself once the fact has arisen the workmen is completely at the mercy of the employer?—But I take it that the fine has to be reasonable or he may recover it. Supposing the workman objected to the fine of 5s.—he could recover it as unreasonable—supposing he had been fined £5 instead of 5s.?

3987. That is quite true; he could have taken that point that it was unreasonable?—Yes.

3988. Even then observe he would have to undergo the risk of prosecution or of dismissal, and then take his chance of exposing the transaction in a court of law afterwards?—I do not think the men nowadays would hesitate about that; they are so well supported by their unions.

3989. Do you see any practical difficulty in the contract being framed so as to make it clear from the beginning what are to be deductions from his wages or possible deductions from his wages?—I will try to give you an illustration if I can which would be better. Take the spragging again. The spragging may be such that it would be endangering the lives of his fellow workmen; then it would be a severe fine.

3990. Do you see any harm in making the rules beforehand so that a person entering the service knows exactly the conditions of his service ?—As regards fines ?

3991. As regards fines ?—I do not see how it would work in these cases. I was trying to put a case before you: Supposing a notice is put up that he shall be fined half a crown for bad spragging—that was one that was put up—but the manager says, "This is more serious than a 2s. 6d. fine; you are endangering the lives of the men here, and I shall fine you a sovereign for this, it is so serious," and the manager goes into the next place of work and finds a similar thing but of quite a trivial nature, and says then, "I will fine you half a crown for this."

3992. Of course, you see for yourself, do not you, that that system may be justified; but substantially it amounts to this, that they are compounding the offence ?—May that not be the fault of the Act.

3993. I think it may—if that practice that you refer to is legitimate under it ?—My only reply to that can be; make the Act clearer.

3994. Quite so. I do not suppose on principle you like the idea of Parliament having suggested that certain offences are cognisable by the criminal law, and yet it should be open to the parties to buy themselves out of a prosecution by a transaction of this kind. It is not a very comfortable idea that, is it ?—No, it is not. It is not comfortable, but if a man commits some trivial offence in a mine you do not like to prosecute a decent respectable man for a thing of that sort to be always registered against him.

3995. If you do not like to prosecute you would still like to fine him ?—I would for trivial offences.

3996. Why ?—Because discipline must be maintained.

3997. Then do I get at your evidence in this way: that you think without fines there could be no good discipline?—It could be made good by saying prosecute in every case

3998. Or by saying dismiss ?—Or by saying dismiss; but you do not like to do either for a trivial offence.

3999. The balance of your judgment is against the abolition of fines ?—Yes, I think I would say that, but I would give the men better guards than they have now, perhaps.

4000. In what way ? In the first place, you approve of the system which prevails in nearly all your districts for the fines recovered going to hospitals or sick benefit societies or the like ?—Certainly. I would make that compulsory that it should not be devoted to any other purpose than a charitable purpose.

4001. Have you seen any of these contracts for fines that are unreasonable ?—No. Some of them have been heavy, but we must have discipline in a coal mine. The discipline in a coal mine now is getting almost like military discipline. The workman in a factory may commit some little breach of the Act or some larger breach if you like, which would only jeopardise his own safety or injure himself, but a man in a mine may commit some breach, as, for instance, opening his safety lamp, which may endanger the lives of 500 men, and therefore our discipline in the mines is getting almost military. In factories it is quite different in the majority of cases, at least, I take it to be, or in quarries. One foolish action of a man in a mine may have an appalling result. It has happened, and that is well known, especially to some who are sitting at this table.

4002. You have pointed to the extreme gravity in some cases and the triviality in others ?—Yes.

4003. Could not you stipulate in a contract at the same time as the contract of employment that cases involving danger to the pit or to others would have a heavier rate of fine ?—Yes, but I would rather see the clause perhaps strengthened in some way—I am not prepared to say how—that the fines should be fair and reasonable. That, I presume, would take into account all the circumstances if it were tested, with respect to the fine, whether it was such as you have just named or not ?

4004. Who is to be the judge of whether it is fair and reasonable ?—Magisterially, or in the county court, I suppose.

4005. Do you think that the burden of proof should be placed upon the prosecutor in such a case ?—The burden of proof would be placed, I take it, upon the man who inflicted the fine.

4006. You think that would be right ?—He is the proper person, I think, because he inflicts the fine and he should give his reasons.

4007. You are aware that the law does not stand upon that footing at present ?—Just so.

4008. You think that is a defect at present ?—I would prefer that to the system you suggested previously.

4009. At present it puts too much responsibility upon a prosecutor to make him establish as against a mine owner that it is unfair and unreasonable ?—That is it.

4010. We might come now to the question of "supply of material." There are deductions made for blasting materials, candles in naked-light pits, shovels, picks, wedges, hammers, and such like tools. Are these particulars of deductions supplied upon the pay ticket ?—I have got pay tickets here for you (handing documents). May I refer back to the last question about fines; I had forgotten to show you something I have here. It was something that was posted up as regards fines in my district.

4011. This will be Exhibit No. 6 of Appendix VI. ?—It says there a man is liable to a fine of 5s. when not returning rules when leaving the company's employment, but if you refer to the Mines Act, Section 57 (2), it says: "The owner, agent, or manager shall supply a printed copy of the abstract and the special rules gratis to each person employed in or about the mine."

4013. You were referring to Exhibit No. 6. That contains a schedule of deductions. Both (Exhibits No. 7 of Appendix VI.) seem to contain no substantial details at all with regard to the deductions ?—No.

4014. The first part one understands, but the rest is as to colliery rules, and that may contain fifty different things ?—Yes. You see the workman has nothing definite given him there.

4015. Do you think that is a misfortune or a hardship ?—I think so.

4016. Have you found it a matter of complaint at all ?—No, but I think with regard to candles, for instance, that the workman should have on his pay-ticket the quantity applied and the price per lb., so that he can see how he is being charged, and the same with blasting materials, gunpowder or the higher explosives. It is not sufficient for him, I think, to see put down on the ticket "blasting materials two shillings." It is very much like a medical man's bill. They send them to you in one line: "For attendance and medicine."

4017. Without telling you the number of visits ?—Yes. Of course you are told that you can get that information if you desire it, but as a matter of fact you never ask for that.

4018. Then as to the sharpening of tools, you have never had any complaint with regard to that ?—No.

4019. That is a matter which is under the men's own arrangement ?—Yes.

4020. Is it done in many cases free of charge by the owners ?—Yes.

4021. Do you find that system work quite well ?—Yes, I have no difficulty whatever as to that.

4022. Have you any experience of payments of wages in kind ?—Yes. At one colliery in my district the owners, a co-operative company, issued barter notes to the workmen, who were paid partly by coin and partly by barter note.

4023. You will give us the name of that ? Of course it will not be reported ?—I do not think there will be any difficulty with regard to that particular name, because the matter has been made so very public.

4024. Then you can give us the name of that. What is the name of that colliery company ?—It is the Coal Miners Co-operative Brotherhood, Limited, and the name of the colliery is the Cartwright Colliery at Swadlincote, Derbyshire. Now shall I give you the case ?

4025. Please do ?—The stores adjoined the colliery office, and although they were conducted under a slightly altered name yet such stores were governed and managed by those interested in the ownership of the colliery.

Mr. A. H. Stokes.

19 July 1906.

4026. You conducted an investigation, did not you, into that case?—I did. In one case 23s. had been paid in coin and a 2s. 6d. barter note. In another case a barter note for 5s. was given in lieu of coin. In both cases the barter notes were exchanged for groceries or household requisites. The amount of wages paid by barter notes would range from £10 to £15 per week. I reported this matter to the Home Office, and they instructed me to take legal proceedings.

4027. You succeeded in fining the defendents £2 and costs?—Yes, that was the main case, and then there was a fine of 1s. and costs in the other case. The result was that the stores were abandoned and shut up; they found out that they were acting illegally.

4028. That did not result in any reduction of the money wage of the worker did it?—No, they received the total amount in coin and barter notes; it amounted to the total of their wages.

4029. After the abolition of the stores the workmen bought where they liked?—Yes, but before they were bound to expend the barter note at the stores.

4030. Yes. that was so before the stores were abandoned, but now they can purchase where they like?—Yes. In fact the colliery itself did not pay, and it was also shut up for a time.

4031. You have had some experience of contraventions of the Act?—Yes.

4032. You have had a complaint of stores being supplied to workmen at unreasonably high rates?—Yes.

4034. In one fortnight the company made over £8 in profit on candles and powder?—That is so.

4035. Did you prosecute in that case?—No.

4036. Why?—Because it is for the men to recover the money by a County Court action, I took it. I saw the owners about it and it was abandoned immediately. I pointed out to the owners what they were doing, and that they were making themselves liable for the men to recover the whole of this money back again from them. As soon as they saw their position I was given the word of the managing director that it would be abandoned. Now you will see my reason for wanting such details to be upon the pay ticket.

4037. Yes. Will you just give us that in your own way?—As I explained before, the details of the deductions should be given upon the pay tickets—the quantities and the price.

4038. Will you now go on to your next point?—At one large colliery the workmen sign on—that is the term used.

4039. That is making a contract of service?—Yes—by writing their name in a large book and at the head of every sheet is printed in small type—when I say small type I do not mean unreadable type; I mean relatively small—the terms of contract which include the following: "It is further agreed between the parties that 1½ per cent. shall be deducted for bats from the total weight of mineral sent out by the workmen respectively." At one of the pits belonging to the same company it is 2 per cent.

4040. What are bats?—Bats is a kind of shale and coal mixed together—the worthless part of the seam, an unsaleable part of the seam.

4041. Not a marketable part?—No, it is not marketable. The men are paid for filling coal.

4043. Does the workman know of such a deduction in the terms of the contract?—I do not think the workmen know it. I have considerable doubt if any workman knows of the deduction in the terms of his contract, or if any of them have read the contract, for nothing of this deduction is shown upon the men's pay ticket. I raised this question with the owners this year and they took a legal opinion which was given to me as follows: may I read it?

4044. Yes?—"Deductions are of two characters (1) material (2) wages, and the Acts of Parliament dealing with the same are quite distinct. They must be dealt with separately, but you appear to have mixed them up in your view of the question. Deductions for dirt, or as the Act defines it, material other than that contracted to be gotten, are made under the Mines Act, and are not made from wages but from weight. Deductions from wages are regulated by the Truck Acts, and under the Truck Act of 1896 particulars of any deductions from wages must be shown on the pay ticket. There is no such provision under the Mines Act, which deals with weight and not with wages. Hence nothing need be shown on the pay ticket for deductions which have been agreed upon and are made for material sent out of the mine than that contracted to be gotten"; that is the legal opinion.

4045. What have you to say to that?—Here a man is having 1½ to 2 per cent. of mine al deducted from him and it is told me now that has nothing to do with the Truck Act; it is under the Mines Act. Then the same man is also deducted under the Mines Act at times for bad filling and bats and stones, which he may know of because it comes under the knowledge of the check weighman at the pit. The reason why I have put the case so strongly is this (as you will see from the suggestions I have made afterwards) that all these things should be made known to the workman; that although you have before you the contract I handed to you (I forget the number you marked on it) in which nothing of this kind appeared, here is one in which a deduction does appear, and the men sign in the same way and they are given a copy of the contract rules in the same way, but I do not think any of them know there is 1½ to 2 per cent. being deducted from their wages in accordance with the signed contract.

4046. In addition to the initial deduction from the weight?—Yes, which may be made under the Mines Act, but the legal opinion appears to be against me.

4047. Have you any other thing to add with regard to these deductions?—At another colliery the men upon signing receive a copy of the special rules gratis as provided by Section 57 (2) of the Coal Mines Act, but when such person leaves he must either return the copy with the contract and club rules or 1s. 3d. is deducted from his last payment. The rules cost the owners from 2½d. to 3d.

4048. Then about the audit of deductions. Have any questions arisen under Section 9 of the Act of 1887?—No, no questions have arisen with me. The audit, I take it, appears to have been confined to medicine, medical attendance, or tools. Therefore explosives and candles, the things with regard to which a miner required protection, are not included in the audit. I am now going on dangerous ground, because there is a legal opinion again here. The word is "tools." Are candles and explosives tools? If they are not, then in regard to the very thing which many owners supply, and which the miner wants to know something about, there is no protection of audit given him, if I am correct.

4049. Of course the miner is a large purchaser of explosives?—Yes. This is a thing I am trying to arrange in my own district, and I think I am supported by the Home Office in it. The explosives, the most dangerous things used in the mine, should be supplied entirely by the owners of the colliery; that they should not be purchased from this place or from that place or from chemists and druggists who in some places are selling them. Here is one of the most dangerous things that we have in the mine, and I say that the owner or agent or the manager should purchase them in bulk so as to know the quality, the age, the deterioration in keeping, etc., and that the purchase and distribution should be entirely in the hands of the owners, agents, and managers of the colliery.

4050. And subject to audit ?—I say first of all it should be supplied by the owners, and next I say, if I am correct in my reading of the Act, that the very protection the men want is not given them by the Truck Act at present. Candles I do not care much about, because 80 per cent. of the mines in my district are worked with safety lamps.

4051. The explosives is a more serious matter ?—I take it to be so.

4052. Now we will come to your suggestions please. Are you in favour of a consolidation of all the existing Truck Acts ?—Yes, of everything being put into one. Let us have it all in one Act and clearly defined.

4053. Why ?—Because referring first to one Act and then to another, puts those who are responsible for the administration of it very much in the position of a shuttlecock being banged about from one to another.

4054. Do you find it quite possible not only that confusion may arise in consequence, but that cases that ought to be hit escape through the meshes of the various Acts ?—That is it, and another thing it is liable to give those who have the administration of it a wrong view or a wrong reading of the Acts.

4055. It is not only difficult for the department to work but it is confusing to the employers themselves and the men ?—Yes, and to those who administer it.

4056. Then the next thing you want is that particulars of all deductions should be supplied to each person from whom wages deductions are made ?—Yes, the quantity and the price of each article being stated on the pay ticket.

4057. Now I call your attention to that suggestion of yours, and I ask you whether you do not incline to add to it that the particulars of all these deductions should be supplied to each person when he enters into the service ?—No; I scarcely think that would be practicable because the price of explosives varies, the price of candles varies, and the price of tools varies; the point is that if he has the price stated on his ticket he can compare it with the current prices in the market. It applies to all commodities.

4058. I thought you were referring to the case of fines ?—No, I was speaking of the materials.

4059. In the case of fines, I again put to you do not you think the man ought to know on entering the service what he is to be subject to be fined for ?—Perhaps I have not understood you. Do you mean that a list of fines should be posted up ?

4060. Or a written contract with the list ?—No, I do not. I say let the fines be as they are now, but give the men every facility in every way you like for recovering the fine if it is not a reasonable one, because as I say you could not fine a man the same for every offence, as in the case I told you of, spragging, which is a dangerous thing. With regard to fining a man for opening his safety lamp in the mine, if I were a manager now I would not give him the chance of a fine, I would prosecute him, but there may be some who are more lenient than I am, and who might say, "It is all right this time; you have got through all right without accident."

4061. I understand your position. The third suggestion you make is that a contractor should not be allowed to sign his name on behalf of those he employs ?—Yes.

4062. Are you referring to colliery cases where a gaffer signs for his whole team ?—I do not know of them myself, but my colleagues have told me of cases, and so I have put that down amongst my suggestions. You see in coal mining what they call a stall man takes a certain length of the coal face and works it out by contract at so much per ton. He employs men at a day wage and he pays them. He should not be allowed to sign on behalf of those men. That is my point.

4063. Each workman in your judgment should know what are the particulars of the deductions ?—Yes.

4064. Your fourth suggestion appears to be that provision should be made for a copy of the hiring contract being given to each workman gratis at the time of signing, together with all the rules relating to or governing the employment ?—Yes, at the time of signing. I think you will see the force of that. If the contract which allows a deduction of 1½ to 2 per cent. right away, had been given to the workmen at that pit it probably would have been settled before now in a court of law.

4065. Then, fifthly, you say the audit of deductions should be made applicable to all classes of deductions from wages ?—Now you recognise another point which I have named. Workmen in some cases when I have said to them: "Why do not you purchase your explosives from the owners, who will guarantee the quality and description?" have replied, "Oh, they charge us so much and we can get it at so much," and in another case they have said, "We think they charge us, although we do not know it, more than we should pay." So that the audit of deductions should be such that an inspector could say to such men, "You need not raise this question, because you are protected by an audit, and you are so protected by an audit that if the owners of these collieries charge you more for your explosives than is a fair and reasonable price you can recover it." That would greatly strengthen the inspector's hands. These men are sometimes disinclined to purchase the explosives from the owners because they are afraid they are overcharged, but if this were legalised I should use it as a lever with the men and say, "They cannot charge you more than a reasonable price, and I can assure you there is an audit of deductions which will protect you."

4066. Then we pass on to another suggestion, that all deductions, whether under the Truck Act or Mines Act, or provided for by the contract of hiring, should be shown on the workman's pay ticket ?—That is partly covered by my second suggestion, although I did not put in the Mines Act contract of hiring.

4067. Your last suggestion is about a register. Will you tell me about that ?—That a register of all deductions of whatever description, or however enforced, or taken, should be kept at the Mine office, open to inspection by either workman or inspector of mines at any time, who may take copies of the same, such register to be kept made up to within three months previously.

4068. Is there not such a register at present ?—Yes, of fines.

4069. But not of deductions ?—No, not similar to fines.

4070. What would be the value of having it for deductions ?—If you adopted the audit of deductions it would have to be kept.

4071. I see, the two things work into each other ?—Yes, they must work together.

4072. I want to ask you a few questions about quarries. You have never received any complaint from the workmen in respect to the working of the Truck Acts at quarries, have you ?—No.

4073. Have you ever heard of a fine being inflicted at a quarry or a deduction being made from the men's wages ?—No.

4074. Is there good order preserved at the quarries ?—Much better than there was before the Quarries Act came into force: there was not much discipline then.

4075. Is there good discipline now ?—Much better, but we would like it still better than it is.

4076. All that good order and discipline is secured without putting fines into operation ?—Well, they discharge the man: they will not trouble themselves about a fine: they send him about his business.

4077. As to the supply of materials, tools and so on at quarries, I suppose explosives is the material that is generally supplied ?—Yes.

4078. The cost of that is deducted from the wages ?—Yes.

4079. It is not compulsory, I observe, to purchase from the owners, but do you think the same suggestion there should be adopted as with regard to the mines suggestions you have already given us ?—The very same. I would make the Truck Act applicable to quarries as to mines.

Mr. A. H. Stokes.

19 July 1906.

4080. Then the rents, tools, etc., are deducted from the wages under agreement?—Yes.

4081. As to contraventions of the Act, I understand you have never received any complaint and know of no contravention?—Not of the Truck Act.

4082. As to sharpening tools, that is done by the workmen themselves, but in large quarries the owners do it for the men?—That is so.

4083. No questions have ever arisen as to the audit of deductions?—No, I do not think there is an audit.

4084. So far as the quarries are concerned, it seems to be almost an ideal system?—So far as we know. You see there is not much used and the tools the men use are generally the company's.

4085. There are no fines?—I have not heard of one.

4086. And no deductions?—There would be no deductions for fines. There would be deductions for explosives, of which they use a large quantity in some of the quarries.

By Mrs. Tennant.

4087. I notice you say in your notes, speaking of the particulars which the mine owners give, that "the particulars are entered on the pay ticket to comply with Section 1 (b) of the Act of 1896." Do you mean Sub-section 1 (b) or Sub-section 2 (b)?—Section 1 (b) I think is right.

4088. There are two Sub-sections, Sub-section 1 (b) and Sub-section 2 (b). Sub-section 2 (b) says, "Particulars in writing showing the acts or omissions in respect of which the fine is imposed," and so on?—It is Section 1 Sub-section (b).

4089. But Section 1 Sub-section (b) says, "the contract specified the acts or omissions in respect of which the fine may be imposed." Sub-section 2 (b) says, "in respect of which the fine is imposed"?—Yes, that would be it. It is my mistake; it is Sub-section 2 (b).

4090. What action on the part of the colliery owner do you think satisfies Sub-section 1 (b) "the contract specifies the acts or omissions in respect of which the fine may be imposed." He satisfies Sub-section 2 (b), but how does he satisfy Sub-section 1 (b)?—I take it that the small ticket the Chairman has would satisfy both.

4091. That is Sub-section 2 (b)?—Yes, and that it would also satisfy Section 1 (b).

4092. Do you think the legislature means exactly the same thing by both?—I should take it that the ticket satisfies both.

4093. In one case it says "may be" and in the other "is." Do not you think that suggests a differentiation?—I have taken it that the ticket satisfies both.

4094. You gave us a case in which a man is fined 5s. In fact it says in the notice, that all the men are "liable to be fined 5s. for not returning rules when leaving the company's employment." You believe that not to be legal?—I think not.

4095. Have you taken any proceedings to test its legality?—No, I have not taken any proceedings. I think it would be for the workman to recover the amount under the Truck Act.

4096. Would not you consider it within your province to take proceedings in respect of a notice which is illegal?—Not of that description. I took it to be that the workman if dissatisfied would recover it under his powers of recovery in the county court.

4097. Yes, but the law provides, does it not, for two things. First of all, that a certain fine or deduction shall not be imposed; secondly, if it has been imposed, the workman is able in certain circumstances to recover it?—Yes, for the workman to recover it.

4098. Yes, but the first obligation on the colliery owner is that he is not to impose it, and is it not within the province of the inspector to see that he does not impose it?—I took it not to be so. I took it that it was for the workman to recover the amount.

4099. Take the first obligation to observe the law which is placed upon the colliery owner, that he shall not impose the fine at all?—Yes, but taking a case of that sort, the inspector would have to find out the workman first upon whom the fine was imposed, and it is not sufficient to say on a posted notice that the man is liable to a fine. That does not prove the offence.

4100. Opinions may differ. Is not an offence created by a bad notice, a bad contract?—I should think it would be held that the offence was not complete until the fine was made.

4101. But the colliery owner must not contract to make a fine which is not reasonable; assume even a mild form of not reasonable?—He would say to the inspector "I know it is there, but I may give it him back."

4102. You must not break the law, and in this case he is deliberately undertaking to break two laws, both the Truck Act and the Coal Mines Act. He is contracting to break the law?—I do not think the offence would be complete myself until the fine was made. Then I think it would be for the workman to recover it under the powers he has under the Truck Act. But I may say this 5s. fine is done away with now, because I pointed out to the manager some time since, as has already been discussed here, that it was an illegal act as I thought, and he has, therefore, done away with it. I am not aware that the fine was ever imposed. I doubted the legality of it, and I told him so, and he did away with it. If I may take you to the 1s. 3d., however, that is still in force.

4103. Yes, I was coming to that. I notice that you put it in the present. You say: "At another colliery the men upon signing receive a copy of the special rules gratis as provided by Section 57 (2) of the Coal Mines Act, but when such person leaves he must either return the copy, or 1s. 3d. is deducted from his last payment." Is that still in force?—That is in force now.

4104. Do not you contemplate proceedings, then?—Not yet. I think myself it is for the workman to recover it. There is no posting up of the fine there.

4105. May I direct your attention to Section 3 of the Truck Act of 1896?—Would you give me the paragraph.

4106. Yes. Section 3, Sub-section 1 says that "An employer shall not make any contract with any workman for any deduction from the sum contracted to be paid by the employer to the workman, or for any payment to the employer by the workman for, or in respect of, the use or supply of materials, tools or machines, standing room, light, heat, or for, or in respect of"—and this is the only part which could apply to this particular matter—"for, or in respect of any other thing to be done or provided by the employer in relation to the work or labour of the workman." You consider, and I think consider quite properly, that he is bound by law under the Coal Mines Act to provide that copy, therefore it ought not to be taken as a thing which he is "doing or providing" for which he is entitled to charge because the Coal Mines Act says it is to be provided gratis?—There are two points there. The section you are reading is, "Deductions or payments in respect of materials," but this is not material for his work.

4107. No, I do not think it is. I stated in my question that I thought the only heading under which it could possibly come is the heading of "for or in respect of any other thing to be done or provided by the employer in relation to the work or labour of the workman." My ground for bringing it under that heading is that books for the supplying of particulars to workmen under the Factory and Workshop Act have been held to be things which could be brought under that heading of "any other thing to be done or provided by the employer in relation to the work or labour of the workman?"—As material.

4108. No, not as material, but "any other thing." After specifying materials, tools, machines, standing room and light and so on, the section goes on to say, "or for or in respect of any other thing" not being material?—I had not read it in that way. The whole section refers to materials, and therefore I read it "any other thing in the shape of materials."

4109. I do not think one must take the words at the side of a section as controlling and even nullifying the words within the section. The words at the side are only a summary of the section; they are not law?—I presume you must take the official copy of the Act. You cannot cut anything out of the official copy of the Act.

4110. That is exactly what I am anxious you should do. Surely you would be cutting something out by the exclusion of these words simply because they are not contained in the summary at the side. You cannot take proceedings under the words contained in the side heading; you can only take proceedings under the words contained in the Act itself?—It is merely an explanatory heading of what the section deals with; it shows that the whole section deals with the question of materials.

By the Chairman.

4111. It is a question of law, but I think Mrs. Tennant has elicited the witness's view very clearly indeed.

By the Witness.

4112. If your contention is correct then I go back to what the Chairman took me upon where I said "or" should be "and." The same point comes up again.

By Mrs. Tennant.

4113. May I put it in this way, that in my opinion the law has been doubly broken in this particular case?—No, I do not think that.

4114. Take one of the cases first. You yourself are of opinion that the Coal Mines Act requires the colliery owner to provide a workman with a copy of the rules free of charge?—I have the Act here, if you have not it before you.

4115. You stated that in your evidence so we will take that for granted?—I would rather refer to the Act itself.

4116. It is Section 57, Sub-section 2. That is your reference to the Coal Mines Act?—"The owner, agent, or manager shall supply a printed copy of the abstract of the special rules gratis to each person employed in or about the mine who applies for a copy." I have put that to one person, and the reply was this: "Oh dear yes, it is supplied gratis. We do not charge him when we supply it, but we tell him when he leaves that if he does not return it he will have to pay for it." That is the way they drive a carriage and four through the Act of Parliament.

4117. Have you ever endeavoured to prevent that carriage and four being driven through the Act of Parliament?—The cases that I have brought before you are the only cases that I know of in my district.

4118. But one is at present occurring?—Yes, one is occurring at present, the 1s. 3d.

4119. I gather from you that you do not intend to take proceedings in respect of that?—No, I have not yet taken any proceedings. I have contented myself with thinking that this is a workman's matter, and I have not taken proceedings any more than I should take proceedings for the recovery of his price list or his coal. It is entirely a workman's matter to recover money; he has power under the Truck Act and he should take advantage of it.

4120. I would just like to put this one point. Assuming that I am right and that the words of the Act are of more importance than the heading at the side of the section, would you consider it would be proper that you should take proceedings in respect of the overcharge in this case. There is an excessive charge. You say the rules cost the owners 2½d.?—About 2½d.

4121. Take it at 3d. as an outside price?—Yes.

4122. The workman is charged 1s. 3d., and assuming again that I am right, Section 3 says in paragraph (b) that the sum to be paid or deducted under the contract in respect of any of these things must not exceed the actual cost, and it goes on "or in the case of the use of machinery, light, heat, or any other thing in this section mentioned, a fair and reasonable rent or charge, having regard to all the circumstances of the case." You would not consider it either fair or reasonable that a profit of a shilling should be made, would you?—I should not.

4123. If you took the Home Office opinion, and were instructed that these words are of importance you would contemplate proceedings in respect of an unreasonable or unfair charge, would you not?—But, as I say, I have always taken it that it is within the workman's power under the Truck Act to recover the money. That is a matter of pounds, shillings, and pence, not a matter of discipline or a matter of danger to life. I have taken it, therefore, that that is in the workman's power.

4124. The workman's power is under Section 5, but the Act says the employer shall not make a contract with any workman except under certain conditions, and it is not given to the workman to enforce that. That is a matter for the inspector. It is for the inspector to enforce Section 3 and to see that the employer does not make an illegal contract. The workman is empowered afterwards in a case where a charge is improperly made to recover the loss he has suffered thereby. There are two distinct offences; one is the making of the contract?—But I do not see that a contract has been made

4125. With regard to the supplying of materials, where you are satisfied that there has been an excessive charge, have you taken any steps to stop it?—Yes. I think I said that in the case of a supply of powder I pointed out to the managing director what he was doing, and he at once discontinued it.

4126. Yes, that is so. I gather it is rather a common practice?—No, I do not think so.

4127. You think it is not a common practice?—You see things only come to my knowledge occasionally with regard to the cost and the charge. I do not see the workmen's pay-tickets every week.

4128. I think you have taken exception to the looseness of the information given to the workmen. You say that all things are mentioned in a lump sum?—In the pay-ticket?

4129. Yes?—Yes.

4130. When you find that do you require the exact particulars to be given?—I would require details of what it is. Take powder, for instance. I would require that on the pay-ticket they should give the number of pounds and the price per pound and the total. It should not be "powder so much" or "explosives so much." If the quantity and the price were set out the workmen could then compare it with other prices in the market.

4131. Do you consider it is also your duty to compare it with other prices?—No, I have not thought it to be; it does not come to my knowledge.

4132. It has come to your knowledge when the information is given for which you have asked?—Yes, but that was a workman's complaint which was anonymously sent to me, and I went to investigate it. That is the occasion where I went to the managing director and told him he was doing wrong, and he at once discontinued the practice. That was through a workman sending the complaint to me. I think I have the complaint here and can produce it.

4133. I may have misunderstood you, but I thought in reply to my question you said it was your ordinary practice to require fuller particulars of the charges made for such things as candles and so on?—No. I said in an amended Truck Act I would require all those things to be given in detail.

4134. You do not at present?—No, I do not. I do not see that I have any power to ask a manager to put down on the collier's pay ticket how many candles he has bought and the price per lb.

4135. But Section 3 says that the particulars should be given. That section requires, in paragraph (b) of Subsection 2, that "particulars in writing showing the things in respect of which the deduction or payment is made, and the amount thereof are supplied to the workman on each occasion when a deduction or payment is made"?—Yes.

4136. That is the amount of each thing?—The total amount is put in.

4137. The amount of the different things is not stated. It is a bulk sum which is put in?—Yes, a bulk sum for explosives, a bulk sum for candles, a bulk sum for tools, and a bulk sum for other things as the pay ticket shows.

4138. Without stating any information which enables the workman to ascertain what he is being charged per lb.?—That is so—without giving him the opportunity of comparing the commercial value of the things.

4139. If he is not given that material, how can he ascertain whether the charge complies with the requirements of the section?—I do not know, I am sure, how the workman does that.

Mr. A. H Stokes.

19 July 1906.

4140. Even if you do not consider that it comes within your jurisdiction to enforce that section, do not you consider that it comes within your jurisdiction to enable the workman to enforce it if you think it is his duty to enforce it?—I presume that the workmen look after their own pecuniary interests, and this a matter of pecuniary interest; it is a matter of pounds, shillings and pence, I think. Inspectors do not undertake civil proceedings.

4141. The whole Act is, is it not? The whole Act is dealing with pounds, shillings and pence?—Yes.

4142. If one matter comes within your jurisdiction another ought not to be excluded from your jurisdiction because it too deals with pounds shillings and pence, ought it?—Well, it is a matter with regard to which I have not asked the workmen to show me their pay tickets in order to ascertain whether the amounts charged were reasonable. I must say I have not asked that question from workmen.

By Mr. Brotherton.

4143. I would like to put one or two points to you with regard to the question of fines and the abolition of them. I understand it is your opinion that fines should be retained for purposes of discipline?—Yes, the system of fining.

4144. Are you of opinion that without fines proper discipline could hardly be expected?—I think it is the more charitable course with regard to the workmen. I do not like to prosecute a man for every little breach of discipline, and the alternative of a fine is useful.

4145. Have you knowledge of any collieries or mines which are being worked without fines?—I do not know of one just at the moment.

4146. So far as you know, all collieries have a system of fining?—Yes, but in many cases the fines are very slight.

4147. Have you come across any cases where rules and regulations have been mutually agreed to, not only between the employer and the individual workman, but between the employer and the whole body of workmen or their representatives?—I cannot call a case to mind.

4148. The more usual contract is between the employer and the individual workman?—Yes.

4149. I should have thought that rules and regulations might have been easily submitted to representatives of the workmen generally for consideration and modification or acceptance?—Do you mean the contract rules or price lists.

4150. I mean any rules between the employer and the workpeople?—The price list I handed in is submitted to the Miners Association.

4151. Is it usual to make a charge for these price lists?—No, I think they are given freely. The check weighman gives the miner a copy of the list. He is the men's representative.

4152. Does the alternative of prosecution or dismissal rest entirely with the employer? I mean can he please himself whether he dismisses a man or prosecutes him?—That is generally left with the manager. Take the case of a man opening his safety lamp in the mine; that deserves either prosecution or instant dismissal from the mine.

4153. And that rests entirely with the manager?—Yes, or with one of the other officials subject to the manager's confirmation.

4154. With either the employer or the employer's direct representative?—Yes, but the workmen may appeal to the owner.

4155. Is that a fair arrangement?—I think it is fair that a if man endangers the lives of 500 men he should either be dismissed or prosecuted.

4156. You would not fine in such a case?—I would not fine in such a serious case as that of opening a safety lamp. In the case of a fine the miner has his remedy if the fine is not reasonable.

4157. Your suggestion is that its reasonableness or otherwise should be dealt with by the magistrate if the miner does not accept the fine as being reasonable?—Yes. He may seek to recover it.

4158. But are the magistrates likely to understand the inner working of a colliery?—No, but they can subpœna anybody to give evidence as in other technical cases.

4159. You would not suggest a third person other than a bench of magistrates who could deal with technical points?—No, magistrates have equally technical points to deal with in other cases, and they can call experts before them.

4160. I am quite with you that full details of deductions of all kinds should be supplied to the workmen?—I hope you are also with me in saying that they should have a copy of the contract which they sign.

4161. With regard to the suggested system of giving details of deductions, have you in mind any collieries where such particulars are furnished?—I cannot call a case to mind. Neither have I thought these suggestions out in detail. I have had little time to do so.

By Mr. Cawley.

4162. Have you had any complaints at all from workpeople in regard to fines?—I do not know that I have ever received a complaint as to a fine.

4163. And do you think there is no dissatisfaction?—Not as regards fines, but sometimes as regards the prices asked for articles supplied.

4164. But the workmen can buy the articles where they like?—Yes, gunpowder.

4165. Are they compelled to buy anything from the employers?—I think they can purchase candles where they like, but tools are often supplied by the colliery people. They would come under the audit.

4166. In cases where workpeople are not protected by the audit, they are not compelled to buy articles from the employer, but how or where they like?—Not in all cases. As regards explosives, some of the owners tell the workpeople that these must be purchased from the colliery stores.

4167. Is not that a contravention of the present Act?—I do not think so.

4168. Not for an employer to tell his employees that they must buy certain articles from him?—They are not told so in those words. The owner has to look to the safety of the mine, which is paramount above all the little technical provisions of the Truck Act.

4169. Does the employer compel the workman to buy anything that he uses from him, and charge a higher price for it than he ought to do?—I don't like the word "compel." It is a suggestion; in many collieries the whole of the explosives are supplied by the owner.

4170. It may be a good thing that the workmen should buy those things from the employers, and in that connection I suppose that the only change you think desirable would be an audit?—That would be a protection to the workmen. It is one of my suggestions.

4171. These men have a strong union?—Yes.

4172. And it really protects them against any unfairness?—Yes.

4173. And the men with their union behind them are not in any way afraid of the masters?—No.

4174. And if they were treated unfairly they would put their employers into court?—The union would not hesitate if it had a strong case.

4175. Is there any alteration at all required in the Truck Act which you could suggest in order to strengthen your hands?—I should adopt the suggestions which I have put forward, because I think it is only fair to the workmen, and the suggestions are nearly all for the protection of the workmen, although the first, of course, is not.

4176. In cases where you have found any breach of the Truck Act and have mentioned it to the employers, have they generally fallen in with your suggestions?—They have, in every case. Whenever I have had a complaint or suspicion of the Truck Act being violated and have called attention to it, the matter has been remedied so far as I can remember.

4177. Do the fines always go to charitable purposes?—Yes, always.

4178. You know of no case where the employer pockets the fines ?—No.

By Mr. Maddison.

4179. I notice that you do not discriminate in your support of the system of fining between those offences which endanger life and those which are of a more ordinary character, as, for instance, filling coal badly ?—I thought I had made myself clear to the Chairman when he asked me about the long list of fines put in, viz., that it was almost impracticable to enumerate all, as there are such varied degrees of fining.

4180. The point I rather wanted to bring out was this. When you say that you think that a system of fines is necessary in collieries, do you include those offences which have nothing whatever to do with safety ?—I would include all.

4181. Then you must do that on quite different grounds from that of safety ?—There must be discipline as well as safety.

4182. Are there not fines in a colliery which are similar to those in a factory ?—Oh, yes.

4183. Still you support a system of fines in all these matters just the same ?—Not as regards bad filling, because the Mines Act gives power to deal with that. Where there is not power to deal with an offence, then a fine may come in.

4184. I gather from your evidence that you are personally against resorting to fines for serious offences such as opening a safety lamp underground, or taking down matches ?—Yes.

4185. Are fines imposed in your district for these serious offences ?—Sometimes. Probably not for opening a lamp, but perhaps for taking down matches, because a man who hurries to his work on a cold morning with his pipe may forget to leave his matches above ground.

4186. Are you aware that a colleague of yours in the Lancashire district, gave us a list of fines for offences in which I feel sure that opening a safety lamp was included, and certainly the taking down of matches, or omission to sprag ? These are all serious offences, and we had a long list of them where men are sometimes fined as much as £2, but I understand you do not agree with a fine in these serious cases ?—I would agree with a fine for bad spragging or bad timbering, where only the man's own life may be in danger, but it is different in the case of opening a safety lamp which may endanger the whole pit.

4187. Then you would say that the practice of fines for major offences is wrong ?—Yes, for major offences. Of course the object of a prosecution should not be persecution.

4188. You are averse to prosecuting men for what are trivial offences against special rules ?—I would deal with trivial offences usually by fines.

4189. Do you say that upon sentimental grounds, or are you at all afraid of the frequency of prosecutions reducing their deterrent value, or are you moved by your kindly interest in the men ?—Perhaps by my kindly interest in the men.

4190. With regard to the point as to the fairness of the manager deciding the amount of the fine, is it your experience that the men are treated fairly ?—Yes, fairly, considering the seriousness of some of the offences.

4191. Do you think they get sufficient evidence of the actual offence ?—The fine is generally imposed at the time of the offence, the manager or under-manager will, in a serious case, say to the man, "I will either fine you 2s. 6d. or you will be prosecuted."

4192. Do not you think there ought to be someone else to join in the assessment of the character of the offence and the amount of fine to be imposed ?—I do not see how that could be done. Take, for instance, the offence of negligence or bad timbering on the roof. The fault has to be put right as soon as it is discovered, and before any expert could be available.

4193. When the manager sits in judgment on the man, there is no appeal unless the man can maintain that the fine is unfair and unreasonable ?—I would make that appeal as easy as possible.

4194. Can you suggest how it might be made easier ?—I must leave that to the Committee, but I would make it easy for a workman to appeal if he thought the fine unreasonable. The Inspector of the district could not always be at hand to refer to.

Mr. A. H. Stokes.

19 July 1906.

4195. You have made it clear that the men's leaders, with whom you are, I presume, brought into constant contact, raise, in the main, no objection to the present system of fining in mines ?—No. Although they may sometimes say that a fine is rather heavy, or that it seems arbitrary.

4196. I should like to ask you a question about the charge of 5s. for a copy of the special rules ?—That is not in force now.

4197. I take it that under no circumstances would you think it your duty to prosecute for putting up what appears to me to be an illegal notice ?—I have never been slow in asking the Home Office to allow prosecutions where they seemed justifiable, where there was any serious breach in the law, and the Home Office has never yet refused me such authority.

4198. Have you had any prosecution under the Truck Act ?—Yes, there is the Swadlincote case.

4199. Apart from that, which happens to be the case of a small co-operative society, have you had any prosecutions for truck in your district ?—I do not think I know of one.

By Mr. Delevingne.

4200. On the subject of the system of fining as an alternative to prosecution, which do you think is really the more effective for securing discipline in a mine ?—Prosecution.

4201. Then why is that method not more often resorted to by the mine-owners ?—Partly because a fine only applies to the individual worker, whereas the talk about a prosecution goes all through the district, as it is a public inquiry known and conversed about by other colliers.

4202. Is it not well that that should be so ?—Yes, in serious cases.

4203. I am thinking of breaches of the special and general rules ?—I rather like fines in trivial cases.

4204. Have you instructed or advised owners to resort more frequently to prosecution ?—Yes, in serious cases I have told them emphatically that they must prosecute an offender or that I should report them to the Home Office and possibly prosecute them.

4205. Are prosecutions frequent ?—I regret that they are too frequent. I wish that there were fewer serious offences to justify them.

4206. Have the owners any objection to taking proceedings in the courts against their work people ?—I do not think they much like to do so.

4207. Are prosecutions an inconvenience in taking the responsible officials away from their duties and into a police court to prove the offence ?—Yes, that is a cause of loss and serious inconvenience. The manager and other officials have to go to the court in such cases.

4208. What arrangements are made at the colliery in the absence of these officials ?—Others are appointed temporarily to take their place. If a manager has to go, the under-manager is put in charge, and if the under-manager has to go or both of them, then someone else has to act—perhaps another deputy. I have known cases where the fines are believed to have been paid by the Miners' Association.

4209. Would the Miners' Association defend the case if they thought it a clear breach of the rules ? I mean, do they inquire into these cases before deciding to defend the men ?—I should think so. The local agent of the Association would make inquiries.

4210. The Association does not defend these cases promiscuously ?—I do not know that I can say that, but it does defend some of them.

4211. With regard to the enforcement of the Act of 1896, you told Mrs. Tennant that you thought the proper remedy was for the man to take proceedings in the civil court to recover sums taken from him in unreasonable deductions. You are, of course, aware that the Act provides two remedies: a civil remedy enforced by the workmen and a criminal remedy enforceable by the inspector against the owner ?—Yes, but I do not know that I ever heard of more than one case of the criminal remedy being enforced in my district.

4212. The instructions issued by the Home Office to inspectors relating to the Truck Acts set forth on page 3 that not only is it an offence to make any illegal deduction or receive an illegal payment, but also to make any contract for such deduction or payment. Does not that dispose of the case where a charge of 1s. 3d. is made for a copy of the rules ?—I do not think that was a contract, at least, I am not sure that it was.

4213. Then deducting that sum of 1s. 3d. without any contract at all was making an illegal deduction under the Act of 1896 ?—That was my view. I thought it was a case for the workman to recover the money.

4214. I think you have not yet quite realised that there are these two remedies—that the workmen can recover money unreasonably deducted in fines and that the inspector can also prosecute for an offence in that matter under the Act of 1896. In page 4 of the instructions to inspectors it is set forth that inspectors are charged with the duty of seeing that the Truck Acts are not infringed, and that it is desirable that prosecutions for contraventions of these Acts should be instituted by them ?—I may have mistaken my duty, but I did not realise that I had any power in the case quoted. I thought it was the workmen's right to recover.

4215. Did you refer that case of illegal deduction to the Home Office ?—I have not yet done so.

4216. With regard to the case of deductions for dirt on which the owners took legal advice and received the opinion which you quoted, did you refer that case to the Home Office?—That case has only recently occurred. Its history is this. I saw the managing director of the colliery and said to him (before the legal opinion was given), "I do not know whether you are right or wrong, but if you like I will place the matter before the Home Office." He hesitated a bit and then said, "I will call myself at the Home Office." Meantime he took a legal opinion which he forwarded to me and I then let the matter rest until the present moment; but the case has only recently occurred.

4217. Are you not of opinion that the case involves contravention of the weighing provisions of the Coal Mines Acts ? You say there are two separate modes of making deductions for dirt, viz., 1½ or 2 per cent. from every man's wage, and deductions made on the pit bank for stones and bad fillings ?—The legal opinion says this is not a deduction from wages.

4218. Under Section 12 of the Coal Mines Act of 1887 it is provided that deductions may be made in respect of stone or substances other than the mineral contracted to be gotten sent up with the coal. These deductions may be made in one of two ways, either in a special mode to be agreed upon between the owner and the workman or by the employer's agent and the checkweighman. The deductions can only be made in one of two ways. Here you have deductions, first on a fixed scale of 1½ to 2 per cent. and also deductions made at the pit bank for the actual amount, as I understand, of stone or other foreign matter sent up ?—It is the amount agreed upon.

4219. But the deductions are made in two different ways at the same time ?—Yes, they say the man has contracted for the first by what he signs.

4220 A contract cannot make legal what is possibly illegal under Section 12 ?—That was my contention, but the legal opinion appears to be against me.

4221. Are you referring the case to the Home Office ?—Yes, it is coming to the Home Office.

4222. With regard to quarries, do you think that on the whole the discipline in quarries is worse than in mines ?—Yes, I should say so.

4223. Is the supervision as strict ?—No.

4224. Is there usually a manager appointed for a quarry corresponding in any degree to the certificated manager of a coal mine ?—No.

4225. Do you think it would be better for the safety of quarry work if stricter supervision were exercised ?—Yes.

4226. Are the special rules enforced as well as they are in mines ?—No.

4227. It would be a good thing if they were ?—I think it would; but there are many very small quarries.

4228. I suppose the absence of any system of fining is not an indication of the superior management of a quarry, but rather of the general slackness of quarry owners ?—Yes, I think so.

By Mr. Yarrow.

4229. Are the quarries without fines?—I have not heard of fining at quarries.

4230. How is it that in quarries they do not fine and yet they do so in coal mines ?—I do not know, but the risks are different. In collieries there are hundreds of accidents through falls of roof, etc. In quarries they have daylight, whereas in mines the illumination may not be more than a candle light.

4231. I think you said that when you made representations concerning truck to the heads of firms they always fell in with what you wished or suggested ?—I have had no trouble in the few cases which have arisen. They have complied with the Act or would have been reported to the Home Office.

4232. Do you get many complaints from the workmen ?—No, I have not had many; very few under the Truck Acts.

4233. Then it would almost appear as if the thing were working well. Is there any object in making important changes if the thing is working satisfactorily—if there are few complaints and if the employers accept your suggestions ?—Ignorance is bliss. If the workmen came to realise what may be done, there may be more complaints. Suppose you point out to a man that he is paying 7d. for powder whereas he could buy it in a shop for 4d., and if you tell him that he can recover all the extra money he has been paying for years, his eyes would brighten and he would say, "I am going to recover that money."

4234. If he paid less for the powder would not his wages be less in proportion ?—No, I always take it that the charge for powder must be exactly what the owner pays for it, plus any cost in manipulating or storing it. I have known cases where they were given detonators free, or perhaps charged a little more for the explosive on that account.

By the Chairman.

4235. I am sorry to detain you about this matter, but I think the Committee is a little anxious to get at your practice under the Truck Acts—I gather from you that your mind was largely moved by the rubric of Section 3 of the Truck Act of 1896 which speaks of deductions in respect of "materials" ?—Yes.

4236. That was in your mind when you thought that the charge made as the price of the copy of the rules would not fall under Section 3, because it would not be "materials" ?—That is so.

4237. But look at the body of Section 3 apart from the rubric, and you see there is to be no deduction for the use or supply of materials, tools, machines, standing room, light, heat or other things done or provided. Is it not quite clear, when you come to consider it, that standing room could not be considered materials, nor could heat ? Is it not quite clear that that word "materials" is greatly added to in the substance of the section ? You could not call standing room "materials" ?—No.

4238. Apart from the short rubric, when you come to the substance of the clause itself, you have a phrase so wide as this, "or any other thing done or provided by the employer" ?—I see that.

4239. I understand that not only were you moved by what you thought to be the restriction of the word material, but you were also of opinion that it was for the workman alone to take his remedy ?—Yes, civil remedy.

4240. By way of getting back the amount that was due to him, I now call your attention to Section 4. Do you observe that there are two things provided by Section 4 ? If any employer enters upon any contract—that is one thing—"or makes any deduction or receives any payment." You will see quite well that the entering into such a contract, as well as the making of the deduction, makes him guilty of an offence against the Truck Act ?—Yes.

4241. So you see it seems to be an erroneous opinion, does it not, that you could not prosecute for the mere contract ? I think it is now clear to you that under Section 4, as well as under the rules of the service, to which Mr. Delevingne has referred—that you ought to prosecute wherever you find a contract which in your opinion is a violation of the Act of Parliament, apart from its enforcement by actually making the deductions. Are you inclined to take that view, now that it is pointed out to you ?—I think that is the right view ; but I must be sure that there is a contract. In the case named there was no contract.

Mr. A. H. Stokes.
19 July 1906.

4242. But I may take it from you, these things having been pointed out to you, that your practice will be to ask the advice of the Home Office with regard to such matters coming under your notice ?—If I found there was an illegal contract, I should not hesitate to inform the Home Office and ask for instructions.

SEVENTEENTH DAY.

Friday, 20th July, 1906.

PRESENT.

The Right Hon. THOMAS SHAW, K.C., M.P., Lord Advocate for Scotland (Chairman).

E. A. BROTHERTON, Esq., M.P.
MALCOLM DELEVINGNE, Esq.
J. RAMSAY MACDONALD, Esq., M.P.
FREDERICK MADDISON, Esq., M.P.
Mrs. H. J. TENNANT.
A. F. YARROW, Esq.

T. E. BETTANY, Esq. (Secretary).

The DUCHESS OF SUTHERLAND, was called ; and Examined.

By the Chairman.

4243. There was some evidence recently before this Committee about Shetland and the Harris tweed trade and about the Association with which your name is so well and prominently connected. It occurred to us that it would not be right or proper that we should only hear evidence upon one side with regard to any matter of that kind, so we ordered a communication to be made on the subject to the secretary of your Association, and we are much obliged to you for coming as a witness, as that enables us to get at the whole facts from all sides. You have for some years, I understand, been president and practically ruling spirit of the Scottish Home Industries Association ?—Yes, I suppose so, but I have several helpers on the board.

4244. When did your efforts in that direction begin ?—At the death of the late Lady Rosebery. But the present association was formed ten years ago.

4245. Is the Association a voluntary one ?—Yes, a voluntary organisation.

4246. Has it a manager and secretary ?—Yes, we have a board of which I am a chairman, and also a manager and secretary.

4247. Are these paid officials ?—The secretary has a small salary and the manager has a salary.

4248. Speaking generally, what is the nature of the work of the Association ? Am I right in assuming that your real object is the purely charitable one of being helpful in the development of home industries ?—Yes, our object is to assist the crofters upon business lines but from philanthropic motives.

4249. Without either appearing or intending to impoverish them in the slightest degree ?—I do not think it is possible to impoverish them, poor things, more than they are already.

4250. You go upon the principle of encouraging self-help so far as you can ?—Certainly.

4251. I suppose you take the industries as you find them in the various places. Your main business is, I presume, in Harris, where the tweeds are made, but your operations also extend to Shetland ?—Yes. We work in Harris, Lewis, North and South Uist, and to a small degree in Shetland.

4252. You begin operations, I suppose, by buying from the people ?—The position is this. The crofters are in a state of great poverty. They have no land worth cultivating. The fishing is in a very precarious way owing to the increase of steam trawlers and drifters—therefore, practically, their staple means of livelihood is the making of tweeds and the knitting of stockings. We found that whilst we could help them in philanthropic ways by taking a certain amount of these goods and selling them at bazaars, etc., that was a most unsatisfactory way of really helping them, for the reason that they were selling to merchants who were advancing goods to them at high prices, and thus had them always in their debt. We thought it our duty to go in and help them to come in, in competition with the merchants who were having it all their own way.

The Duchess of Sutherland.

4253. When you refer to the merchants, can you give me any locality to which your remarks specially apply ?—They apply to Tarbert, the capital of Harris ; to Stornoway, the capital of Lewis ; and, in a smaller degree, to Lochmaddy (North Uist) and Loch Boisdale in South Uist. The Highlands and islands are, as you know, divided into townships equivalent to parishes, and in these townships there are some merchants who supply the wants of the people.

4254. Would you kindly describe the lot of these people so far as concerns their home or domestic life. First of all may I assume that you have personally visited these localities ?—Yes, many times.

4255. Have they small patches of land ?—Yes, when they can get them, upon the sides of the hills, but their arable stuff rarely ripens in wet seasons, and they often have to cut it and use it to feed their cow. Nearly all the crofters have hill pasture. The island of Harris produces the best tweeds ; the industry was started there.

4256. Do the people live in small huts ?—Yes In some of the other islands of the Hebrides the houses are a little better, but in Harris they are composed of stones with peat roofs, and often no chimneys, like the cabins in the west of Ireland. We understand that since the increased sales of homespun tweed the homes have improved.

4257. Does the smoke go through the roof of the house ?—Yes, or anywhere else.

The Duchess of Sutherland.

20 July 1906.

4258. Do the people share the shelter with their cows ? —They have a byre adjoining. They do not sleep in the same room with the pigs, like the Irish, but they run very near to that. The sanitary inspectors have improved matters lately.

4259. The next point is where do they get the materials with which they work ?—They have to get it advanced to them.

4260. Is that where the system begins ?—Yes.

4261. By whom is the advance made ?—By our Association.

4262. What shape do the advances take ?—We advance wool for them to make the tweeds and dyes, and meal for them to eat while they are making the tweeds, and tea for them to drink while they are making the tweeds, and sugar to put into the tea. That is the extent of our advances. Besides this the C. D. B. have assisted our efforts to supply new spinning wheels or looms, dye-pots, and the building of the necessary depots in Obbe, and Loch Boisdale.

4263. Before you interposed with your benevolent undertaking how did these people earn their living ? Did they traffic with the merchants ?—Yes, almost entirely—though a few philanthropic friends, shooting or fishing, bought from them also, and a great deal of interest was excited in their work by the Dowager Lady Dunmore and Mrs. Thomas, now both dead. They did a great deal for the people in the tweed industry, but competition was not so severe in their day. Tweeds have been made on the island for many years. The output has been much increased. We have at least trebled or quadrupled the output by our efforts.

4264. Did the merchants make advances in the same way that you do ?—Yes, I believe so.

4265. Not only the raw material for the industry, but also food for the requirements of the household ?—Yes, I think they advanced everything the people wanted, and the poor people got tied up in their debt. I would not like to make any statement to the prejudice of the merchants, but I assume they made advances at a rather exorbitant rate to these people.

4266. We may have to make inquiries later of those who have had a share in these transactions. You thought, looking to the extreme poverty of the people and to their state of indebtedness, that it would be a very useful exercise of philanthropy to interpose for their help ?—Yes.

4267. You were dealing with people so poor that they could not pay money for the raw material ?—Yes.

4268. And of course they had to subsist whilst the process of manufacture was going on ?—That is so.

4269. At what season would the advances be made ?—All the year round.

4270. How long a period would elapse between the time of advancing the wool and the delivery of the finished product ?—Sometimes six months.

4271. And of course the people had to live during that time ?—Yes.

4272. After advancing the material did you or your association have any superintendence ? Did your manager visit the place ?—They are supervised from the head office, and the local managers live at our depots in the islands.

4273. What is the name of the local manager ?—At Stornoway, Mr. Murdo McLeod, at Tarbert (Harris), Mr. Malcolm McKay ; at Loch Boisdale, Mr. Archibald MacPhee ; and at Lochmaddy, Mr. Dugald Mactavish.

4274. Are they paid officials ?—Yes, they have a salary.

4275. Were they themselves merchants ?—Mr. McKay was a merchant on his own account. He had a small shop. His mother ran it. She is a widow, and we took her son as manager because he knew the people. He is leaving our employment shortly. Mr. McLeod was an independent man from Sutherland. The manager at Lochmaddy and Loch Boisdale have no shop of their own.

4276. Can you tell me anything about the wages the workers get ?—There is no question of wages. We pay them the value of the cloth, giving them as favourable terms as the market allows, sometimes more favourable terms than the market allows.

4277. I understand your anxiety is twofold ? You want to give the public the real article ?—Yes. The factory inspector made some rather astounding statements ; one to the effect that when the material had been teased and prepared, it was spun* in a mill on the main land. The whole object of our association is to prevent recourse to mill spinning, and there is no weaving or spinning mill of any kind on these islands. We especially encourage handspinning and handweaving. Carding is done in small mills—carding is a very laborious process. I believe that some mill spun stuff is sold in Lewis but we can have nothing to do with it, as we know that that sort of thing means the death of the home industry.

4278. So far as the public is concerned, you want the public to have a perfect assurance that they get the real bona fide Harris tweed ?—Yes, that is right.

4279. The actual wool from the sheep's back is supplied and is prepared and spun by these people themselves in their humble dwellings ?—Yes, spun and woven.

4280. Have they looms ?—Yes, small hand looms ; single width looms. Almost every cottage in Harris has a loom or wheel and nearly all the women weave or spin.

4281. Having assured the public of a good article, your next object is to secure to the worker a full price ?—Yes, the best price we can give.

4282. Speaking generally, even although it may cost you a little to realise the goods, you give the workers the advantage of the market price of the stuff to the retail dealer ?—To the wholesale dealer. As a matter of fact, we give them rather more than the wholesale dealer gives, and slightly less than we get from the retailer.

4283. The public get as near a guarantee as possible of a good article, and so far as the workers go, you want to give them, if possible, a sum as near to the retail price as you can go with safety, and I suppose that sometimes the wholesale price is such that you have to incur a little loss ?—The prices vary in the commercial market. It is rather a complicated trade. We give the workers really rather more than we get for the goods from the wholesale woollen merchant in the south.

4284. You give them something ranging between a fair wholesale and a fair retail price ?—Yes, that may truly be said.

4285. The balance may represent a small loss to your association, but you are anxious to promote the interests of the workers by giving them as much as possible ?—We refuse to drop below a certain price, even if the cost of wool does vary a little.

4286. How do the prices range ?—For a yard of Harris tweed of single width we pay from 2s. 8d. to 2s. 10d., and 2s. 11d., for very good pieces we sometimes pay a much higher price to encourage first class work.

4287. How would it "pan" out, to use an American expression, in the form of weekly wages ? I mean, how many yards could they make ? But first, let me ask, have you to deduct from the 2s. 8d. the value of the material ?—That is what they get when they bring in the tweed. They have had the wool advanced to them. The 2s. 9d., which we may take as the price paid, means the value of the tweed, and includes price of the wool The rest, of course, represents labour.

4288. What is the value of the wool which you advance to them ?—At present it would average about 10d. per pound. There are two kinds of wool, black-faced and Cheviot ; the latter is the dearer, and we are selling it at 1s. 1d. per lb.; a yard of tweed would weigh about eleven ounces.

4289. Do I understand that there is about one and a half yards in a pound ?—Not exactly ; the crofter gets the wool in a raw state and there is a certain amount of waste in the process of manufacture.

4290. Then can we reckon the proportion at one yard to the pound ?—Yes, practically.

* Mr. Newlands, the Factory Inspector, who gave this evidence, has since explained to the Secretary of the Committee that the word "spun" was inserted in the first unrevised proof of his evidence inadvertently instead of the word "carded."

4291. The yard of tweed produced is purchased at 2s. 9d., but you have to debit the workers with the 1s. 1d. or whatever was the cost of the wool?—Yes, but some of the crofters have a portion of their own wool, and therefore do not incur nearly so high a debt.

4292. So that they get for working alone as high a remuneration as 1s. 8d. per yard?—Yes, speaking roughly.

4293. The workpeople bring in so many yards, and are paid at about 2s. 9d. a yard, but in settling with them you have to take the poundage of wool supplied to them, the cost of which you have been lying out of for a long time, but there is a balance of about 1s. 8d. a yard left which the people get actually for their work?—We don't deduct anything from them; we present them with our bill for the wool, or for other things supplied. It has been said that we kept back the amount from them and gave them only the difference, but our principle is to pay them in full, and I have here cash receipts for some of our payments, which I now produce.

4294. These are the receipts given by the workers?—Yes. Paying them for their work and being ourselves repaid for our advances forms two separate transactions.

4295. Have you anything to indicate the other side of the account; the debit items, so to speak—what you charge?—We can always tell what should be charged for meal or wool or anything advanced.

4296. You supply the workers, not only with the materials for their work, but also with food?—Not all their food, only the absolute necessaries.

4297. What arrangement is made with regard to the price at which the material is supplied? Do you make any profit upon it?—Yes, we do. We must make a small profit or we should be at once in a bankrupt condition. Our average charge in excess of cost is, I believe, 12½ per cent. on meal and I believe also on wool. We want to conduct the thing as a business, and if we did not conduct it on business lines the whole movement might break down.

4298. So that you do sell to these people certain wool, making an overhead profit of from 10 to 12½ per cent.?—Yes, gross.

4299. By gross profit, do I understand you to mean that that is just a difference between what you pay and what you get?—Yes.

4300. Out of the 10 to 12½ per cent. you have to run the Association with all its incidental expenses?—Yes, that represents establishment charges.

4301. So that if you were an ordinary commercial concern at the end of the year you would probably find that the profit of from 10 to 12½ per cent. was fully accounted for by the necessary expenses of the Association?—Yes. I hand in our annual report (handed in). I should like to remark that we could not possibly pay for all our establishment charges out of the 12½ per cent. if it were not for profits upon big sales of the tweeds, etc., which we have at Stafford House and at large cities in England and Scotland, where we charge a rather high price by retail. Indeed our wholesale customers would not let us do otherwise; if we did not charge a much higher price retail they would refuse to buy from us.

4302. If you enter the wholesale market as an ordinary trader you are met with impediments?—Yes, we are. It is a very difficult trade to keep alive. There are mills making tweeds like ours at a low price—rather shoddy stuff—and I have to use every effort to keep advertising our own industry.

4303. Can you enlighten us as to the profits made by your exhibitions and sales, or would you rather not go into that?—I should like to say that, owing to our advances to these poor people, we are continually incurring bad debts. The people are bound to us in no way whatever. If they are persuaded by merchants, they are perfectly free to take to the merchant the tweeds made with our wool. They come to us for our wool because it is good and cheap. We make no terms with them. They also get our meal, our sugar and our tea, so we have always a floating debt, and the result is that we have had to establish a crofters' reserve fund to preserve us from loss and to assist us with a sick fund for workers. We pay no dividends whatever. I raised the capital of £10,000 amongst my friends ten years ago, and they do not press me for dividends, so long as it is doing good amongst these poor people.

4304. The people are absolutely free even after getting the wool advanced?—Yes, I am sorry to say that we do not get our tweed in for a long time afterwards—in some cases never. I think a great many of these people are quite honest, but some of them are persuaded to be a little dishonest; and one great drawback is when philanthropic people come along and buy tweeds made with our wool. They do not realise the complicated position at all.
